HOW TO USE THE ENCYCLOPEDIA

The names of persons, places, and most institutions treated in this volume will be found listed alphabetically through these pages. However, institutions such as local churches, hospitals, chapels, and the like will usually be found under the name of the city or town where they are located. Exceptions are those unusual institutions whose names are perhaps even better known than the cities in which they are located.

Bibliographical references in most cases have been placed below each article, pointing the reader to further information. The more important of these works appear in abbreviated form with the article, but are gathered together in the appendix, where the alphabetical Bibliography should be consulted for fuller publishing data. Where there is no such entry in the general bibliography, these details are given in the reference at the end of the individual article, except in a few instances where full information was not available.

In addition to the main alphabetical bibliography, we have included in the appendix a subject bibliography listing standard works in many areas of study. In this subject bibliography, as usually in the articles in the main encyclopedia, works are listed only by their short titles.

A feature of presentation in the Encyclopedia is the use of capital letters to indicate that the name so treated is to be found elsewhere in the work as a separate item of its own. This obviates the prolific use of q.v. ("which see"). Exceptions in such capitalization appear when a name reoccurs in any one item.

LACE, JOHN JAMES (1861-1947), was born in Glen Auldin, Ramsey, Isle of Man, May 17, 1861, son of William and Anna Lace, Wesleyan Methodists. Licensed to preach in 1880, he was educated in the schools of the Isle of Man, graduated from the Conference Course of Study in 1889, having been ordained deacon in 1888, and elder in 1891. He received his A.B. degree from the old Chaddock College in Quincy, Ill., U.S.A., in 1896, later attending NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY and GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE at Evanston, Ill.

He served pastors in MISSOURI and IOWA until 1902 when, for health reasons, he transferred to the COLORADO CONFERENCE where he served as pastor and district superintendent until 1916, when he was appointed superintendent of the UTAH Mission where he served until 1925. Then, returning to the Colorado Conference, he was again a district superintendent for two terms, and in 1932 took the retired relation, making his home in DENVER, Colo., where he passed away April 12, 1947, survived by his wife and four children. His body rests in the cemetery at Fort Collins, Colorado.

John J. Lace was a cultured and fervent preacher, a wise and successful administrator, and a leader of keen insight and ability.

LACKINGTON, JAMES (1746-1815), was an eccentric bookseller, who was born at Wellington, Somersetshire, and became a Methodist about 1760. Self-educated but penniless, he was befriended by the London Methodists, and was given £5 from a benevolent fund to set himself up in business. His business prospered and became the largest of its kind in London. With prosperity he turned from the Christian faith altogether, and wrote books which were regarded as being of a light nature, in which he poured scorn on Methodism. He returned to the faith some years later and, in 1804, renounced his infidel views in his Confessions. In reparation for his infidelity he built chapels at Taunton and Budleigh Salterton. He had an erratic and unpleasing personality.

LACY, GEORGE CARLETON (1888-1951), bishop of the Methodist Church, was born in Foochow, Fukien, China, on Dec. 28, 1888, and was educated in Foochow and Shanghai mission schools. His father, WILLIAM H. LACY, directed the Foochow Mission Press and, after 1903, the Methodist Publishing House in Shanghai. His grandmother, Mary Clarke Nind, helped to organize the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY (MEC) in the North Central states, and in the 1890's embarked on an unprecedented world tour of Methodist mission stations.

GEORGE C. LACY

Carleton Lacy was graduated from OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in 1911 and entered GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE, to receive his bachelor of divinity degree in 1913, and master of arts from NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY the following year. During student days he filled pastorates in Detroit, Mich., U.S.A., in Bloomington, Ill., U.S.A., and Somers, Wisc., U.S.A. He was received on trial in the WISCONSIN ANNUAL CONFERENCE in September 1912, was transferred two years later to North China Annual Conference, then in rapid succession to Foochow and Kiangsi Conferences.

After studying at Nanking Language School, he served as an itinerant missionary and district superintendent in Kiangsi Province, later as principal of William Nast Academy in Kiukiang.

In 1918, he married Harriet Lang Boutelle, who had gone to Canton, China, as a Y.W.C.A. secretary. They had two children, Creighton Boutelle and Eleanor Maie. From 1921 until 1941, Lacy was lent by the Methodist Board of Missions to the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY, as secretary of its China agency, and then to the China Bible House formed with the BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY. For many years he wrote as China correspondent for Zion's Herald, The Christian Century and other church periodicals. In 1928-29 he studied at Union Theological Seminary and Columbia University, receiving a second master's degree. He was also awarded honorary doctorates of divinity by Ohio Wesleyan and Garrett. He was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1932.

He was appointed in 1935 as a member of the Joint Commission on Unity of the M. E. Church and the M. E. Church, South, in China. He was elected bishop by the China Central Conference of 1941 and assigned to the Foochow Area.

During the Second World War, when part of his Episcopal Area was occupied by Japanese troops, Bishop Lacy travelled extensively through remote regions, several times from West China to India and thence to America and back. During the earlier years of Japanese occupation he wrote two monographs on The Great Migration and the Church in West China and The Great Migration and the Church Behind the Lines. He also published in Chinese a series of Bible studies, The Book of Revelation and The Messages of the Old Testament Prophets.

Under "term episcopacy" in China, Bishop Lacy's tenure was to end in 1949, but the advent of Communist Government made it impossible to hold a Central Conference with new elections. With tightening pressures on the Church and on American personnel after the Korean War began, he officially resigned and turned his authority over to Bishop W. Y. CHEN. Communist police, however, refused to grant an exit permit when other missionaries left, and kept him under increasing surveillance, restriction, and eventual house arrest until his death of a heart attack in December 1951. His body was buried in the city of his birth, in the little mission cemetery beside his parents, attended—and this was at Communist orders—only by his faithful cook.

CREIGHTON B. LACY

LACY, HENRY ANKENY (1917-), is Executive Secretary for India and Nepal, Board of Missions of The United Methodist Church. He was born in Foochow, CHINA, where his parents, grandparents and great-grandmother, and a number of uncles and aunts were Methodist missionaries. He was graduated from Whittier College in 1940 and married his classmate, Elizabeth Day Pickett. After training in social work at George Williams College in Chicago, Ill., U.S.A., he went to India in 1941, arriving just before the Japanese attack on Honolulu. He served as manager of the Parker High School and the Nathaniel Jordan Hostel in Moradabad. His first term was interrupted by a call to serve in the Office of Strategic Services in CHINA, and he spent a year there.

Returning to America eager to take more additional training than a furlough would allow, he accepted an appointment with the Methodist Children's Home Society of Detroit and studied at Wayne University, earning his Master's Degree in social work. When he went back to India, he was appointed principal of the Ingraham Institute, Ghaziabad.

In 1961, the Division of World Missions asked him to become the first lay missionary chosen to serve as one of its executive secretaries. His field was India, NEPAL, and PAKISTAN. When the board was reorganized in 1964, and unified administration of the work of the Woman's Division and the World Division was accomplished, he and CHANDA CHRISTDAS of India were appointed executive secretaries for India and Nepal with coordinate responsibility.

He represented the laymen of the Delhi Annual Conference in the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1956.

J. WASKOM PICKETT

LACY, WILLIAM H. (1858-1925), an American missionary who spent thirty-seven years as such in Foochow and Shanghai, CHINA, most of that period in the publishing of Christian literature in various Chinese dialects. He was born in Milwaukee, Wisc., on Jan. 8, 1858, graduated from NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY in 1881; and later received the A.M. and D.D. degrees from that University, and the B.D. from GARRETT. He joined the WISCONSIN CONFERENCE in 1882, and the following year married Emma Nind. In 1887 they sailed for China as missionaries. He was manager of the Methodist Press in Foochow until 1903, when he moved to Shanghai and together with YOUNG J. ALLEN organized the Methodist Publishing House, probably the first official collaboration of the two branches of the Methodist Church which had been separated since 1844. For a period he was secretary of the All-China Finance Committee.

Lacy's wife, affectionately known as "Mother Lacy," died in Kuling a month before her husband's death in Shanghai, Sept. 3, 1925. All five of the Lacy children became missionaries: Walter (author of A Hundred Years of China Methodism) in Foochow, 1908-27; Henry, in Foochow and Singapore, 1912-52; CARLETON; Irving for one term in Yenping; and Alice, 1917-21, in Foochow, where she died. And a grandson, HENRY, JR. is a Mission Board executive secretary for India and Nepal.

LADE, FRANK M. A. (1868-1948). Australian minister and educator, was the foundation principal of Wesley Theological College in the South Australian Conference. After training at Queen's College, MELBOURNE, and eighteen years circuit experience in the Victoria and Tasmania Conference he was transferred to South Australia in 1911. He was a circuit minister for eleven years, then in charge of the Brighton College for training ministers from 1922 until its reconstitution and relocation in 1927 as Wesley College. He was Principal of this institution until his retirement in 1937.

Lade became a well-known public figure through his relentless opposition to the gambling and liquor interests. For two years he led a campaign on behalf of the Prohibition League and for a time edited the temperance paper, The Patriot.

He was widely recognized as an expository preacher of exceptional quality and a much-respected teacher by successive generations of theological students. Lade was twice President of the South Australian Conference (1916 and 1936), and was Secretary-General from 1920-1929 and President-General of the Methodist Church of Australasia from 1929-1932.

AUSTRALIAN EDITORIAL COMMITTEE

LADIES' AID SOCIETIES. Activities and organizations which might have been called Ladies' Aid Societies existed from the beginning in American Methodist local churches. In JOHN STREET CHURCH (built in 1768), New York City, "the women provided a house for the preacher and furnished it."

However, the women's organizations which furnished PARSONAGES and promoted social activities were slow to gain official recognition. Ladies' Aid Societies are not mentioned in the Discipline of the M. E. Church until 1904. The M. E. Church, South and the Methodist Protestant Church never officially recognized the Ladies' Aid Society as such, though in 1890 the former provided for a "Woman's Parsonage and Home Mission Society," the purpose of which was to "procure homes for itinerant preachers and otherwise aid the cause of Christ." Four years later the name was changed to "Woman's Home Mission Society" while its purpose remained the same. In 1910 the Southern Church voted that its General Board of Missions should include a Woman's Missionary Council with Home and Foreign Departments. But regardless of the nomenclature used, there were in effect Ladies' Aid Societies in the Methodist denominations.

In 1911 the Methodist Book Concern published The Ladies' Aid Manual which gave pointed suggestions on how to organize and conduct a Ladies' Aid Society. Opposing questionable means of raising money, the book suggested plans and activities which it said would "contribute to the social, intellectual, and financial development of the church without incurring any just criticism."

Pastors and others believed that the Ladies' Aid Society and similar organizations were helpful to the churches. DAN B. BRUMMITT, editor of one of the editions of the M. E. Church Christian Advocate, praised the Ladies' Aid Society as "an organization that never suspends, dies, nor takes a leave of absence. It is many things in one: a pastoral reinforcement, a financial treasure chest, a woman's exchange, a recreation center, a cookery school, a needlework guild, a relief society, a school of salesmanship, a clearing house for domestic and church problems, a prayer meeting—each in turn plays many parts."

In 1939 The Methodist Church effectively combined the work of the women in the WOMAN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE. Since that time there has been no real dichotomy in the work of the women in Methodism, though a few small churches may maintain Ladies' Aid Societies in name or in fact while some women's circles in larger churches may emphasize local church and social activities more than the total program of the Women's Society of Christian Service.

LADIES REPOSITORY, THE. A journal established by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in 1841, designed especially for women. The OHIO CONFERENCE in 1840 memorialized the General Conference to establish such a publication, and that Conference directed the BOOK AGENTS at CINCINNATI to issue such as soon as proper arrangements could be made. In January 1841, the first number of The Ladies Repository came from the press as a monthly magazine under the editorial care of L. L. Hamline (later bishop), who had been elected assistant editor of The Western Christian Advocate. What were described as "sprightly and classical editorials" gave character to the publication, and its circulation rapidly increased. On the election of Hamline to the bishopric in 1844, he was succeeded by EDWARD THOMSON, who had been principal of Norwalk Seminary, and under whose editorship the Repository continued to prosper. Thomson, however, became president of OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in 1848, to be succeeded as editor by Benjamin F. Tefft, then professor of the Greek Language and Literature in the Indiana Asbury University. Under his care, the Repository obtained a still wider circulation. When Tefft in turn accepted the position of president of the Genesee College, then at Lima, N. Y., WILLIAM C. LARRABEE, who had been in the chair of Mathematics in the Indiana Asbury University, was elected his successor. Succeeding him, when he became state Superintendent of Education in Indiana, the Book Committee of the M. E. Church elected DAVIS W. CLARK in his place, who was re-elected editor by the General Conferences of 1856 and 1860. Clark, however, was also elected bishop in 1864 and was succeeded by ISAAC W. WILEY, who served two quadrennia but likewise was elected bishop in 1868. Erastus Wentworth became editor then in 1872. Four years later the General Conference of 1876 elected DANIEL CURRY as editor and authorized the appointment of a committee who should have power to change the name and style of publication of the journal. The committee on consultation resolved that the title should be changed to that of National Repository, and under that name it continued to be issued after January 1877. The National Repository was a monthly magazine devoted to general and religious literature. In time it changed its scope from the pattern which had been followed by the old Ladies Repository to a more general type of issue. The journal was illustrated and adapted to the wants of the general reader. Daniel Curry continued to be editor for some time until the General Conference of 1880 discontinued the publication of the magazine.

LAFAYETTE, INDIANA, U.S.A. Trinity Church began about 1824 in what was then a small log cabin settlement known as Star City on the banks of the Wabash River. An itinerant Methodist preacher named Hackalieh Vreedenburg came to the settlement, and John Huntsinger, whose cabin was then in what is "downtown Lafayette," welcomed the preacher, told him several Methodists lived in the settlement, called them together and that night a Methodist service—the first church service of any kind held in Lafayette—was held in the John Huntsinger home. Hackalieh Vreedenburg is recorded in 1825 as being the preacher of a circuit in which Lafayette was one appointment on the Crawfordville work. Services continued to be held in the Huntsinger home.

After a time Henry Buell, the second pastor to be assigned to the circuit, came to Lafayette, but he was disturbed by firing of guns and yelling outside the courthouse and seems to have left the ministry after that. He was followed by Eli Pearce Farmer who organized the first church in Lafayette at the courthouse there, and in 1828 Stephen R. Boggs was sent from the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE to the Crawfordsville Circuit. The next year came James Armstrong who held the first Methodist Quarterly Conference in the town in the Eli Huntsinger wheelwright shop.

The first house of worship in the city was erected by Boyd Phelps in 1831. It was a 30 x 40 foot frame structure located on Sixth Street on the second lot south of Main Street facing the east. The building cost $1,500. In 1836, the lot on the northwest corner of Fifth and Perry Streets was purchased for $400 and the building moved there. This building was dedicated in 1845 and was rented weekdays as a schoolhouse at $5 per month. Thus early, the Methodist Church was linked with educational possibilities and forces of the day.

In 1850 the congregation was divided in order to start a new congregation at Ninth and Brown Streets. The cemetery for the church was where St. Boniface Church now stands. It is believed that the body of John Huntsinger still rests beneath St. Boniface.

In 1868, the lot now occupied by Trinity Methodist Church was purchased by Henry Taylor and John W. Heath at a cost of $7,000, and presented to Trinity Church as a suitable place of worship. The present Trinity Church building was constructed in 1869 on the lot at a cost of $90,000. The building is yet looked after and kept in repair, and was the scene of a centennial celebration in 1969. The old parsonage one day gave way to a new modern education building. This is astir seven days a week with church activity. A new $42,000 parsonage was built in Vinton Woods, one of Lafayette's exclusive residential areas.

Trinity Methodist Church early attained great stature and prestige in the NORTHWEST INDIANA CONFERENCE, indeed throughout the entire state, especially during the unprecedented twenty-nine year pastorate of Thomas Frederick Williams (1919-1948). It has always been a downtown church—a church at the heart of the city.

Trinity is the mother Church of all Methodism in the entire area. Its people believe that the history of its influence for good in countless ways through more than a hundred years can never be adequately told.

LAFETRA, ADELAIDE WHITEFIELD, founder of Santiago College, SANTIAGO, Chile, was born and educated in New York State. She was preceptress of MOUNT ALLISON Seminary, Sackville, New Brunswick, when in 1878 WILLIAM TAYLOR invited her to go to Santiago to develop a school. There she met and in 1882 married IRA HAYNES LAFETRA, and they worked together in a school with sections for boys and girls. The school later developed into Santiago College, now an outstanding school for young women. She worked in Chile for twenty-five years.

LAFETRA, IRA HAYNES (1851-1917), missionary to South America, was known as "builder of the Chile Mission." On completion of studies at BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL

OF THEOLOGY he was invited to go to CHILE by WILLIAM TAYLOR (later bishop), arriving at Valparaiso in 1878 and ministering first to seamen in that port city. The next year LaFetra moved to SANTIAGO, where he reorganized the English-language Union Church and founded a school. There he met and married ADELAIDE WHITEFIELD (LAFETRA), and their labors, with those of others, resulted in SANTIAGO COLLEGE, one of the leading educational institutions of Chile. In 1880 he was elected as the first president of the conference of missionaries set up to administer the self-supporting missions that had been established by Taylor on the West Coast of South America. Ill health forced his retirement in 1906.

LAFFERTY, JOHN JAMES (1837-1909), colorful American editor and the fifth editor of what is now the Virginia Methodist Advocate, was the only child of George and Elizabeth Lightfoot Lafferty. His father was educated in IRELAND, and later served with an engineer who surveyed a railroad connecting VIRGINIA and NORTH CAROLINA. His mother was of the historic Virginia family of the Lightfoots. When the son was eleven months of age, his father was drowned at a James River ferry during a wind-storm.

Young Lafferty made an excellent record at EMORY AND HENRY COLLEGE in Virginia. He was graduated next to the head of his class.

He served as chaplain of a cavalry regiment in the War Between the States. After a year he was stricken with a "severe malady," but recuperated sufficiently to accept the post of major of cavalry offered him by the Confederate States War Department. He served in this capacity until the war was over.

Immediately following the war, pastoral appointments were scarce, so Lafferty took his family to Lexington, Va., and engaged in several business enterprises. These proved quite successful financially.

In 1874 he was offered a connection with the Richmond Christian Advocate, predecessor of the Virginia Methodist Advocate. The financial plight of the Advocate was not encouraging from the standpoint of support. The successful businessman took the matter to God in earnest prayer. The outcome was his decision to cast his lot with the church paper. Due to his business ability, the Advocate prospered financially. He served as its editor for twenty-seven years.

Editor Lafferty quickly became known as the best editor in the M. E. Church, South. This deeply spiritual man was "a master of sarcasm" when the occasion demanded it. He was widely known throughout the Southland not only as editor, but as a college and chautauqua lecturer. He died on July 23, 1909.

LA GRANGE, ILLINOIS, U.S.A. First Church is one of the larger suburban churches west of CHICAGO. This church had its beginning in 1872 in the home of Isaac P. Poinier, one block from the site of the present church. Later in the same year a "Methodist Society" was organized. Upon completion of a two-story school building on the site of the present church, services were held in the school building. Poinier, whose home was only one block away, served as Sunday school superintendent, organist and janitor. He often carried coal from his own home to heat the building. The first resident pastor was William H. Holmes, who served from 1875 to 1877. The Society grew in zeal and numbers, due largely to the consecrated efforts and diligent work of the LADIES AID SOCIETY.

After a time land was donated for a new church building, stone was purchased and a contractor engaged, but as work was about to begin, the project was discontinued because Poinier and several other influential members moved away. For a time, members of the Methodist Society joined persons of other denominations in services held in the railroad station, with the Rev. Mr. Metcalf, the station agent and a Baptist preacher, in charge.

By 1884, the Methodists had become stronger, and in October 1884, the First M. E. Church of La Grange was organized by Luke Hitchcock, presiding elder of the Chicago District. A pastor was appointed and services were held in the Masonic Hall. The year ended with nine members. Financial expenditures for the year were: $216 for the pastor; $52 for the rent of the hall; and $10 given to missions.

In 1885 and 1886, services were continued in the Masonic Hall and later were held in a skating rink. Additional families were added to the membership of the church. A Board of Trustees was elected and incorporation papers were completed on July 21, 1886. The frame school building which had been used by the church in its beginning was purchased by the trustees at a cost of $2,000. The building was remodeled to make it an acceptable place of worship and was dedicated on Nov. 28, 1886. Electric lights were installed in 1892 at a cost of $75.

Plans for a new church building began to develop in 1890. In May 1893, construction was started and by Nov. 5, 1893, one section of the new building was completed. In 1894 a parsonage was built. Work on the main part of the church building was continued and the sanctuary was dedicated on Jan. 6, 1895. A pipe organ was installed in 1907, and in 1908 the building was enlarged. As the church continued to grow in membership, need was seen for more adequate church school facilities, and a two-story educational building was added and dedicated in 1917.

By 1947, the church had 1,179 resident members. The building which had served the congregation well for fifty-two years was becoming inadequate. So in 1951, a new sanctuary and fellowship hall were completed and in 1962 there had been added a new educational building, chapel and offices, bringing the total value of the church building to $1,250,000.

This church has been served by a succession of twenty-nine ministers. The parish boundaries now encompass an area ten miles long and two miles wide. Within this parish are the villages of La Grange and La Grange Park, having a total population of more than 30,000. With a membership now of 2,100, the First United Methodist Church of La Grange will celebrate its centennial in 1972.

LAGRANGE COLLEGE, LaGrange, Georgia, U.S.A., was chartered as LaGrange Female Academy in 1831 and has had the longest history among non-tax-supported institutions of higher education in Georgia. It was purchased by the NORTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South in 1856, and on Jan. 29, 1857, began operation as a Methodist institution. In 1934 its name was changed to LaGrange College, and in 1953 it became a coeducational college. It offers the B.A. degree. The governing board is made up of thirty-four members nominated by the board and confirmed by the North Georgia Conference.

LAHORE (population 1,297,000) is the capital of West Pakistan. Pakistan's federal capital is 200 miles to the northwest, near the city of Rawalpindi. Lahore is eighteen miles west of the Indo-Pakistan border. It is headquarters for the West Pakistan Railways and for Punjab University, which includes many colleges and high schools in Lahore, and other colleges and high schools throughout the Punjab. Many factories and business and government offices make Lahore an important business center.

Lucie Harrison Girl's High School was the first Methodist Primary School organized in the beginning of Methodist work in the Punjab. It became a high school in 1953. The school includes all classes, kindergarten through high school. The present principal, Mrs. Priscilla P. Peters is a well qualified and capable Pakistani, with an efficient teaching staff.

United Christian Hospital, an institution in which Methodists cooperate, was organized in 1947 when the throes of partition, including an influx of Moslem refugees from India, and departing Hindu and Sikh fugitives bound for India, created great medical, health and sanitation problems. The various denominations combined, rented an empty Forman College Hostel for a temporary hospital center, and later moved into a fine permanent new hospital set-up in a Lahore outskirts, Gulberg (sometimes spelled Gulbarg), in 1965. The United Christian Hospital has established a fine reputation with its skilled Pakistani and missionary doctors, nurses, supervisors and technicians. Its managing committee represents all major denominations and those provide missionary doctors and nurses, pay their salaries, and finance the budget so as to add to the income from hospital fees, and thus provide adequate salaries for Pakistani members of the staff.

Kinnaird College for Women is an Anglican Institution. Methodists and Presbyterians cooperate by providing missionary members of the staff and supply additional funds to help in providing for expenses of Pakistani staff members and other college expenses. The enrollment is limited to 300 girls. Christian girls who wish to go to college seek admission to Kinnaird. Miss P. Mangat Rai, a competent and well known Pakistani, is principal.

Kinnaird Teacher Training Center trains Christian women to become teachers in primary schools, or in primary and junior high classes in recognized high schools. Candidates for such training must have a government certificate, as high school passed. Many who have completed two years of college work also come here for training.

Forman Christian College is an old institution of far-reaching fame. It is staffed and supported jointly by the Presbyterians and the Methodists. Forman celebrated its centenary anniversary in 1965. The present principal is E. J. Sinclair, a well qualified senior Pakistani staff member, well trained, with a fine reputation and recognized administrative ability. The enrollment of Forman before Partition was almost one thousand; in late 1947, only 150 students remained. Enrollment however is again near the one thousand mark. The College enjoys an admirable standing and reputation, and many Pakistani leaders in government are graduates of the college.

LAKE BLUFF, ILLINOIS, U.S.A. Lake Bluff Children's Home, founded in 1894 by Methodist deaconesses, is a church-related child care agency under the control of a regularly constituted Board of Trustees. Chartered and licensed by the State of ILLINOIS to serve as an Illinois Corporation, not for profit, it is a member agency of the Child Welfare League of America and the Welfare Council of Metropolitan Chicago. It is affiliated with the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE of The United Methodist Church, and with the National Association, as well as the BOARD OF HEALTH AND WELFARE MINISTRIES of The United Methodist Church. The home is also approved and endorsed by the Chicago Association of Commerce and Industry, the Subscription Investigating Committee, and by the Community Fund of Chicago.

Care is provided for children whose own homes have been disrupted by illness, death, divorce, and other social and emotional problems; who are within the normal range of physical and mental health; who have Protestant backgrounds; whose residence is within the area served by the Rock River Conference.

Services to children from their infancy for as long a time as care is needed include group living at the Home for boys and girls of grade school age; adoption of infants and older children; care in Group Homes in nearby communities for high school boys and girls; foster Boarding Homes within the area for boys and girls of all ages; casework services to all children under care and to their families; counseling services to minor unwed mothers; and remedial "school" care for some types of emotionally disturbed children.

LAKE JUNALUSKA ASSEMBLY, INC., an American Methodist assembly ground, owned and operated by the Southeastern Jurisdiction of The United Methodist Church, is located at Lake Junaluska, N. C., U.S.A., on Highway 19, twenty-six miles west of ASHEVILLE, and three miles north of Waynesville. Its doors were first opened on June 25, 1913. About thirteen years prior to this occasion the idea had been expressed that there was a need of a "Chautauqua type" of Southern Assembly. JAMES ATKINS (later bishop), visited Chautauqua, N. Y., and conversed with Bishop VINCENT, then Sunday School Editor of the M. E. Church. Later Atkins became Sunday School Editor of the M. E. Church, South, and invited members of the Sunday School Board to be his guests in Waynesville for their meeting. There he proposed the idea of a "Southern Assembly."

In 1908 during the Second Laymen's Missionary Conference, the statement was made that "we need a place where ministers and laymen, together with their families, can meet on the common level of Worship, Inspiration, Instruction and Wholesome Recreation." The response was gratifying and a committee was appointed. Headed by Atkins, the committee members, some of whom had visited Waynesville, settled upon Tuscola in Haywood County, N. C., now Junaluska—a location universally described as "beautiful for situation." The Blue Ridge and the Great Smoky Mountains surrounding the lovely Richland Valley, are rich in beauty and majesty. Among the men most responsible for the establishment of this noted religious center, which soon became known as the "Summer Capital of Southern Methodism," were: JOHN R. PEPPER, John P. Pettijohn, General JULIAN S. CARR, B. M. Olds, S. C. Satterthwaite, B. J. Sloan, Hugh Sloan, Riley Burgher, R. B. Schoolfield, L. B. Davenport, A. D. Reyn-M. Ferguson, GEORGE R. STUART, Alden Howell and S. C. Welch.

JAMES CANNON (later bishop), was elected first Superintendent; W. F. TILLET became Superintendent of General Program and Evangelistic Work. The first permanent officers, with Atkins as Chairman and leader, were elected in 1910. From 1911 to 1913 a dam was built, to form the 250-acre lake; the auditorium was erected, a few streets were opened and thirteen private cottages were built. On June 25, 1913, W. F. QUILLIAN, Sr. turned the light switch and a great conference of laymen opened with singing, under the leadership of J. Dale Stentz. The Missionary address was by Robert E. Speer. Four thousand people attended, $152,000 was raised for Missionary work, and seven young people were consecrated for Missionary work in Africa with Bishop WALTER LAMBUTH.

Four years after the opening of the Southern Assembly, the Sunday School Board of the M. E. Church, South held a demonstration Leadership School for the training of volunteer teachers at Junaluska. This was a fore-runner of a new type of Leadership training. In 1922 the Sunday School Board built an Education Building (now known as Shackford Hall), as well as lodges and a cafeteria on the southwest shores of the Lake. The system of Leadership Training Schools conducted by the International Council of Religious Education had its beginning at Lake Junaluska.

The Board of Missions of the M. E. Church, South in time purchased the "Junaluska Inn" and used it for Missionary training Conferences. Following a disastrous fire, a new Mission Building was erected, later to be known as Lambuth Inn. This popular center is used regularly by the Missionary Groups and the Women's Society of Christian Service. Junaluska is the site for Candler Camp Meeting and the Annual Schools of Evangelism for the Southeastern Jurisdiction. It was at Junaluska that the Board of Lay Activities of the M. E. Church, South was organized, with GEORGE L. MORELOCK as its first Secretary.

During the late twenties and early thirties the ownership of the Assembly was still vested in a Board of Commissioners. The war, the panic and the depression made its operation very difficult financially, and it was forced into receivership. Under the leadership of the bishops and of W. A. Lambeth, funds were raised and all assets were purchased by the Methodist Church, South. A new Board of Trustees was elected and a new charter and certificate of incorporation were secured. The name was changed from The Southern Assembly to The Lake Junaluska Methodist Assembly.

Following World War II, EDWIN L. JONES of Charlotte, N. C., was elected President of the Board of Trustees, which was then composed of the bishops and one lay and one clerical member from each annual conference in the Jurisdiction. In 1948 the GENERAL CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church, in session at Boston, Mass., accepted ownership of the Assembly, and then transferred it to the Southeastern Jurisdiction, where it was accepted at the session in Columbia, S. C., the same year.

The Southeastern Jurisdictional Conference elects trustees, who in turn set up the administration and supervise the management of the Assembly's business and operation. The properties, formerly owned by the Board of Missions, the Sunday School Board and the Commissioners, have all been transferred to the Lake Junaluska Assembly, Inc.

In the course of a summer's season, thousands of people come to attend the conferences, workshops, training schools, platform hours, and engage in wholesome recreational activities. The George R. Stuart Auditorium, with a seating capacity of three thousand, has provided the platform for world renowned leaders in religion, government, education and science. The Memorial Chapel, with its Room of Memory, is the spiritual center of the Assembly. Bounded by the mountains, lake and landscape, families have here established homes; hotels and lodges have been erected, and all the comforts and conveniences of modern civilization have been installed.

The WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL built its headquarters for the American Section at Junaluska. A handsome building of native stone was erected on the site formerly occupied by the Cherokee Hotel. ELMER T. CLARK, Executive Secretary, gave his collection of Wesleyana to the Council, and this notable collection, with supplements, is housed in the museum there. The offices and library of the Association of Methodist Historical Societies (now COMMISSION ON ARCHIVES & HISTORY) are in the building, also. Thousands of visitors annually come to this building, including many scholars and students of Methodist history.

The WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA ANNUAL CONFERENCE and the quadrennial sessions of the Southeastern Jurisdictional Conference usually meet at Junaluska. In 1956 the WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCE was held there.

Speakers of national and international prominence who have appeared on the platform throughout the years include Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, Vice President (then) Richard Nixon, commentator Lovell Thomas, United Nations Representative Dr. Frank Graham, World Evangelist Dr. Billy Graham, and Lord Caradon, Representative of The United Kingdom to the United Nations.

LAKELAND, FLORIDA, U.S.A. First Church is the largest church in the headquarters city of Florida Methodism, where the Episcopal Residence, FLORIDA SOUTHERN COLLEGE, and the conference offices are located. First Church Lakeland is noted for its large church school and for its commitment to missions. It stands high among the denomination's larger churches in the proportion of its total income devoted to benevolences. It is located on an exceptionally beautiful site, with spacious lawns sloping down to Lake Morton. Membership in 1970 was 2,768.

ROBERT CAXTON DOGGETT

LAKESIDE, OHIO, U.S.A., is a religious center and encampment on the shores of Lake Erie. The old-time CAMP MEETING that flourished over a century ago and was a mark of early Methodism is said to have been the genesis of the Lakeside of today.

As early as 1842, camp meetings and "Sunday outings" were being held on the rocky shores of Lake Erie near Port Clinton. Many families were influenced at these meetings and converted under the powerful preaching of the pioneer ministers. Following the suggestion of Richard P. Duvall, a movement began to establish Lakeside as a Christian meeting and vacation center.

A few houses, gingerbread in style, rose on the cleared lots overlooking Lake Erie. But for many years wooden tents were the prevalent structures. In reality simply shanties, these tents were used only for sleeping—with piles of straw covered with quilts serving for beds. Cooking was done outdoors, with the earliest risers responsible for starting the morning coffee.

As more and more people visited Lakeside, the need for a hotel grew. In 1875 the first unit of Hotel Lakeside was built. With the first regular "season" in 1890, Lakeside began its tradition of combining in its program, religion, education, culture, and recreation.

Almost all of the great Chautauqua lecturers and performers came to Lakeside. In those early summers the throngs arrived at "the Summer City on the Lake" by excursion boats, special trains, private buggies, and eventually cars.

The Lakeside Methodist Church was dedicated in 1900, and a pavilion was built in 1909. Hugh Hoover Auditorium was consecrated in 1929 "to the highest uses of worship and the noblest interests of mankind."

A Lakeside Crusade was launched by Ohio Methodists in 1959. By 1964 over $750,000 had been raised and Lakeside given an entirely new look.

Wesley Lodge, a winterized multipurpose building of natural stone, became the focal point of the Youth Center. The administration building and Auditorium Hotel were modernized and winterized and became the Fountain Inn. With these fine facilities, groups now come to Lakeside throughout the year.

The new pavilion, with spacious sun decks; the Schunk Memorial Carillon Tower and aluminum cross are new landmarks on the Lake Erie Shore. A trailer park offers completely modern facilities for trailers and for camping.

Over the years countless thousands of men, women, children, and youth, have been strengthened in faith and purpose because of the guidance and inspiration they found at Lakeside. This is the Lakeside which truly has its place in history, and which will continue to serve throughout the years as "the vacation place with a purpose."

LAKEVIEW METHODIST ASSEMBLY, Palestine, Texas, U.S.A. This assembly, owned and operated by the TEXAS CONFERENCE (UMC), is located twelve miles southwest of Palestine on state route 294. The board of trustees, elected by the conference, is composed of ministers and laymen. Established in 1947 on 452 acres of land donated by Anderson County and Palestine, it has since grown to 1,400 acres. There are two lakes and two olympic-sized swimming pools on the grounds. With two cafeterias, twelve brick cabins, and twenty-four air-conditioned camp units, the Assembly can accommodate 1,400 people at one time. Four buildings provide space for offices, assembly rooms, class rooms, a book store, a gift shop, as well as quarters for the Texas Conference Historical Center with its valuable archives. A beautiful stone chapel was given by the J. R. Peace family, East Bernard, Texas. A big tabernacle is used for large assemblies. There are homes on the grounds for the permanent staff of four, as well as housing for a number of summer staff workers. The assembly is open the year round for use by conference and church agencies. Youth assemblies for each of the eleven districts of the conference are held at Lakeview each summer. The assembly registers some 30,000 persons per year for meetings and activities. The property is valued at $2,250,000. The Texas Conference contributes about $100,000 per year for its operation and maintenance.

NACE B. CRAWFORD

LAKESIDE, COLORADO, U.S.A. Lakewood Church is the third largest Methodist church in metropolitan DENVER. The church began in 1881, when a small group of Christian men and women met for worship, first in private homes and then in a school house, in the sparsely settled farming community of Lakewood. To reach the little school house, worshippers had to cross fields and open a wire gate which crossed a road that is now a six-lane highway.

In 1902, Miss Hannah Robb of Lakewood gave one-half acre of ground with the stipulation that a Methodist church be built on it within five years or the property would revert to the owner. Accordingly, in 1904, the men of the church built a one-room frame chapel. Its simple furnishings consisted of pulpit, thirty wooden chairs, an organ and a kitchen range.

The presiding elder's report of September 1904 states, "Last Spring a new church was built in Lakewood and Sunday, August 28th, Brother Wood and I dedicated it free of debt, with enough money to buy a new organ and $97.00 to spare."

The church became known as the Lakewood M. E. Church, and was the only place of worship in the community until 1930. In March 1921, the women organized the "Willing Workers." In those early years, they literally held the church together through their efforts. They helped pay the pastor's salary, assisted a hospital and sponsored a nurse's training there, and met conference demands by holding bazaars and suppers. This was no easy task as food was prepared by kerosene lamp light and water had to be carried from across the street.

During the early years, student ministers from the ILIFF SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY served the church. Then in 1941 H. Preston Childress became the first full-time minister. At that time the membership was 165, but babies and children must have been counted; for on that first Sunday he preached, there were only thirty-five present, four of whom were men. H. P. Childress served the church for eleven years; he saw it through the depression, the growing pains of the war years, and the throes of a building campaign, when the need for a larger church became evident.

The new Lakewood Methodist Church, of early American design, opened its doors for worship March 1950, at 1390 Brentwood Ave. Much of the interior furnishing was done by the men of the church: pews to seat 250, chancel furniture, paneling and kitchen cabinets.

In 1953, church membership jumped to 917, with 596 enrolled in Sunday School. A full-time secretary was hired, and a newspaper, "The Church Visitor," was started. The church again experienced an almost phenomenal growth and construction was started September 1955 on the present sanctuary which seats approximately 500. September 1961 the new educational wing was consecrated to serve the ever increasing enrollment of the Sunday school. A Moller pipe organ was installed in 1964. A church staff of eleven, of whom three are full-time ministers, now serves the membership of over 2,000.

AVERY WHITE GIBBS

LAKEWOOD, OHIO, U.S.A. Lakewood Church of 1968 is the third structure erected on its site at the corner of Detroit and Summit Avenues. The first church, a small one-room building, was built in 1876, near the center of the church lot at a cost of $5,005, including the lot. Its membership was twenty. The eighteen charter members mortgaged their homes as security to cover the cost of the first church.

The initial subscription for the second building was made in January 1902. The cornerstone was laid in June 1904. The new Lakewood M. E. Church was dedicated on March 26, 1905; 185 names were then on the rolls. Its cost was $13,000. The new church stood as a monument to the faithful and harmonious effort of the entire membership.

Today the church worships in a third structure, a beautiful stone church of Gothic design. The original part of the present edifice was constructed in 1913, at a cost of $50,000. A week of special dedicatory services was arranged and a bishop from Washington, D. C. came to deliver the sermon for the dedication services on Sunday, Sept. 21, 1913.

1914 saw the opening of the east wing, used then for the Sunday school. 1951 was the year of a ground-breaking ceremony for the new education building which was added to the north of the main part of the church, at a cost of approximately $500,000.

While Methodist heritage is the glass through which is seen not only the various deeds of past years but the history of the church's spiritual nature, there is one tangible, material link to the past—the church bell. During the construction of the first church (in 1876), a member contracted for a bell to be cast and shipped from the Fulton Company of Pittsburgh, Pa. The bell has been used in all three churches and yet summons people to church Sunday morning. Its heartwarming peal is caused by the bell itself swinging and allowing the clapper, hanging inside, to strike against its sides.

1968 started another phase in the life of the church, with the sanctuary refurbished and refurnished. Lakewood United Methodist Church has grown to a present membership of approximately 4,000. It continues to be a church dedicated to the Glory of God.

MRS. WALTER M. LUTSCH

A. J. LAMAR

LAMAR, ANDREW JACKSON (1847-1933), an American minister, long-time secretary of the ALABAMA CONFERENCE (1909-1929), and Publishing Agent of the M. E. Church, South, in its closing years, and a man of great influence in his connection, was born in Walton County, Ga., on May 29, 1847. He was the son of Andrew Jackson and Mary Athena (Jackson) Lamar. His grandfather was an officer in the Continental Army and a governor of Georgia. He was educated at the high school in Athens, Ga., and was a sophomore at the University of Georgia until the Fall of 1863 when he, with his fellow students, went into the Confederate States Army. He served through the war in Virginia in Cabell's battery of Artillery. "I was a powder monkey," he told B. A. WHITMORE, his fellow Publishing Agent, years later. At the end of the war he went to ALABAMA where he had an opportunity to attend again the University of Georgia, where he graduated in law in 1873.

He was converted in 1874 under the preaching of the unique and colorful Simon Peter Richardson, his presiding elder, and joined the Alabama Conference. Thereafter he served Alabama pastorates "from some of the least to some of the highest"—Union Springs; Greenville; Auburn; Mobile; Montgomery; Salina were among them, and he was made the presiding elder of the Mobile and then the Montgomery districts later on in life. He was elected Publishing Agent of the M. E. Church, South, in 1903, and moving to NASHVILLE where the Publishing House was located, served in this position for thirty years.

A small man in size but with keen gray eyes, Lamar brought to his work great sagacity and understanding, both of business and of the church which he served and loved. His Conference elected him to all the GENERAL CONFERENCES of the M. E. Church, South, from 1890 to and including that of 1930. He became a man of marked influence at all sessions of this great body, and exerted enormous influence over his church. Together with B. A. Whitmore, the Publishing Agent, he helped the Publishing House of the Church develop into a great and successful institution as the years went by.

He married Martha Elsworth of Mobile on Jan. 8, 1878; and after her death married Mary U. Urquhart of Selma, Ala., on June 9, 1897. A daughter, Mrs. William M. Teague, survived her parents.

Lamar was a decided opponent of Unification that finally came about in 1939 and spoke accordingly. He continued active in the management of the Publishing House until 1932 when he formally retired. He died in Nashville, Tenn., March 27, 1933, and was buried in Montgomery, Ala. Bishop WARREN A. CANDLER wrote his memoir for the Alabama Conference and said of him, "He was an intimate and beloved friend. I do not recall that I ever heard words fall from his lips that were amiss, or deeds done by his hands that were unworthy."

LAMAR, LUCIUS QUINTUS CININNATUS (1825-1893), American senator, Supreme Court Justice, and strong Methodist layman, was born in Eatonton, Putnam County, Ga., on Sept. 1, 1825. He graduated from Emory College (Oxford, Ga.) in 1845 with the highest honors. He married the daughter of A. B. LONGSTREET, the president of Emory, and to them were born one son, L. Q. C. Jr., and three daughters. Having studied law at Macon, Ga., he was admitted to the bar in 1847, moved in 1849 to Oxford, Miss., and continued further studies as well as teaching mathematics at the University of Mississippi. The distinguished ALBERT T. BLEDSOE, then teaching philosophy at the University, later said, "I taught Lucius to think." Justice Lamar long afterward commented that there was "something in" what his old teacher said.

Lamar was elected to Congress in 1856 from MISSISSIPPI and was a member of that body at the time the Civil War broke, resigning his seat after Mississippi passed her ordinance of secession. During the War he served as a Lieutenant-Colonel in the Confederate States Army for a time and was sent by the Confederate states on a European mission. In 1872 he was again elected to Congress from Mississippi and in 1876 to the Senate. His speech in the Senate on the death of Charles Sumner was acclaimed over the nation, as it proved one of the first moves toward establishing again the brotherhood which had been broken by the terrible years of war. For if ever there was a northern champion it was Charles Sumner of Massachusetts, and if ever there was a southerner it was L. Q. C. Lamar of Mississippi. Seconding the motion to adjourn when the death of Sumner was announced in the Senate, Lamar delivered a deeply moving address which he closed by saying, "If we knew each other better, we would love each other more." For this President John F. Kennedy gave Lamar a chapter in his book Profiles in Courage.

He was put in the Cabinet in 1885 by President Cleveland, and then appointed to the Supreme Court in 1888. A constant churchman he was ever loyal to Methodism. He was one southern layman of prominence whom Bishop SIMPSON put in his Cyclopaedia.

LAMB, ELKANAH J. (1832-1915), American United Brethren missionary to Colorado and colorful Western preacher, was born Jan. 1, 1832, in Wayne County, Ind., son of Esau and Elizabeth Moon Lamb. He received a common schooling, was a cooper by trade. Lamb became acquainted with Chief Black Hawk and leaders and warriors of other Indian tribes and was wounded in border warfare in KANSAS in 1864. He was noted as a mountain climber and supervised various Rocky Mountain rescue operations. E. J. Lamb was licensed by Kansas Conference, Church of the United Brethren in Christ, in 1864 and ordained by the same Conference in 1870. He married Mrs. J. J. Morger and was father to seven children.

Lamb was appointed by the mission board to COLORADO in 1871, where he helped build the first United Brethren Church in Colorado, along the Platte River about twelve miles from DENVER. In 1872 he surveyed NEBRASKA in preparation for organizing a Nebraska Conference. He served as presiding elder in Colorado Conference several years. Lamb died at Estes Park, Apr. 7, 1915. A daughter had been murdered in a log cabin several years previously.

Religious Telescope, April 21, 1915. ROBERT R. MACCANON

LAMBERT, JEREMIAH (?-1786), was the first American Methodist itinerant appointed to serve beyond the Alleghenies, and the first Methodist preacher to be stationed in TENNESSEE. Sixty members were already in Tennessee at the time of Lambert's appointment in 1783, but nothing is known of their origin. One theory is that JOHN KING, JOHN DICKINS and Lee Roy Cole, who had labored in NORTH CAROLINA in 1777, may have also preached in Tennessee. This has not been proved, although if it were, it would not alter the fact that Lambert was the first man officially appointed to serve beyond the Alleghenies. His circuit was enormous, comprising all the settlements on the Watauga, Nolichucky and Holston Rivers. Living conditions were exceedingly primitive and the danger from the Indians was very real. Lambert's work was fruitful although not astounding, and at the next Annual Conference he reported seventy-six members, a gain of sixteen.

He served various appointments including Old St. George's in PHILADELPHIA, and in 1785 ASBURY appointed him to serve as a missionary to ANTIGUA. It is not known whether he actually reached Antigua in the West Indies, since his health broke shortly after his appointment, and he died the following year, 1786.

Lambert was a native of NEW JERSEY although the date of his birth is not known. That he was an outstanding preacher is attested by THOMAS WARE, another early Methodist itinerant, who writes, "He had in four years . . . without the parade of classical learning, or any theological training, actually attained to an eminence in the pulpit which no ordinary man could reach by the aid of any human means whatsoever . . . The graces with which he was eminently adorned were intelligence, innocence and love. . . ."

In the Conference Minutes he is spoken of as "an Elder; six years in the work; a man of sound judgment, clear understanding, good gifts, genuine piety, and very useful, humble and holy; diligent in life, and resigned in death."

FREDERICK E. MASER

LAMBETH, WILLIAM ARNOLD (1879-1952), American clergyman, was born at Thomasville, N. C., on Oct. 5, 1879. He received degrees from DUKE, Yale, and Harvard Universities, did graduate work at VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, and honorary degrees were conferred on him by three institutions.

He entered the ministry of the M. E. Church, South in 1905 and was pastor in SALISBURY, GREENSBORO, WALKERTOWN, WINSTON-SALEM, REIDSVILLE, HIGH POINT, and GASTONIA, all in the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE. From 1924 to 1930 he was pastor of Mount Vernon Place Church in WASHINGTON, D. C. He then returned to his native state and served churches in DURHAM, ASHEVILLE, and HIGH POINT, and was superintendent of the Winston-Salem District.

Lambeth was a member of the UNITING CONFERENCE at Kansas City in 1939, and of all the GENERAL and JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCES between 1938 and 1948. In 1936 the COLLEGE of BISHOPS of the M. E. Church, South asked him to conduct a campaign to pay the indebtedness of $100,000 on the LAKE JUNALUSKA ASSEMBLY. This he did, and the Assembly was accepted by the General Conference in 1938 as an institution of the church. Lambeth then became its president, superintendent, and treasurer (without salary), a position which he held until 1944. He then became superintendent of the Greensboro District, where he served until he retired in 1949. He died at Morehead City, N. C., on Nov. 20, 1952.

LAMBUTH, JAMES WILLIAM (1830-1892), American missionary and father of the more famous Bishop WALTER R. LAMBUTH, was born in Louisiana on March 2, 1830, but was reared in Madison County, Miss. His grandfather, William Lambuth, was born in Hanover County, Va., and was sent by BISHOP ASBURY in 1800 as a missionary to the Indians in TENNESSEE; he died at Fountain Head in that state in 1837. His son, John Russell Lambuth, was born at Fountain Head in 1800 and volunteered as a missionary to the Indians in LOUISIANA.

The family moved early to Louisiana. James graduated from the University of Mississippi in 1851 and began to preach among the Negroes. In 1854 he was sent to CHINA to aid in establishing the mission of the M. E. Church, South, in Shanghai. At the outbreak of the Civil War, he returned to MISSISSIPPI but went back to China in 1864. In 1886 he and his son, Walter, went to JAPAN and formed the Southern Methodist mission there. He died at Kobe, Japan, on April 28, 1892.

WALTER R. LAMBUTH

LAMBUTH, WALTER RUSSELL (1854-1921), American missionary and bishop of the M. E. Church, South, was born in Shanghai, China, on Nov. 10, 1854, the son of missionary parents, JAMES WILLIAM and Mary Isabella (McClellan) LAMBUTH. In 1859 he was sent to his relatives in TENNESSEE and MISSISSIPPI for his early education. His parents returned during the Civil War, and the son went back to CHINA with them in 1864 and remained five years.

He graduated from EMORY AND HENRY COLLEGE in 1875, studied theology and medicine at VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY and received a medical degree. In 1877 he was ordained an elder in the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE and was sent to China, where he worked in Shanghai and adjacent areas. He returned on furlough in 1881 and studied at Bellevue Hospital Medical College in New York and received a second degree of Doctor of Medicine.

He returned to China in 1882 and organized medical and hospital service at Soochow and Peking. In 1885 with his father he founded the JAPAN Mission of his Church and established the notable Kwansei Gakuin and the Hiroshima Girls' School.

In 1891 he was assigned to field service in the United States and editor of the Methodist Review of Missions, and in 1894 he was elected General Secretary of the Board of Missions with headquarters at Nashville, Tenn. In this capacity he helped in uniting Methodism in Canada and forming the autonomous Japan Methodist Church, a union of all Methodist bodies working in that field.

Lambuth was elected bishop by the M. E. Church, South in 1910 and was assigned to BRAZIL. In the same year the Board of Missions projected a mission in Africa and in 1911 Lambuth, accompanied by JOHN W. GILBERT of PAINE COLLEGE and a leader in the C.M.E. Church, went to that continent; they travelled 2,600 miles by boat and rail and 1,500 miles on foot through the jungles to the village of WEMBO NYAMA in the Belgian Congo, where their cordial reception by Chief Wembo Nyama convinced Lambuth that he had been providentially led to the Batetela tribe, and he proceeded to arrange for a mission. He was away from home a year or more and on his return he recruited a group of missionaries which he took to the CONGO in 1913. For his travels through Africa he was made a Fellow of the Royal Geographic Society at London.

During World War I he went to Europe and visited the front and made arrangements for establishing Southern Methodism in BELGIUM, POLAND, and CZECHOSLOVAKIA. In 1921 he took a party of missionaries to Siberia and founded a mission there, but it met opposition and was of short duration. He served briefly on the Pacific Coast and for a period resided at Oakdale, Calif.

Bishop Lambuth participated in the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCES, the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE, and other movements involving the cooperation of the churches. He was the author of three books on medical missions, the Orient, and the missionary movement. He died at Yokohama, Japan, on Sept. 26, 1921, and his ashes were buried by the side of his mother in Shanghai. He is rightly considered to be one of the great missionary leaders of Methodism.

LAMBUTH COLLEGE, Jackson, Tennessee, is a continuation and expansion of Memphis Conference Female Institute which was established in 1843. It became a coeducational school in 1923, when its name was changed to Lambuth College honoring Bishop WALTER RUSSELL LAMBUTH, whose death had occurred two years before.

In 1939, at the time of Union, it lacked accreditation and its total properties were valued at $225,100. Today the buildings and grounds are valued at almost $7,000,000. The college is in a period of academic growth and enrichment. It offers the B.A. and B.S. degrees. The governing board has twenty-eight members elected by the MEMPHIS ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

LA MESA, CALIFORNIA, U.S.A. First Church was organized in 1895 at a small resort called La Mesa Springs. This is Spanish for "the table," inasmuch as it was upon the tableland of the little town of SAN DIEGO. The church gives witness of having the greatest mission outreach of the entire SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA-ARIZONA CONFERENCE. In the current budget of the church, over forty percent of all funds received are designated for various mission concerns.

The church grew slowly, but since the influx of the huge population movement to the southwest part of the nation, the whole community has increased remarkably. The church grew toward 1,000 members during World War II, with the tremendous number of service personnel, particularly from the United States Navy, living in the area. By 1950 its membership had passed the thousand mark, and eight years later had doubled. It reached 2,500 in 1962. The growth toward a truly significant church was accelerated in 1956, when a Spanish styled sanctuary was built, of the classic style appropriate to the history and culture of the region. This sanctuary greatly appealed to the community, and the church rapidly enlarged all areas of its life.

The mission emphasis for which the church is noted, had its origin in the needs of the Mexican people in the town of Tijuana, some thirty-five miles distant across the border to the south. Responding to the recognition of the need, there was organized in the '30's a Settlement House called Casa de Todas (House for All), with First Church the motivating factor. By 1961, Casa de Todas had grown into a group of buildings: chapel, hospital, clinic, a social welfare center and school. A "person to person" type of Christian fellowship has developed, with over 120 families "adopting" families south of the border, and sharing friendship and concern with them.

This international mission concern has expressed itself in other Tijuana projects: Casa de Esperanza (House of Hope), an orphanage for double orphans which has found its chief support from the La Mesa Church; Project Amigos (Friends), a social welfare center of which the Church is a major supporter, including the support of the Laubach Literacy Director for Baja California (State of Lower California); and Bethel Methodist Church in Tijuana, La Mesa again being a major supporter. The Mission outreach is not limited to "south of the border." The Church is supporting missionaries in PERU, where it also built a high school building, in ARGENTINA and Africa, with a deep involvement in Ludhiana Medical School in INDIA, where a building was given.

In 1952 La Mesa Methodist Church, mindful of its own community needs, commissioned nearly ten percent of its active worshiping members to become charter members of the new adjacent San Carlos Methodist Church, and gave a $71,000 gift of land to the new congregation. The church currently has a staff of three full-time ministers and a membership of 2,308.

LAZARUS LAMILAMI

LAMILAMI, LAZARUS, the first ordained Australian Aboriginal minister. He was one of the earlier Aboriginal converts after the establishment of a mission in Arnhem Land by the Methodist Church of Australasia. With headquarters in Darwin, the North Australia district included five mission stations, at Milingimbi, Yirrkala, Elcho Island, Croker Island and Goulburn Island.

It was at Goulburn Island's small but picturesque church in November 1966, that Lazarus Lamilami was ordained as the first Australian Aboriginal minister. He thus serves his own people who have known only European, Fijian, Tongan, Chinese and Rotuman missionaries as their spiritual leaders in the past.

For the past twenty years Lazarus has worked and preached among his fellows and has travelled widely throughout Australia on missionary deputation, making a great impact on his audiences. He became the first Aboriginal Christian pastor and submitted himself to special study and intense preparation to ready himself for the unique and historic day of his ordination.

LAMPARD, JOHN (1859-1935), a one-time associate of General WILLIAM BOOTH in the Salvation Army, founded an independent mission among the Gonds in a village in the Satpura Hills of Balaghat, Central Provinces, INDIA. He began his work as a bachelor. He wore the simplest of village-style clothes and lived for four years in a two-room mud hut with a grass roof.

In a famine in 1897, many orphans came to the mission. Seven other European missionaries joined him and his wife. In 1906, the missionaries decided that the interests of the work required integration in a church. They asked the Methodist Church to take over from them. The Rev. and Mrs. John Lampard and the Rev. and Mrs. Thomas Williams joined the Methodist Church and became missionaries of the Board of Missions. The small school of the independent mission has developed into a coeducational middle school and has produced many leaders of the church and servants of the people.

Lampard later rendered distinguished service in Baroda State, where he became a friend of the Gaekwar (Ruler) and influenced state policy on questions related to the civil rights of Christians and the responsibilities of the state to promote the welfare of its citizens.

LAMPE, JOHN FREDERICK (1703-1751), was a musician and a friend of Handel. Lampe was born in Saxony, GERMANY, but settled in England in 1726 and was associated with Handel at Covent Garden, London, as a bassoonist and composer. Lampe came under the influence of the Wesleys on Nov. 29, 1745, and was converted from Deism. In 1746 his tunes for CHARLES WESLEY's hymns were published in Hymns on the Great Festivals and Other Occasions. From 1748-51 he was in DUBLIN, and there produced A Collection of Hymns and Sacred Poems (1749). He died in Edinburgh, SCOTLAND. The Wesleys thought highly of his music, and Charles Wesley wrote an ode in memory of him. Two of Lampe's tunes are still in the British Methodist hymnbook.

LAMPOUGH, EDMUND SYKES (1860-1940), a British Methodist layman, was an underwriter at Lloyd's. He was born on April 6, 1860, at Islington, London, and made his career at Lloyd's, of which he became deputy chairman. For thirty-three years he was a member of the committee of the Wesleyan METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY, and became its treasurer and then president of the Laymen's Missionary Movement. With JOHN H. RITSON he was treasurer of the Theological Institution. President of the WESLEY HISTORICAL SOCIETY from 1937-40, Lampough discovered 162 original letters of JOHN WESLEY, preserved many Wesleyan relics and buildings, and established Wesleyan memorials. A keen musician, he served on the committee for the Methodist hymnbook. He was vice-president of the BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY, and vice-president of the Methodist Conference in 1935. He died on Oct. 20, 1940.

LAMPTON, EDWARD WILKINSON (1857-1910), an American bishop of the A.M.E. Church, was born in Hopkinsville, Ky., on Oct. 21, 1857. His education was self-acquired. He was admitted to the North Mississippi Annual Conference in 1886, ordained deacon in 1886 and elder in 1888. He held pastorates in KENTUCKY and MISSISSIPPI. He was presiding elder in Mississippi. He served as a General Officer (Financial Secretary) from 1902-1908, and was elected bishop in 1908 and died in 1910. He was the author of two books: Analysis of Baptism and Digest of Decisions of the Bishops of the A.M.E. Church.

LAMSON, BYRON S. (1901-), an American Free Methodist minister and ordained elder of the Central Illinois Conference and editor of The Free Methodist, was born at Boone, Iowa. His degrees are: A.B., GREENVILLE COLLEGE, Ill.; M.A., University of Southern Calif.; graduate studies, University of Rochester; NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY; GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE, D.D., SEATTLE PACIFIC; Litt.D., Los Angeles Pacific. He served as pastor of churches in California and Illinois, and was Dean, 1927-30, and President, 1930-39, of Los Angeles Pacific College. He was General Missionary Secretary, 1944-64, and became editor of The Free Methodist in 1964.

While pastor of the college church, Greenville, Ill., Lamson was elected General Missionary Secretary. He served in this capacity for twenty years, has visited the overseas churches in Asia, Africa, and Latin America. The mission church membership increased from less than 9,000 to over 50,000 during this time, and many mission fields became regular conferences. General Conferences were established in EGYPT and JAPAN. The Free Methodist World Fellowship was organized under Dr. Lamson's leadership.

After serving as editor of The Free Methodist since 1964 and becoming eligible for retirement in June 1969, the denomination's Board of Administration requested him to continue as editor until June 30, 1970, with the title of "Acting Editor." Under his editorship, The Free Methodist (circulation 100,000) celebrated in 1967 its one hundred years of service with a special anniversary issue. Included were special greetings from the President, the Prime Minister of Canada, editors of church publications and many denominational leaders.

Dr. Lamson has written Holiness Teachings of Jesus; Modern Prayer Miracles; Venture; To Catch the Tide. He serves as chairman of the Committee on Research for Church Growth. He is the editor of the FREE METHODIST CHURCH material in this Encyclopedia of World Methodism. Dr. and Mrs. Lamson reside at Winona Lake, Ind.

LANAHAN, JOHN (1815-1903), an American minister and BOOK AGENT of the BOOK CONCERN of the M. E. Church, was born at Harrisonburg, Va., in 1815. His parents were Roman Catholic, but of liberal tendencies, and they allowed their children to attend Protestant churches. He was converted at eighteen years of age and received on trial of the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE in 1838. He served prominent appointments, including the district superintendency and proved popular as a man and as a preacher. He is said to have been of commanding presence and always enlisted the undivided attention of his Conference when he rose to speak.

When the Civil War came, Lanahan continued to adhere to the section of the Baltimore Conference which remained with the M. E. Church, although most of his brethren adhered to the M. E. Church, South, they eventually becoming the "Old Baltimore." Lanahan supported Bishop SIMPSON in his bringing pressure on President Lincoln to appoint more Methodists into the offices of government. He was elected in 1860 to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of that year as an alternate, but took the place of Thomas Sewell who was not present. At the General Conference of 1868, he was elected as one of the Agents of the New York Book Concern and acted in that capacity for four years. He continued to be elected by his Annual Conference to the General Conference of his Church, serving in every one from 1868 to 1900. He died on Dec. 8, 1903, in Baltimore, Md.

LANCASTER, JAMES PRESTON (1877-1963), missionary to CUBA and MEXICO, was born on March 1, 1877, in Troup County, Ga., U.S.A. He attended Lafayette College, in Lafayette, Ala., and later enrolled in Roanoke Normal College in Roanoke, Ala.

In May 1900, he received his first license to preach from the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE. In November 1901 he joined the North Alabama Conference of the M. E. Church, South, and was assigned to the Miller-ville Circuit which included seven churches.

In 1904 he was appointed by the BOARD OF MISSIONS (MECS) to La Gloria, Cuba, where he was to take charge of the English work. In 1908 he was appointed by Bishop Candler as Director of the school Colegio Ingles in Camaguey, Cuba. He married Elsie Whipple in 1908 in Camaguey and five children were born of this union.

In 1910 his health broke in Cuba and he and his family returned to the United States and went to COLORADO. At the Denver Conference (1910), he was appointed to Trinidad, Colo. In 1912, Bishop HENDRIX appointed him to the English work at Torreon, Mexico and he became a member of the Mexican Conference.

In 1914, due to political unrest in Mexico, Bishop Candler again appointed him to the church in La Gloria, Cuba. In 1918 he was allocated by the Mission Board to the Women's Council to work as Director of Palmore College, Chihuahua, Mexico.

In 1921 he accepted the leadership of the Mexican work in TEXAS and NEW MEXICO and in 1927 he left the Spanish work and became a member of the New MEXICO CONFERENCE, where his membership remained until his retirement in 1949.

In 1952 he became pastor of the Chadbourn Spanish Gospel Mission in Colorado Springs, Colo., a pastorate he held until his death in October 1963. His name was included in the memorial service of the New Mexico Conference Annual Meeting in 1964.

LANCASTER, OHIO, U.S.A. First Church owes its origin to a group of Methodists who met in a log cabin, the home of Edward Teal, to hear JAMES QUINN preach in 1799. Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY is said to have been a personal friend of Edward Teal, and visited there many times previous to the forming of the permanent organization which took place in 1812. The Methodist Society (not yet an organized church) was one of the first religious groups to hold meetings in this area, and had been meeting for nearly three years before the town of Lancaster came into being in 1801. However, the records indicate that the group had met in various cabins, and in the open, until 1812, when they organized themselves into a Methodist church, and built the first log cabin church.

The present church building is the third constructed by this congregation. It is located about two city blocks from the original first church location. It was built in 1905-07, and extensively remodeled and expanded into a much larger structure in 1950-51. The church membership had grown to 3,000 members by the year of its Sesquicentennial Celebration in 1962. The present buildings, grounds and parking areas cover about one-fourth of a city block and are located just one block from the center of the city. The congregation numbered 3,111 in 1970.

GEORGE W. HERD

LANCASTER, PENNSYLVANIA, U.S.A. First Church is one of the leading churches of the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE, and, through the years, has been one of the most influential Methodist churches in and about Lancaster. Its early preachers extended Methodism as far as POTTSVILLE in the anthracite area.

The first Methodist sermon was probably preached in Lancaster by JOSEPH PILMORE in the Old Court House in Center Square on June 2, 1772. Later a class was formed, but it eventually died out and for some years there was no Methodist preaching in Lancaster. MATTHEW SIMPSON says that HENRY BOEHM conducted a Methodist service in Lancaster in 1803, preaching in the market-house from a butcher's block.

In 1807, WILLIAM HUNTER and Henry Boehm were assigned as missionaries to that part of PENNSYLVANIA lying between the Delaware and Schuylkill Rivers, and FRANCIS ASBURY requested Boehm to translate the Discipline into German for the large German population in this area. On one occasion when Boehm was proof-reading the German Discipline, he was forced to remain in Lancaster overnight because of a heavy rain. He called upon a Philip Benedict whom he had heard about from a Methodist woman in Lancaster who felt Benedict was desirous of becoming a Methodist. Boehm had a satisfactory interview with Benedict and his wife, and on Oct. 14, 1807, when Boehm next came to the city, he formed a class of six members consisting of Benedict, his wife and four others. The home of the Benedicts on 125 or 129 Duke Street then became a regular Methodist preaching place.

The class grew, larger quarters were needed, and a property was secured and a building erected on Walnut and Christian Streets. It was dedicated Dec. 17, 1809. Growth for a time was slow. Originally on the Lancaster Circuit, the church was made a single station in 1811 with THOMAS WARE as pastor; but it was again placed on a circuit the following year, not becoming a separate station permanently until 1828.

In 1842 a new building was erected on Duke Street below Walnut, and it was dedicated Sept. 4 of that year. Although now heavily in debt, the church assisted in the building of another Methodist Church in Lancaster, St. Paul's on Queen Street. By 1855 First Church had grown to such proportions that a session of the Philadelphia Annual Conference was held there with Bishop BEVERLY WAUGH presiding.

The church gave increased impetus to the expansion of Methodism in Lancaster, building a mission which later became Western Church. In a real sense First Church became the mother church of Lancaster city, and the Lancaster area, either directly or indirectly assisting in the founding and growth of many of the Methodist churches. As the church continued to grow, larger quarters became increasingly necessary, and in 1889 the present Church edifice was begun. It was completed at a cost of $87,000 and was dedicated by Bishop CHARLES H. FOWLER June 12, 1892. In subsequent years renovating and expansion programs added to the practicality and beauty of this mother church of Lancaster.

In 1970 First Church reported 1,307 members, property valued at $1,550,715, and $132,834 raised for all purposes.

LANCE, JOSEPH R. (1925-), pastor, chaplain, Indian bishop, was born on Oct. 15, 1925, at Meerut, U.P., India. His father, Rockwell Lance of Rajasthan India, served in the former Delhi Conference and retired as district superintendent of the Roorkee. Educated at the Ingraham Institute in Ghaziabad and at Parker High School, Moradabad, Joseph Lance studied at LUCKNOW CHRISTIAN COLLEGE, India, (A.B., 1948); GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY (Crusade Scholar), A.M., B.D., 1956. Ordained deacon in 1944, he began his ministry as chaplain of the Madar Union Sanatorium near Ajmer, India. While here he married Sushila Sentu, a post-graduate nurse, the daughter of a United Presbyterian minister. After studying in America, 1953-56, he returned to Madar in 1956. Then he moved to Delhi as pastor of Christ Methodist Church (1,200 members), 1957-66. In 1966 he was appointed executive secretary of the Council of Christian Social Concerns covering the whole of The Methodist Church in India. An effective preacher in English and Hindustani, he was a delegate to the General Conference (TMC) in 1964; attended the Asia Consultation at Port Dickson, Malaya; and the Assembly of the East Asia Conference at Singapore. He went to the United States as a member of the Mission to America team in 1966, and toured widely for five months, speaking in various churches. In September 1968, Lance and the Council on Social Concerns sponsored a major conference of ministers and laymen in New Delhi dealing with the place of the foreign missionary in India. From the conference came a recommendation that there be more "Indianization" of church personnel, and that invitations to new foreign missionaries be based "on local needs for specialists and experts." At forty-four years of age, Joseph R. Lance was elected bishop on the second ballot on Jan. 2, 1969, at the Southern Asia Central Conference, Bangalore, India. He was assigned to the Lucknow Area.

LANDER, JOHN MCPHERSON (1858-1924), an American preacher, educator, and missionary to BRAZIL, was born in Lincolnton, N. C., on Dec. 17, 1858. He was the son and grandson of Methodist preachers. He graduated from WOFFORD COLLEGE in 1879. Desirous of becoming a missionary to CHINA (as China was in those early days the "dramatic" and desirable mission field), he went to VANDERBILT where he spent two years studying in the medical and theological departments. On Jan. 14, 1886, he married Thompson Hall.

He taught two years at Williamston Female College in SOUTH CAROLINA, and while there was approached by Bishop J. C. GRANBERY, who was trying to find an educator to start a school for boys in JUIZ DE FORA, Brazil.

Lander accepted the call, and with his wife and first child, Laura, sailed for Brazil in June 1889. The voyage was dangerous because of a fire on board and consumed thirty-three days. They arrived, however, in time for Lander to be received into the annual conference on July 7, 1889. He was appointed at once to found the school; and since he did not know the language, J. W. Wollong was sent as his associate. Total equipment seems to have been a blackboard and box of chalk. Lander remained some twelve years at Granbery (now called INSTITUTO GRANBERY) and established it on a sound basis. He also served as pastor of several churches, presiding elder, editor of the official church paper Expositor Cristão and agent of the publishing house. In all his work, especially at Granbery, Mrs. Lander was a devoted helper, teaching most of the time. In 1903, Lander received a D.D. degree from Wofford College.

Illness beset the last years of his life, and he died in the Palmyra Sanatorium, Minas Gerais, on March 20, 1924.

LANDER, SAMUEL (1833-1904), American clergyman-educator, was born in Lincoln, N. C., on Jan. 30, 1833. A graduate of RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE, Va., he taught in various schools, served as president of DAVENPORT FEMALE COLLEGE in NORTH CAROLINA, and in 1861 was licensed to preach. In 1864 he was admitted on trial into the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE, M. E. Church, South.

As pastor of the Williamston, S. C., circuit, 1872, he was led to establish the Williamston Female College, and remained the head of the institution until his death, July 14, 1904. Previously that year the college had moved to Greenwood, S. C. It was renamed for its founder, Lander College, and from 1906 to 1948 was owned and operated by the Methodist Conference (MES and subsequently The Methodist Church, SEJ). Lander College now, through offer of the Conference in 1948, is owned and operated by the community of Greenwood.

Lander was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1890 and 1894.

Samuel Lander was married to Laura A. McPherson on Dec. 20, 1853. They were the parents of eleven children, nine of whom lived to useful adulthood, namely: Martha (Mrs. George E. Prince), John, William Tertius, Angus, Neil, Kathleen (Mrs. John O. Willson), Malcolm, Frank, and Ernest. Tertius and Frank became physicians in Williamston; Kathleen became the wife of the Rev. John O. Willson, D.D., who succeeded Lander as president of Lander College. John became a missionary to BRAZIL and founder of Granbery College there.

LANDER COLLEGE, Greenwood, South Carolina, for more than seventy-five years a Methodist college, was founded by SAMUEL LANDER (1833-1904) at Williamston, S. C., on Feb. 12, 1872, as Williamston Female College. In 1904 it was moved to Greenwood and named Lander, honoring its founder.

The college was offered to the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South, in 1898 as a part of its educational system, and in 1906 it came under the jurisdiction of the conference. It continued this relationship until 1948, when the South Carolina Conference voted to deed the college to the Greenwood County Education Commission in order to concentrate support on COLUMBIA and WOFFORD COLLEGES.

Serving as president of the college during its church-related period were: Samuel Lander (1872-1904); John O. Willson (1904-23); Robert O. Lawton, acting president (1923); B. Rhett Turnipseed (1923-27); R. H. Bennett (1927-32); John W. Speake (1932-41); JOHN MARVIN RAST (1941-48).

LANDON, ALFRED MOSSMAN (1887-), American layman, governor, and presidential candidate, was born at West Middlesex, Pa., on Sept. 9, 1887. He was educated at Marietta Academy in Ohio, and graduated in law from the University of Kansas in 1908. He received the honorary LL.D. degree from Washburn and Marietta Colleges and BOSTON UNIVERSITY and the LL.D. from Kansas State University.

Removing to KANSAS in young manhood, he was employed in a bank at Independence until 1912, after which he was an oil producer and operator of radio broadcasting stations. He was an officer in the Chemical Warfare Service of the U.S. Army during World War I.

Mr. Landon was chairman of the Republican State Central Committee in Kansas and in 1932 he was elected governor of the state and served two terms. In 1936 he was the Republican nominee for President of the United States, losing to Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Long active in Methodist affairs, he was a member of the KANSAS CONFERENCE delegation of the M. E. Church at the Uniting Conference of 1939. He was elected chairman of the important committee on Publishing Interests of that Conference and helped formulate the legislation which correlated the publishing work of the three Methodist Churches then merging into The Methodist Church. He resides in Topeka, Kansas.

LANDSDALE, PENNSYLVANIA, U.S.A. Bethel Hill Church, located on Skippack Pike and Bethel Road, is the successor church to and is erected very near the site of the first chapel used by the Methodists in PENNSYLVANIA outside of PHILADELPHIA. JOSEPH PILMORE in various places in his Journal wrote of preaching at Metchin (now Bethel Hill). On Oct. 13, 1770 he wrote, "Mr. Edward Evans and I set out in the morning for Metchin—a place about 20 miles from the city, to open a new Chapel which had been built by a few persons who loved the Redeemer, and wished to advance His Kingdom in the World." The ground on which the chapel was built was the gift of Hance Supplee who donated also an adjoining lot for a cemetery.

During the Revolutionary War Washington's Army was twice encamped in the general region of the church, and in October 1777, several of Washington's officers were quartered with Abraham Supplee, a local preacher and son of Hance Supplee. Following the Battle of Germantown the chapel was used as a temporary hospital for the wounded, and about thirty Revolutionary War Veterans are buried in the cemetery.

The chapel at first was not under the care of any particular denomination. In the year 1782, however, it was regularly organized under the Methodists. In January of that year the ground and buildings upon it were deeded by David Wagener and his wife to John Tyson, Andrew Supplee, Samuel Castner, Christopher Zimmerman, Abraham Supplee and Benjamin Tyson for the sum of five shillings. The deed further states it was for them or their heirs "... or any that shall hereafter become members of that Society forever for the Special use of that Society called the Methodist for a worship house and Burying place for the only use of that Society or such whom they of that Society (sic) or belonging to that meeting or that may at any time become members of that Society shall tolerate to preach or allow to hold worship in . . ."

The church was used until 1845 when the present building of stone and brick was erected on ground given by Samuel Supplee adjacent to the original church. A new front was added to the church in 1904 and two years later the original building was torn down.

For many years the size of the church and congregation remained static, but recently, with the movement of many persons to the suburbs, the church has been slowly growing. The church building has been renovated, and an educational unit and a new parsonage have been added. The present Bethel Hill Church is in possession of the original deed quoted above.

LANE, GEORGE (1842-1904), Australian minister and conference president, was born at Hitchin, England, on July 31, 1842. He was the son of a Baptist minister and with his parents came to New South Wales, AUSTRALIA when twelve years of age. While still young he was led, under the ministry of JOHN WATSFORD, to dedicate his life to Christ. He offered himself as a candidate for the Methodist ministry in 1864, and was accepted.

His gifts as preacher and administrator soon attracted the attention of the Conference, and in 1883 he was appointed Secretary of the Home Mission Society—a position he held for six years. He subsequently administered the property affairs of the Church for several years, and his business acumen and abundant energy won for him the confidence of all who were associated with him. He was twice elected President of the General Conference and throughout the whole of his career he was held in the highest esteem by the Methodist people in general.

He took a prominent part in uniting the Wesleyan, the PRIMITIVE METHODIST and the UNITED FREE METHODIST CHURCHES at the beginning of the century, and in all he did he exhibited a fraternal and humble spirit. Every gift he possessed he placed at the disposal of the Master whom he served with unflagging zeal, and great efficiency to the end.

Toward the close of his life the University of Victoria in Canada conferred on him the D.D. degree.

LANE, ISAAC (1834-1937), American bishop of the C.M.E. Church, was born a slave on March 3, 1834, five miles north of Jackson, Tenn. He joined the M. E. Church, South on Oct. 21, 1854. Licensed to exhort in November of 1856, he received a license to preach shortly thereafter. In 1866, he was ordained deacon and elder by the newly formed Tennessee, North Alabama, and North Mississippi Annual Conference. At the same meeting of the Conference, he was appointed presiding elder of the Jackson

District and served in that capacity until 1870. Then, he was appointed minister of Liberty Church in JACKSON, Tenn., the "Mother Church" of his denomination, and elected as a delegate to the first General Conference of the C.M.E. Church. At the General Conference of 1873, he was elected to the office of bishop.

Deprived of a formal education himself, he received what he had by his own hard work. He had a great interest in the education of his race and founded LANE COLLEGE in Jackson, Tenn., which bears his name. As a bishop, he was a leader in church expansion and promoted the taking of the church to his people as they moved into the north and west.

Bishop Lane served until 1914 when he was granted release from administrative duties upon his request. He died on Dec. 5, 1937.

LANE COLLEGE, JACKSON, Tennessee, an institution of the C.M.E. Church, was founded in 1882 by Bishop ISAAC LANE. The name Lane Institute was adopted in 1883, but the present name of Lane College was adopted in 1895, when the institution offered its first instructional program at the college level. The college has a four-year undergraduate program in the liberal arts, and offers B.A. and B.S. degrees.

The governing board is made up of eighteen members elected by the board upon nomination by sponsoring conferences of the C.M.E. Church. Each member serves a three-year term.

Lane College statistics are as follows: library, 40,989 volumes; total enrollment, 1,034; number of foreign students, nine; total faculty, forty-nine; campus acreage, forty-two; number of buildings, seventeen; value of physical plant, $2,985,242; endowment, book value, $378,487; market value, $3,600,000; current income, $2,004,314; current expenditures, $1,880,958.

LANGDALE, JOHN WILLIAM (1874-1940), American minister and Book Editor of the M. E. Church, was born in Newcastle, England, on Aug. 14, 1874, of American and English parentage. He was naturalized by his father's citizenship, being the son of John Wilkenson and Annie (Walton) Langdale, and was brought to the United States in his infancy. He received the B.A. degree from Wesleyan University, Conn. 1903, its D.D. in 1914, and also studied at the Boston University School of Theology and at Harvard. His wife was Alice Belle Barnatt of Crafton, Pa., whom he married on Jan. 10, 1905.

In 1905, he entered the Methodist ministry and became pastor of Meyersdale, Pa., 1905-08; Beaver, Pa., 1908-12; Avondale Church, Cincinnati, Ohio, 1912-16; New York Avenue Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., 1916-25; at which time he became the superintendent of the Brooklyn South District. He served as district superintendent 1925-28, when he was elected Book Editor of the M. E. Church, and in this office exercised great influence and gave decided general leadership to his Church in many ways. He was a member of the executive committee of the Board of Foreign Missions, a director of the Brooklyn Federation of Churches, and chairman of the committee on policy of the Federal Council of Churches, the chairman of the Commission on the Revision of the Ritual, which revision he presented to the General Conference of 1932. He served on the Joint Hymnal Commission of 1930-34, as its secretary, and took a place of acknowledged leadership in the revision of the Hymnal, as well as in that of the Responsive Readings in the Hymnal which were reworked at that time.

A large genial man with a passion for details and with an avid interest in all Church-wide moves and affairs, Langdale enjoyed great popularity and the abiding affection of his brethren. He was the founder and first editor of Religion in Life. This Journal was begun by him with an interdenominational outreach designed to take the place of the old Quarterly Review which had gone out of existence. It has since been continued as an official publication of the Church.

His health became greatly impaired after a time and shortly after the reorganization of the Methodist Publishing interests at Church union, he died in the Brooklyn Methodist Hospital on Dec. 10, 1940. His funeral was conducted by Bishop Francis J. McConnell in the New York Avenue Church in Brooklyn, and a large representation of ministers from the entire New York area was present to do him honor.

LANIUS, JACOB (1814-1851), American minister and leader in Missouri Methodism, was born at Fincastle, Va., Jan. 9, 1814. His parents moved to Potosi, Washington County, Mo., when he was a child. The elder Lanius was a saddlemaker and the boy learned the trade. At fourteen Jacob joined the Methodist Church in Potosi, and soon felt called to preach. He was licensed to preach Aug. 20, 1831, and was admitted to the Missouri Conference on trial that fall at Jackson. He was ordained DEACON by Bishop Josiua Soule in 1833, and elder by Bishop Robert R. Roberts in 1835. His appointments were as follows: 1831, Bowling Green Circuit, junior preacher; 1832, St. Charles Circuit, junior preacher; 1833, Paris Circuit; 1834, Richmond Circuit; 1835, Meramec Circuit; 1836-1837, Belleview Circuit; 1838, Springfield District; 1839-1840, Cape Girardeau District; 1841-1842,

In 1833, Lanius started keeping a journal on loose sheets of paper, and apparently continued it the rest of his life. The journal shows that as a young preacher Lanius was dedicated, devout, popular, humble, studious, and successful. There are constant references to books which he was reading. At twenty he wrote, "I am convinced . . . that . . . education is too much neglected by the ministry." He refers frequently to "flattery" and prays that his head will not be turned by the words of commendation which he hears. He was a good revival preacher, and rejoiced when the saints shouted and the sinners came to the mourners' bench. He expected the church to be built up under his ministry, and if there were no conversions and no additions to the church, he felt that he had failed. Because he did not win a convert or a new member during his first year at Palmyra, he insisted in all seriousness that he ought to move. But the people asked for his return and the bishop reapportioned him for a second year.

Lanuis' health became impaired when he was about twenty-five, and on occasion he was incapacitated for weeks at a time. Notwithstanding physical weakness, he persevered with diligence and zeal, and his reputation as a preacher and a leader in the conference grew. He was a delegate to the General Conference (MES) of 1850.

In the 1830's Lanius sensed the growing tension in Methodism over slavery. In 1837 he noted in his journal that the Methodist preachers of the north and the south had apparently come to think of themselves as members of different ecclesiastical bodies. He deplored the situation and said he favored sending southern preachers north and northern preachers south; he believed "this would prevent local interest and selfish feelings from entering the ministry." He felt that the preservation of "ministerial peace and harmony" was essential for the cause of Christ. As early as 1834 Lanius resolved "to pay more attention to the slave population than I have hitherto done," though he said he knew that would not be popular with the white people. When the division of the church came in 1844, Lanius adhered to the south.

Lanius died in 1851 at thirty-seven years of age, leaving a wife and several children. For decades afterward his memory was green in Missouri Methodism. D. R. McANALLY, Editor of the St. Louis Christian Advocate, said in 1881 that Lanius "became eminent among the eminent in the Missouri work." W. S. Woodard in Annals of Missouri Methodism said in 1893, "Missouri has produced many faithful heralds of the cross, but probably no one who was more deeply consecrated to his work nor successful in it than Jacob Lanius. . . . He was one of the most successful preachers that ever traveled in Missouri."

L'ANSE, MICHIGAN, U.S.A., is situated on the south shore of Keweenaw Bay, which is formed by the Keweenaw Peninsula, a strip of land jutting sixty-five to seventy miles in a northeasterly direction into Lake Superior. This area receives its name from the Indian word "Ke-wa-we-non" which means "carrying place or portage."

Into this area in the year 1834 came the young Daniel M. Chandler from NEW YORK State, who had received and responded to a call to minister to the Chippewa Indians of the Upper Peninsula of the MICHIGAN Territory. The way had been prepared for him by Elder John Sunday, a Chippewa evangelist who had come into this region two years before from the missions of upper CANADA. A log cabin was purchased from a trader of the American Fur Company and it served D. M. Chandler as a dwelling house, school and church. Soon the young missionary was teaching thirteen or more Indian children in the kitchen.

Thus begins the history of the Methodist Church at L'Anse. Chandler was a beloved missionary who found an early grave due to overexertion and exposure. Others followed his pattern of devotion. The experiences of JOHN PITEZEL, who came to this mission in 1844, are written very interestingly in his book, Lights and Shades of Missionary Life. Peter Marksman, one of the early preachers, a Chippewa convert, is among the names to be remembered. He is buried in the local cemetery. Kewawenon was a flourishing Indian mission for many years; in 1844 it reported sixty-five members.

In 1873 a Methodist church was built at L'Anse. This building is still standing but is no longer being used for worship. In 1879 a Methodist Society was founded at Pequaming, ten miles away, the same year that the village was organized. The Ke-wa-we-non mission was coupled with this congregation. This became the site of the Indian CAMP MEETINGS where services were held for two weeks each year for many years. Later the camp meetings were transferred to grounds closer to L'Anse. A church was built at Pequaming which was later to become the building for worship at L'Anse.

Soon after the Ford Motor Company moved out of Pequaming the town was abandoned and is now a ghost town. The church building was moved to L'Anse, it was covered with native stone and an addition was built on. This is the building where the L'Anse congregation now worships. In 1964 a small educational wing was added. After the Pequaming congregation merged with the L'Anse congregation, the Baraga Methodist Church, located on the west side of Keweenaw Bay, was added to the charge. The present charge includes L'Anse and Baraga Methodist Churches and the Zeba (Ke-wa-we-non) Mission.

LANSING, MICHIGAN, U.S.A., was named by settlers from Lansing, New York, who built the first house in Lansing, Mich., in 1843. The settlement was located at the confluence of Grand and Red Cedar Rivers, and was chartered as a city in 1859. It is now the capital of MICHIGAN.

Lewis Coburn preached the first Methodist sermon there in the log house of Joab Page, a Justice of the Peace who lived in "Lower Town," now North Lansing. Page became the first leader. The first meeting was held in 1845, and the first society was organized in 1846. F. A. Blade was pastor from 1847 to 1848, and preached on April 7, 1847 to sixty people when Lansing had less than thirty in population. Lansing first appeared in the M. E. Church records in 1848, with R. R. Richards as pastor for six months, and seventy members were then reported. That year a horse barn was purchased and used by the Methodists until 1865.

A class was organized in the winter of 1849-50 in "Middle Town," meeting principally in the State Capitol legislative halls. This was the beginning of Central Church. Resin Sapp, pastor 1849-50, also acted as chaplain of the Michigan Legislature. In 1850 a lot was deeded to First Church by the State of Michigan. Subsequently this lot was deeded to Central Church, which in 1859 started a subscription list to erect a new building. A brick structure was begun in 1862, at a cost of $10,000, and was dedicated by Bishop SIMPSON on Aug. 4, 1863.

The present Ionian sandstone building was dedicated on April 20, 1890 by Bishop JOYCE. A revolving lighted cross, the gift of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Burton, was dedicated Dec. 31, 1922. D. STANLEY COORS, a native of Michigan, was appointed pastor of Central Church in 1938, remaining until 1952, when he was elected bishop.

With the help of Central Church, three other Methodist churches were organized in Lansing: Asbury Church, Mt. Hope Avenue, and Potter Park. In 1868 First Church bought a site and erected a wooden structure in North Lansing in 1870. Methodism prospered, and in 1876 Lansing had three Methodist churches: Central with 313 members; First with 138 members, and the German Church, with 133 members.

In 1970 Lansing, including East Lansing, had 8,046 members. Central Church had 2,129 members and property valued at $2,150,844; Mt. Hope Avenue had 969 members; and First Church had 722 members. The city itself lists twelve United Methodist churches, one A.M.E. church, one Wesleyan, and one Free Methodist.

LA PAZ, Bolivia, is the largest city in that land with 347,394 people. Because of its accessibility, it is the seat of government in BOLIVIA, though Sucre is the legal capital. La Paz lies in the heart of a gigantic canyon about three miles wide, ten miles long, and 1,500 feet deep, at an altitude of about 11,500 feet, and is framed with high Andean peaks. The city is served by several airlines and has the Pacific terminus of the only railroad that crosses the continent.

In La Paz there is the Church of the Reformation; the Central Church, with a fine modern building at a strategic intersection in the downtown city; the Church of the Redeemer, the principal Aymara Indian church, with the largest Methodist congregation in Bolivia. Its program includes social service in the poorer section of the town, the section in which it is located. The Church of the Resurrection is in Obrajes, adjoining the American Clinic, and is a church which ministers to that community as well as the hospital community; the Church of the Messiah is a new church in Tembladerani, organized in 1958, and at last reporting was the church most rapidly growing in La Paz. This church, as well as the Church of the Resurrection, has Bolivians as pastors. Other institutions in La Paz are the American Clinic, the Colegio Evangelico Metodista, and the Methodist School of Nursing.

CHAPEL, AMERICAN INSTITUTE, LA PAZ, BOLIVIA

American Clinic (Pfeiffer Memorial Hospital) is a Methodist hospital in La Paz. In 1920 plans were made to begin a hospital on land adjoining the American Institute, as COLEGIO EVANGELICO METODISTA was then called, in La Paz. A retired American army doctor, Dr. Warren, and a Methodist missionary nurse, La Rose Driver, came to La Paz to open this hospital, but Warren was unable to secure a general license to practice medicine in Bolivia, so this medical work was postponed.

By 1930 FRANK S. BECK had returned to Bolivia, and he opened the American Clinic in the location where it was originally planned. Although the Methodist BOARD OF MISSIONS did not have funds to maintain medical work in Bolivia, it affirmed the project with the hope that paying patients could help support the work with the poor. The clinic was started with three beds, a pressure cooker for a sterilizer, and a kit of instruments bought as war surplus from the First World War. The first patient treated was a woman in labor suffering from eclampsia, and Beck saved both mother and child. As more income became available, better equipment was obtained, and a new wing was added for an operating room and patient rooms.

The clinic had grown to fifteen beds by 1935, but this was insufficient. While home on furlough Beck told the needs to Mrs. HENRY PFEIFFER of New York. She offered $30,000 toward a new building and equipment. Land was purchased in Obrajes, a suburb of La Paz about a thousand feet lower than the main city, an altitude in which it was felt patients would recover more quickly. As construction began on the large clinic and the nurses' home, contributions came in from individuals and business firms in Bolivia and the United States. Mrs. Pfeiffer donated another $25,000 and left $50,000 more in an endowment fund. The building was finished in 1940. Other groups and persons from the United States and from the American and British communities in La Paz donated equipment. The clinic was named Pfeiffer Memorial Hospital in gratitude to the Pfeiffers, but locally continues to be known as the American Clinic.

Bill Jack Marshall, who came to Bolivia in 1955, succeeded Beck as director. Pablo Monti, a missionary from ARGENTINA, and Enrique Cicchetti, an Argentine church worker and pastor, both worked at the clinic. Louis Tatom III, a missionary surgeon, had been there for almost two years when he and MURRAY DICKSON were both killed in an automobile accident. Director since 1966 is Thoburn Thompson.

The American Clinic continues to serve all levels of Bolivian society—from the country's Aymara Indian to the foreign community. In 1965 there were 3,050 outpatients, 1,780 bed patients, 545 operations performed, and 514 babies delivered. Plans for the near future call for adding a service wing, and later a pediatrics and preferential unit.

Methodist School of Nursing, the first nursing school in Bolivia, is related to the American Clinic. The school has had a great influence on changing the status of nursing in Bolivia from a menial job into a respected profession. Although the school was started unofficially earlier, it was organized formally in 1939 by Miriam Beck, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. FRANK S. BECK, and was recognized by the government a year later. Miss Beck was director for many years, then returned to work after her marriage to Robert Knowles in 1946.

High school graduation is required for admission. Nurses who have been trained at the school have made a great contribution to the welfare of the Bolivian people through their work as instructors and supervisors of nursing at the clinic and in other hospitals or clinics, in the mines, and in public health work. Students receive practice at the American Clinic and other hospitals and clinics of La Paz.

The school has graduated 170 nurses from its beginning to 1966. In 1962 the program was changed from three years to four, placing more emphasis upon subjects such as public health and anthropology.

The enrollment in 1966 was fifty girls. There are five Bolivian instructors, plus the Bolivian director, Señorita Eunice Zambrana, daughter of one of the first Methodist pastors. Several doctors from the clinic and city teach at the school, some without remuneration.

In 1963 a section was built onto the original building for offices, classrooms, laboratories, and dormitories, and the unit named "Residencia Bessie de Beck" in honor of Mrs. Frank S. Beck.

LA PORTE, INDIANA, U.S.A. Historically the First Methodist Church in La Porte was one of the first Protestant churches in the northern part of the state. It was the first Protestant organization in La Porte County.

In 1832 the La Porte Mission was organized. In 1836 the first church building was built in what is now the city of La Porte. In 1919 the First Methodist Church and the German M. E. Church united. This united congregation has grown to be one of the two largest Methodist Churches in the NORTHWEST INDIANA CONFERENCE.

The La Porte Church has a history of unique programming to meet the needs of its community. As early as 1896 a church school and worship service was organized to minister to mute and deaf people in northern INDIANA. Today it continues to lead in creative church programming under its four ministers: a senior pastor, minister of evangelism, minister of education, minister to senior adults. Each minister is responsible for his particular area of the church program.

In 1970 First Church reported a membership of 1,926, property valued at $1,165,725, and $67,743 raised for all purposes.

LARGE, RICHARD WHITFIELD (1873-1920), Canadian medical missionary, was born Feb. 8, 1873, at Kincardine, Ontario, where his father Richard was the Methodist minister. Educated in various primary and secondary schools, he studied medicine at Trinity Medical College, Toronto, from which he graduated in 1897.

Large came to British Columbia in 1898 under the auspices of the Methodist Church, and for a period was superintendent of a hospital built by the Japanese in Steveston, at the mouth of the Fraser, to serve a fishing community of between five and six thousand people. After special ordination by the Methodist Conference, he moved to the Indian village of Bella Bella where his skill as physician and surgeon quickly became known. He soon saw that without a hospital his work could not succeed. With the help of the church, government and the villagers, a twelve-bed unit was opened in October 1902. He also rebuilt the hospital at Rivers Inlet, some seventy miles distant.

He then undertook to train the Indians in preventive medicine. With the extensive use of charts and lantern slides, he initiated a campaign of education on such subjects as ventilation, sanitation, cleanliness, and nutrition, as well as on the effects of alcohol. "No Spitting" signs throughout the village gave warning of a fine to those who might be guilty of this method of spreading tuberculosis.

In 1910, Large was asked to take over the medical work at Port Simpson, a large Indian village thirty miles north of Prince Rupert. Adjoining it was a white community which offered educational opportunities for his three sons, all of whom became physicians. Here at Port Simpson, as at Bella Bella, Large was not only medical superintendent but also health officer, coroner, and justice of the peace. His hobby was music. Gifted with an outstanding baritone voice, he was much in demand on the concert platform as well as at church gatherings.

As with many pioneer ministers, he was a victim of the hardships and overwork of frontier communities. Doubtless these contributed to his death on Aug. 25, 1920, at the early age of forty-seven. The hospital at Bella Bella, now known as the "R. W. Large Memorial Hospital," stands as a tribute to the dedicated life of this man of God.

LARGE MINUTES are summaries of several conferences held with his preachers by JOHN WESLEY, beginning in 1744. Their origin lies in a pamphlet, entitled Minutes of Some Late Conversations between the Revd. Mr. Wesley and Others, published by Wesley in 1749. This pamphlet was concerned with the organization and polity of the Methodist movement, and it came to be known as the "Disciplinary Minutes," to contrast it with a second such pamphlet which dealt with the doctrinal position of the Methodists. The Disciplinary Minutes were revised and edited by Wesley in 1753 to form a code of regulations to which the preachers were asked to subscribe if they wished to remain in connection with Wesley. This code of regulations of 1753, entitled simply Minutes of Several Conversations, came to be called the Large Minutes. The adjective "large" referred to the fact that these minutes were a distillation of Wesley's several conferences with his preachers, and not to the actual bulk of the document itself, which was not great.

The edition of 1753 underwent revisions and additions in editions which appeared in 1763, 1770, 1772, 1780, and 1789. Preachers in the Methodist connection were asked to signify their loyalty to the Large Minutes by signing their names to them. When they had done so, they were presented with copies bearing an inscription of the fly-leaf signed by Wesley: "As long as you freely consent to and earnestly endeavor to walk by these rules we shall rejoice to acknowledge you as a fellow laborer."

In the light of problems which developed after Wesley's death in 1791, the Wesleyan Methodist conference of 1797 decided to accept a revision and rearrangement of the Large Minutes which had been drawn up by JOHN PAWSON. This edition of 1797 became the basic ecclesiastical document of nineteenth century British Methodism, having the same role in Britain as the Discipline in America. (Original copies of the document bear the incorrect date 1779 on the title page, due to a printer's error.) After reading and subscribing to the Large Minutes, each British ordinand was presented with a copy bearing Wesley's inscription on the fly-leaf, signed by the President and the Secretary of the Conference.

The edition of 1797 does reflect the Arminian and evangelical quality of early Methodist theology, but its main concern is with the practical on-going life of the Methodist Church. There is an abundance of advice on pastoral visitation, the religious instruction of children, a preacher's use of his time, and other such matters. The Large Minutes also deal with such questions of polity as property deeds, the means of removing men remiss in their duties from pastoral office, the administration of the Preachers' Fund, and the support of the KINGSWOOD SCHOOL for the children of preachers. In 1831 David Thomson, the Secretary of the conference, published a definitive edition of the edition of 1797 to assure its being standard throughout British Methodism.

The Large Minutes exercised a crucial influence on American Methodism. The 1773 conference at ST. GEORGE'S CHURCH, Philadelphia, affirmed its loyalty to "the doctrine and discipline of the Methodists, as contained in the Large Minutes" and declared that "if any preachers deviate from the Minutes, we can have no fellowship with them till they change their conduct." American conferences after 1773 continued to accept the Large Minutes as their guide, though they came increasingly to amend and adapt them to American conditions.

The Discipline adopted by the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE at BALTIMORE in 1784 was based upon the 1780 edition of the Large Minutes. Since the 1784 Discipline became the basis for all further editions of the American Discipline, the Large Minutes thus exerted an important influence upon American as well as British Methodism in the nineteenth century. This was true in the Canadian and other Methodist churches which developed in this period as well.

THOMAS TREDWAY

LARRABEE, WILLIAM CLARKE (1802-1859), American pioneer educator and minister, was born at Cape Elizabeth, Maine, Dec. 23, 1802. His father, a sea captain, died soon after he was born. From his seventh year he lived with his grandparents and uncle, working on the farm and attending school. At sixteen William went to work in the house of John L. Blake, to whom he was bound for five years.

Converted in a Methodist meeting, he was licensed to preach in June 1821. He joined the ONEIDA CONFERENCE in 1832 but never took a pastoral appointment. Larrabee was graduated at Bowdoin, Brunswick, Maine, A.B., 1828. He married Harriet Dunn on Sept. 28, 1828, and was the father of four children. He named his home "Rosabover" in memory of his daughter Emma, who died in infancy and who is buried on the campus of DEPAUW UNIVERSITY.

Larrabee taught in and later was principal of the Wesleyan Seminary at Kent's Hill, Maine; principal of the Academy at Alfred, Maine; tutor in the preparatory school at Middleton, Conn., which was the forerunner of WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY; and was principal of Oneida Conference Seminary, Cazenovia, N. Y., 1831-35. In 1840 he was sent as a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE.

Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON persuaded Larrabee to go to DEPAUW, where he was professor of mathematics and natural science, 1840-52, acting as president for one year during that time.

He was the first state superintendent of public instruction in INDIANA, 1852-54, and in a sense was the founder of the public school system of that state. From 1854 to 1856 he was superintendent of the Indiana Institute for the Blind at INDIANAPOLIS.

In 1856 he was made superintendent of public instruction again and kept that office until the year of his death. He wrote Lectures on the Scientific Evidences of Natural and Revealed Religion; Wesley and His Coadjutors (2 vols.); Resbury and His Coadjutors (2 vols.); and Essays, Rosabover.

Larrabee gained in a rare degree the confidence and affection of his students. Retiring in January 1859, he died May 4 of that year at Greencastle, Ind.

LARSEN, CARL J. (1849-1934), American minister and Scandinavian Conference organizer, was born in America, settling at CHICAGO, where the family became Methodists. Upon his marriage in 1878, he and his bride moved to OAKLAND, Calif. There, as a wood carver by trade, he became foreman in one of the largest carving and designing factories on the Pacific Coast.

He accepted a call to the ministry and began to preach to the Scandinavian people in Oakland. In 1880 he led in the erection of the first Scandinavian church on the Coast and entered the CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE on trial. His missionary zeal in 1881 led him to visit OREGON and WASHINGTON where he found many persons from the Scandinavian countries who welcomed the Christian gospel. In 1882 he was transferred to the OREGON CONFERENCE and organized a Norwegian-Danish congregation in PORTLAND.

In 1884 he became a charter member of the Puget Sound Annual Conference and was appointed to TACOMA. There he organized a congregation of his fellow-countrymen in 1885. Later he organized churches in SEATTLE; SPOKANE; MOSCOW, IDAHO; MONTANA, and did pioneer mission work in ALASKA.

When the Norwegian-Danish work in the Northwest was organized into a Missionary Conference in 1888, Larsen became superintendent. His field covered Idaho, Oregon, and Washington.

C. J. Larsen is credited with organizing churches in SAN FRANCISCO, Calif.; Tacoma, Seattle, and Spokane, Wash.; Portland, Ore.; and Blaine, Idaho. He presided over the first Quarterly Conference at Fair Haven, Bellingham, Wash., in 1890, and delivered the sermon at the opening of the church at Butte, Mont., in 1895. He died at Portland, Ore. in 1934 and was buried there.

LARSON, HILDA (1864-1901), was the first foreign missionary of the Swedish Methodist Church (U.S.A.), born in Nettraby, a suburb of Karlskrona, Sweden, on Dec. 24, 1864. She was brought to the United States as a small child and she and her parents were charter members of the Swedish Methodist Church in EVANSTON, Ill. She was converted at the Des Plaines Camp Meeting and at once wished to go into Christian service. She was trained as a Deaconess at the Lexington Avenue Methodist Church in New York until she sailed for Africa with John Oman and his wife and daughter, on Aug. 24, 1895. She was stationed at Vivi, CONGO, until after John Oman's untimely death. Bishop HARTZELL then in charge of work there appointed her to Quessua, Angola, which she reached on Sept. 13, 1897, after two months of traveling. At the Conference at Quhomua which opened on June 1, 1899, she was appointed Teacher-in-Charge of the school at Quessua. She was very ill the last few months in Africa but became a great deal better on a long voyage home and arrived in New York on Aug. 30, 1900. She spoke in many of the Swedish Methodist Churches and influenced many for Christian service. She died on Nov. 21, 1901, and is buried in the family plot at Rosehill Cemetery, Chicago, Ill.

LARTEY, S. DORME (1900-1969), the first native African bishop to be elected in the A.M.E. ZION CHURCH, was born and educated in GHANA, later moving to LIBERIA. In 1933 he entered the ministry of the Presbyterian Church and in 1939 joined the A.M.E. Zion Church under the late Bishop J. W. Brown. The following year he was appointed a presiding elder by Bishop Brown. Under Bishop Cameron C. Alleyne he was again appointed to this position as well as to the superintendency of the Mount Coffee Mission.

Under the late Bishops Edgar B. Watson and Hampton T. Medford (1946-1952) he served as Bishops' Deputy. He was married to the former Alicia Smith, daughter of the late Vice President James S. Smith of Liberia.

S. Dorne Larley was elevated to the episcopacy of the Church in May 1960. At the time he listed his birth date as Sept. 10, 1900. He died suddenly Aug. 2, 1969.

DAVID H. BRADLEY

LARWOOD, SAMUEL (? -1755), a British Methodist, was a traveling preacher. He was at Conference in BRISTOL in 1745, LONDON in 1748, Leeds in 1753, and at the Irish Conference at Limerick in 1752. He became an Assistant in 1747 and was in IRELAND during 1748-52.

He had a dispute with JOSEPH COWNLEY in DUBLIN in 1748, because Cownley considered Larwood autocratic in admitting and expelling members. In August 1749 the Grand Jury "presented" CHARLES WESLEY, John (sic) Larwood, and seven others to be of ill fame, vagabonds and disturbers of the peace, and fit to be deported. Larwood became involved in the breach of 1754, and took and repaired the Presbyterian Meeting House in Zoar Street, Southwark, and settled there as an Independent minister. He died of fever in November, 1755, and Wesley buried him, commenting that he was "deeply convinced of unfaithfulness and yet hoping to find mercy."

LAS CRUCES, NEW MEXICO, U.S.A., St. Paul's United Methodist Church. The city of Las Cruces was founded in 1840 on the lower Rio Grande River, near El Paso, Texas, but Methodism here, according to a local historian, dates back to 1873 "when itinerant preachers rode into the dusty little town and preached to the few Anglo inhabitants." THOMAS HARWOOD, superintendent of the New Mexico Mission, recorded the date as "in October, about the 20th."

Hendrix M. E. Church, South, was built about 1880 by a twenty-family congregation under leadership of a layman, Judge R. L. Young. This building at times also served Presbyterians, Christians, Disciples, Baptists, and Episcopalians, some of whom joined the Methodists for Sunday school, with an average attendance of thirty-five.

In the early days the irrigated valley lands brought in settlers to produce cotton, fruits, and livestock with consequent prosperity for the church. Old Hendrix was razed in 1912 and replaced by St. Paul's, which served till 1965, when offices, church school rooms, fellowship hall, and kitchen were added as well as a new sanctuary which, with supplementary facilities, can seat more than 1,000. A great narthex window, thirty-five feet high and sixteen feet wide, depicts sword and Bible with the inscription, Spiritus Gladius. Other art windows illustrate the lives of St. Paul and John Wesley, and the development of Methodism.

In 1950 St. Paul's donated land and supplied a membership nucleus for the University Church. Its parish is associated with the New Mexico State University of Agriculture, Engineering, and Science.

St. Paul's has been served by thirty-three pastors since 1888 (James W. Weems), to the present (Robert M. Templeton, Jr., 1967). Membership reported in 1970 was 1,688.

LAS VEGAS, NEVADA, U.S.A. Methodism is strongly established in the internationally publicized city of Las Vegas, whose population exceeded 124,000 in 1970. Renowned for its desert climate, legalized gaming resorts, and nearby atomic experiments, Las Vegas is also an important center for air travel, national defense, conventions, education (Southern Nevada University), and natural wonders, being a gateway to Grand Canyon, Bryce Canyon, Zion Park, Hoover Dam, Lake Mead, Colorado River, Death Valley and ghost towns of a bygone mining era.

When the railroad came through in 1905, the first organization completed in the fledgling community was the Methodist Church, begun in a tent before the town was chartered. Official minutes of the Nevada Mission of the M. E. Church, Sept. 3, 1905, said, "This is a great country. We have entered it. We will stay." The first appointed pastor was J. W. Bain. Later Las Vegas and Clark County were assigned to the SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA-ARIZONA CONFERENCE with headquarters in LOS ANGELES.

Las Vegas Methodism celebrated its fiftieth anniversary with unusual community response in 1955, the historical statement being prepared by Fred J. Wilson. At that time a church sanctuary was erected for the newly formed Griffith Church, a memorial to E. W. Griffith, pioneer merchant and the first Las Vegas Sunday school superintendent. Ten years later, his son Robert Griffith was cited by Bishop GERALD KENNEDY as Conference Layman of 1965 and presented the Distinguished Layman's Award. As part of the sixtieth anniversary celebration, the Methodist Foundation of Southern Nevada was begun to aid in church extension. In 1970 there were five United Methodist churches in Las Vegas with a combined membership of 3,505.

LASKEY, VIRGINIA MARIE DAVIS (1900-), American missionary executive and president of the Woman's Division of the BOARD OF MISSIONS of The United Methodist Church, was born in Columbia County near Magnolia, Ark., on Jan. 12, 1900. She was the daughter of Virgil Montrey and Marie (Ansley) Davis. She studied at Newcomb College, New Orleans, La., 1917-21, received a B.A. degree from SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY in 1922, and took post-graduate at Columbia University, 1922-23. On March 19, 1925, she married Glenn Eugene Laskey, a petroleum geologist, and their daughter is Ann Marie (Mrs. Howard Cecil Kilpatrick, Jr.). For a time Mrs. Laskey taught in the Ruston (Louisiana) High School. She joined the M. E. Church, South in 1915 and became president of the WOMAN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE of the LOUISIANA CONFERENCE, 1945-53; and was the recording secretary of the South Central Jurisdiction of W.S.C.S., 1953-56. She has been a member of the Board of Missions of The Methodist Church since 1956, and in 1964 became president of the Woman's Division of the Board of Missions. Mrs. Laskey has also served as a member of the executive committee of the American Section of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, 1965. She was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1948 and '52, and to the WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCE, Oslo, Norway, 1961. She served upon the Board of Directors of the Lincoln Parish, Louisiana Foundation, 1950-60; is a trustee of SUE BENNETT COLLEGE; CENTENARY COLLEGE, where she was awarded the degree of L.H.D. in 1967; the ST. PAUL SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY; SCARRITT COLLEGE; and PFEIFFER COLLEGE. Her home is in Ruston, La. In May 1968 the library at Scarritt College was named in her honor, the Virginia Davis Laskey Library.

LATCH, EDWARD GARDINER (1901-), American pastor and chaplain in the Congress of the United States, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., Jan. 14, 1901, the son of William J. and Caroline (Lockhart) Latch. He was educated at DICKINSON COLLEGE (A.B., 1921; A.M., 1925; D.D., 1944); DREW UNIVERSITY, (B.D., 1924); AMERICAN UNIVERSITY (L.H.D.).

On March 1, 1926, he married Maria Vandervies, and they had one daughter and one son.

Joining the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in 1922, his appointments were: Vienna, Oakton, Va., 1925-28; Arlington, Va., 1928-32; Chevy Chase, Md., 1932-41; Metropolitan Memorial, WASHINGTON, D. C., 1941-67. He was appointed Chaplain of the U. S. House of Representatives in 1966, and was elected Chaplain in 1967.

Dr. Latch was a delegate to the WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCE in 1951, 1956, and 1961. He has been a trustee of Dickinson College, American University, WESLEY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, Sibley Memorial Hospital, and Ocean Grove Camp Meeting Association.

Under his guidance the Metropolitan Church grew from 624 members to more than 3,100, making it today the largest Methodist church in Washington, D. C.

In retirement Dr. Latch continues to live in Washington.

LATHBURY, MARY ARTHEMISIA (1841-1913), American hymn writer, whose hymn "Day is Dying in the West" was rated by W. Garrett Horder, the English hymnologist, as "one of the finest and most distinctive hymns of modern times. It deserves to rank with 'Lead, kindly Light,' of Cardinal Newman, for its picturesqueness and allusion-ness, and above all else for this, that devout souls, no matter what their distinctive beliefs, can through it voice their deepest feelings and aspirations."

Miss Lathbury was born at Manchester, N. Y., on Aug. 10, 1841. She was the daughter of a local Methodist preacher and had two brothers who were ministers of that church. She contributed to periodicals for children and young people, and was one of the editors of the Methodist Sunday School Union of which JOHN H. VINCENT (later bishop) was the secretary. Through him she became associated with the Chautauqua movement—which Bishop Vincent founded—and she became known as the "Laureate of Chautauqua." She founded what she called the "Look Up Legion," based on Edward Everett Hale's four rules of good conduct: "Look up, not down; Look forward, not back; Look out, and not in; And lend a hand." The music for her famous hymn—named "Chautauqua"—was written by W. F. Sherwin in 1877 especially for Miss Lathbury's verses. The hymn has not been especially popular in England, but the tune is deeply fixed in American church life so that, as Robert G. McCutchan put it, "Day is dying in the west" and the tune Chautauqua have become synonymous in the American mind."

Since this hymn contains only two stanzas, or divisions, other writers have attempted to lengthen it by adding other verses. However, one of the brothers of Miss Lathbury, who held the copyright after his sister's death, refused to allow the hymn to be used in the Methodist Hymnal of 1930-34 unless the exact words Miss Lathbury wrote and them only should be printed. Miss Lathbury, who never married, died in East Orange, N. J., on Oct. 20, 1913.

LATHERN, JOHN (1831-1905), Canadian minister, was born at New Shield House, Cumberland, England, July 13, 1831. Educated at Alston Grammar School and as a mining engineer, he volunteered in 1855 to become a Wesleyan missionary. He was received on probation by the Conference of Eastern British America and stationed in Fredericton. Ordained in 1859, he served on various circuits for twenty-seven years.

In 1886 he was appointed editor of The Wesleyan, and in 1895 he returned to circuit work in Dartmouth. In 1899 he became a supernumerary and lived in Halifax until his death.

Honored with a D.D. by MOUNT ALLISON UNIVERSITY in 1884, he held many eminent positions in the church. He was elected president of the Nova Scotia Conference in 1881; and was a delegate to many General Conferences. He was a regent of Mount Allison University from 1891 until his death.

He published a number of books and pamphlets, among which are A Macedonian Cry; Baptisma, Exegetical and Controversial; and the Institute Lectures—Cromwell, Havelock, Cobden, and English Reformers.

D. W. Johnson says of him: "As a preacher he stood in the front rank. His intellectual powers were of an high order, and whilst a devoted Methodist, he belonged to all the churches and was a most ardent advocate of Christian unity."

LATIN AMERICA CENTRAL CONFERENCE was a Central Conference of The United Methodist Church composed of the annual conferences of that church in Central and South America. It met quadrennially to govern its affairs and elect bishops. The conference was proposed in a memorial from CHILE to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church of 1920 and was authorized by that General Conference in 1924. This Central Conference was a development from the old South America Annual Conference.

The Latin America Central Conference was organized at a session in Panama City, April 3-13, 1924. It included work of the M. E. Church in ARGENTINA, BOLIVIA, CHILE, COSTA RICA, PANAMA, PERU, URUGUAY, and at that time MEXICO. Twenty-two ministers, seven laymen, and four laywomen were members. The second session, also held in Panama, took place April 9-14, 1928. This session asked the General Conference for power to elect and consecrate its own bishops and proposed that the bishops should be national ministers, two in number in order to better administer its vast territory. By the third session, held in Santiago de Chile, Feb. 6-14, 1932, the request had been granted. The conference, however, asked for the return of the beloved North American bishop, GEORGE A. MILLER. It then elected as the first national bishop, JUAN E. GATTINONI, pastor of Central Church, BUENOS AIRES.

The tenure of national bishops was established as a term episcopacy of four years. A bishop could be re-elected, but no one could be elected bishop if more than sixty-five years of age. Bishops elected in 1932 and 1936 were consecrated at M. E. General Conferences in the United States the same years. Since 1940 bishops were consecrated at the sessions of the Central Conference itself.

After the second session, Mexico withdrew from the Central Conference in order to organize in 1930 the autonomous church of Mexico, made up of former work of the M. E. Church and M. E. Church, South. The South American annual and provisional annual conferences thereupon formed two areas. The River Plate Area consisted of Argentina, Uruguay, and Bolivia; the Pacific Area consisted of Chile, Peru, Panama, and Costa Rica.

The Latin America Central Conference continued to meet every four years in the principal cities of both areas: BUENOS AIRES, MONTEVIDEO, LIMA, COCHABAMBA, and SANTIAGO de Chile. In 1966 it reported a membership of thirty-five ministers and thirty-five laymen, all of whom were, of course, elected by their respective annual conferences.

The Latin America Central Conference came to an end as it held its last meeting in Santiago, Chile, Jan. 27—Feb. 6, 1969. Its delegates and the conference itself had decided to disband as a Central Conference of The United Methodist Church, since its component annual conferences were granted permission by the U.M.C. to go into, and become autonomous churches, if and as they could. They did decide to do this at the 1965 meeting, adopting measures permitting the separate conferences in the different countries to become autonomous churches; and at the same time, organizing themselves together with Mexico and CUBA into the Council of Latin American Evangelical Methodist Churches, (Consejo de Iglesias Evangelicas Metodistas de America Latina) commonly referred to as CIEMAL. This Central Conference of 1969 saw the retirement of Bishop SANTE U. BARBIERI and Bishop PEDRO ZOTTELE. In their places it elected FEDERICO PAGURA and RAIMONDO A. VALENZUELA, each for a four-year term.

The Chile Conference, being ready for autonomy, organized itself into an autonomous Methodist Church in the Santiago meetings and elected as its superintendent Bishop Valenzuela. The Central Conference itself assigned Bishop Pagura to Panama and Costa Rica, and requested that the bishops of The United Methodist Church provide episcopal supervision for the other Latin American countries involved which had not as yet been able to organize as autonomous churches.

LATIN AMERICA, COMMITTEE ON COOPERATION IN, was an agency for coordination of mission work conducted in Latin America by boards of missions based in North America. It lasted from 1913 until 1965, when its work was assigned to the Division of Overseas Missions of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, U.S.A.

Latin America was excluded from the agenda of the Edinburgh Missionary Conference of 1910 on the ground that Latin America, at least nominally, was already Christian. However, the secretaries of boards having work there held two meetings during the Edinburgh conference and agreed to hold a conference to do for Latin America what Edinburgh had done for the rest of the world. A committee was appointed, including Samuel Guy Inman, later to become secretary of the Committee on Cooperation in Latin America; and H. C. TUCKER, Methodist missionary to BRAZIL.

In 1913 a committee of the Foreign Missions Conference of North America convened a Conference on Latin America in New York, and at its conclusion a continuation committee was set up, called the Committee on Cooperation in Latin America. Members were from five United States denominations, including the M. E. Church and M. E. Church, South. Later the committee was expanded, and in 1914 it was decided to hold the Congress on Christian Work in Latin America. This took place in PANAMA in 1916 and is commonly known as the Panama Congress.

The congress was the first great meeting of Evangelicals to be held in that area, and it gave impetus to the development of Protestant missions in Latin America. It also served to arouse interest of churches in the United States. At the close of the congress, the Committee on Cooperation in Latin America was made permanent, and headquarters were established in New York.

The committee dealt with some of the major issues raised by the congress, including adequate occupation of territory, comity agreements, Christian literature, and education.

In 1919 the committee established a Spanish language magazine, La Nueva Democracia, which continues to the present. In the same year the committee stimulated the broadening of Colegio Ward in BUENOS AIRES, Argentina, from a Methodist institution into a joint work with the Disciples of Christ. The Evangelical Union Seminary of Puerto Rico (Seminario Evangelico de Puerto Rico) was founded in 1919 with six mission boards cooperating. The committee fostered the International Faculty of Theology and Social Sciences in Buenos Aires, which later developed into the Union Theological Seminary (FACULTAD EVANGELICA DE TEOLOGIA).

Prior to formation of the CCLA, there was not a single union paper, school, or coordinating agency in any country of Latin America. The CCLA fostered national committees on cooperation, many of which later developed into National Christian Councils.

Methodist leadership in the CCLA during its early years included TUCKER, FRANK MASON NORTH, HARRY FARMER, RALPH E. DIFFENDORFER, and THOMAS S. DONOHUGH. WADE CRAWFORD BARCLAY led a project to create and publish a church-school curriculum known as Curso Hispano-Americano, and under Barclay a Conference on Christian Literature—the first of its kind—was held in Mexico City in 1941. GONZALO BAEZ-CAMARGO, Methodist of Mexico, served as secretary of the CCLA's Committee on Christian Literature and organized a curriculum conference at MONTEVIDEO in 1949.

Subsequent to the Panama Congress, the committee sponsored missionary conferences at Montevideo, Uruguay, in 1925, and at Havana, CUBA, in 1929.

Throughout its life the CCLA conducted many surveys, of which two are noteworthy here: One requested in 1919 in the West Indies, led to formation of the Board for Christian Work in Santo Domingo by the Methodist, Presbyterian, and United Brethren Churches; a study of ECUADOR in 1943 led to formation in 1945 of the United Andean Indian Mission, with the Evangelical United Brethren as one of four participants.

In its later years the committee gave up many of its functions to the churches and Evangelical Councils of Latin America. With the formation of the National Council of Churches of Christ in the U.S.A. in 1950, the CCLA became a part of the Council's Division of Foreign Missions. It retained its identity within the Council until restructure in 1965, when the CCLA was discontinued and its responsibilities assigned to the Division of Overseas Ministries.

LATIN AMERICAN EVANGELICAL BOARD OF MISSIONS is a missionary-sending board organized first by Methodists of Central and South America, and now representing both Methodists and Waldensians.

In 1960, prior to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church, several delegates from the Latin American countries met with Bishop SANTE UBERTO BARBIERI to discuss the idea of forming a Latin American Board of Missions. The idea was carried back to their home churches, and in October of that year, on the occasion of the LATIN AMERICAN CENTRAL CONFERENCE (with delegates also attending from the autonomous Methodist churches of MEXICO and BRAZIL, and also from CUBA), the board was officially constituted.

The board engaged in some exploratory investigation and decided to begin work in ECUADOR. It was felt that the witness to the Gospel was weakest in this nation. It is true that work was being carried on by several denominations or independent missionary boards, but that such work was limited by the origin and nature of these groups—mostly representing "nonhistorical" or "conservative evangelical" groups—as well as by the fact that the emphasis was primarily on work among the Indians. It was felt that there was a deep need for a strong evangelical witness among other sectors of the society, particularly those who, by reason of their relatively advantaged social position, constituted the leadership groups with influence and authority in society.

Further exploration and consultation were carried on by the board in Ecuador. It was decided not to start a Methodist Church there, but rather to work through the denominations already present, wherever cooperation should prove to be possible. A relationship was established with the United Evangelical Church of Ecuador, which was emerging as the result of consultations between the United Andean Indian Mission, the mission of the Church of the Brethren, and the Evangelical Covenant Church (though the last-named dropped out before the united church was formed).

In 1964 Bishop ALEJANDRO RUIZ of Mexico undertook responsibility for finding a couple to initiate this cooperative work, and in 1965 Dr. and Mrs. ULISES HERNANDEZ arrived in Ecuador to represent the Latin American Board of Missions. This couple, joining forces with the United Evangelical Church, has devoted its time to the training of the ministry, strengthening the Christian education program, and evangelism. The board in 1967 was considering sending another couple.

In 1962 the Waldensian Church showed interest in forming a part of the Latin American Methodist Board of Missions. Therefore the word "Evangelical" was substituted for "Methodist" in the name.

CARLOS T. GATTINONI

LATIN AMERICAN EVANGELICAL CHRISTIAN EDUCATION COMMISSION (CELADEC: Comision Evangelica Latino Americana de Educacion Cristiana) is an interdenominational body that serves Methodist churches of Latin America, and to which Methodists have contributed financial support and leadership.

The commission states as its purpose to serve Protestant churches in all of the Americas except in the United States and CANADA, and "to help the churches of Latin America in the fulfillment of their mission of proclaiming the Gospel through Christian education."

CELADEC was founded in October 1962, by the action of councils of federations of churches and, where they do not exist, by individual denominations. Membership is on the same basis for all, and the Methodist churches of all Spanish- and Portuguese-speaking countries of Central and South America are related to CELADEC.

In turn, CELADEC serves as a regional grouping in affiliation with the World Council of Christian Education and Sunday School Association, which gives technical and financial aid to some of its projects. It also enjoys the sponsorship and financial assistance of the Latin America Department of the Division of Overseas Ministries of the NATIONAL COUNCIL of the CHURCHES of Christ in the U.S.A.

A triennial Assembly, made up of delegates from member bodies, governs CELADEC. An executive committee, elected by the Assembly, meets once a year. Gerson A. Meyer of Brazil has been general secretary since the organization of CELADEC. First chairman of the executive committee and presiding officer was RAIMUNDO VALENZUELA of CHILE, who was succeeded in January 1967, by FEDERICO PAGURA of ARGENTINA. The territory that CELADEC serves is divided into five regions, each with a secretary.

Specific tasks undertaken may be divided roughly into two categories: (1) the development of curriculum and occasional teaching materials, and (2) the training of leaders for Christian education. Reasoning that traditional materials, which presume a high level of education, cannot reach some eighty percent of the population, CELADEC makes extensive use of audiovisuals and drama.

CELADEC sponsors a series of regional study seminars and held a continental curriculum conference in 1968.

In the area of leadership training, CELADEC sponsored a conference in Alajuela, COSTA RICA, in 1964 to celebrate the centennial of Christian education in Latin America. Seventeen countries were represented.

In 1966 ninety percent of CELADEC's budget was contributed by churches in the United States through the National Council of Churches, with The Methodist Church a major contributor. The churches of Latin America are expected to increase their portion of the support in due time.

LATIN AMERICAN EVANGELICAL METHODIST CHURCHES, COUNCIL OF (Consejo de Iglesias Evangelicas Metodistas de America Latina), known briefly as CIEMAL, is an organization formed at SANTIAGO, Chile, Jan. 27-Feb. 6, 1969. The formation of this new regional body is considered an epochal step in South American Methodism, and also in that of MEXICO and CUBA since the autonomous churches of these lands joined with CHILE, ARGENTINA, URUGUAY, BOLIVIA, PERU, PANAMA, COSTA RICA, and BRAZIL to form CIEMAL.

This organization move was made pursuant to the authorization given to the former members of the Latin America Central Conference to become autonomous churches. The Chile Conference took advantage of this to organize itself into the Methodist Church of Chile (Iglesia Metodista de Chile) during this series of meetings.

This was the first of seven autonomous churches scheduled to come into being if this should prove possible and expedient during the 1968-72 quadrennium. Although the churches in these seven countries would no longer be organically related to The United Methodist Church in the United States, they will have a close relationship with fraternal and other ties just as does the church in Brazil, Mexico and Cuba.

This organizational meeting in Santiago immediately followed and was based upon the last meeting of the Latin America Central Conference. That conference among its last actions recognized the formal retirement of Bishop SANTE U. BARBIERI, who had served the BUENOS AIRES Area for twenty years; and that of Bishop PEDRO ZOTTELE of the Santiago Area who had been elected in 1962. Taking the places of these were two new bishops elected by the Latin America Central Conference, FEDERICO PAGURA, 45, who had been professor of pastoral counseling and chaplain at the Union Theological Seminary in Buenos Aires (who was assigned to head the Methodist work in Panama and Costa Rica); and RAIMONDO A. VALENZUELA, 53, a Christian education executive and United States missionary to Cuba, who following his election was assigned to head the new Methodist Church of Chile.

CIEMAL marks a positive and definite linkage of the Methodists in these ten Latin American countries in a single body. In setting up CIEMAL, the constituting assembly specified that it would be a non-legislative, non-executive body, reserving the functions of legislation and administration to the several Churches comprising it. The purposes, as defined by the organizing leaders, are on co-ordinated planning, strategy, and programming; mutual support, and depth of relationships. As one delegate put it, "We seek to preserve the autonomy of each church, but to have a strong nexus for interdependence and mutual support."

The policy and work of CIEMAL will be determined by its General Assembly, which will meet every five years. Between Assemblies, the work will be in the hands of an eleven-member Directive Committee, comprising one representative from each country, and the president of the Latin American College of General Superintendents (all bishops, presidents, and other heads of churches). The president of the College in 1969 was Bishop ALEJANDRO RUIZ of the Methodist Church of Mexico.

The Directive Committee for the next five years, elected by the constituting assembly, it is noted, have laymen as all three of its officers. The chairman is EDUARDO GATTINONI, publisher from Buenos Aires; the vice-chairman, Mrs. Celia Hernandez, Women's Society leader from Mexico; and the secretary, Gerson Rodrigues, educator from Bauru, Brazil.

The constituting assembly drafted a "Message to the Methodist Churches of Latin America" which emphasized hope, the need for change, ecumenism and the place of youth.

At this writing it appears that the membership of CIEMAL will be expanded to include the METHODIST CHURCH in the CARIBBEAN and the AMERICAS. This comprises British Methodist-related churches in Jamaica, Haiti, and other Caribbean islands, Central America and Guiana. The constituting assembly invited the Church of the Caribbean and the Americas to join in its organization, and that Church's president, HUGH SHERLOCK of ANTIGUA, attending the assembly, expressed the view that the invitation would be accepted.

CIEMAL has set up a JUDICIAL COUNCIL along the lines of that of The United Methodist Church, and laid out broad guidelines for common planning and action in education, social action, mission, evangelism and other program areas. The nine-member Judicial Council is representative of all Latin America and will have authority to adjudicate not only actions of CIEMAL but also to handle judicial matters of the churches themselves where this is desired and so enacted. The Methodist Church of Chile delegated such authority to the Judicial Council at its organizing conference.

LATIN AMERICAN METHODIST WOMEN, CONFEDERATION OF, is an organization representing women in the countries of Latin America. The confederation was founded in 1938 under leadership of Lena Knapp (now Mrs. John Haynes) and Mrs. CARLOS GATTINONI. The purpose is to unite the Latin American Methodist women to do together things they could not do so effectively in each country alone. This has included the support of missionaries, publication of study books, missionary texts and bulletins, and the exchange of ideas.

The confederation has held a Congress every four years: 1942 in BUENOS AIRES, ARGENTINA; 1946 in SANTIAGO, CHILE; 1950 in MONTEVIDEO, URUGUAY; 1955 in LIMA, PERU; 1959 in RIO DE JANEIRO, BRAZIL; and 1963 in Mexico City; the seventh in COCHABAMBA, BOLIVIA, in January, 1967.

The presidents have been Maria Aguirre of Chile, Mrs. Juanita R. Balloch (wife of Bishop BALLOCH), Mrs. Bessie Archer Smith (Mrs. EARL M. SMITH) of Uruguay, Mrs. Esther Moore Saez of Argentina, and Mrs. Teresa P. Araneta of Peru.

The confederation began supporting missionaries in 1942, after its first Congress, when Adelina Gattinoni became the first missionary. The number was increased to two and, in October 1955, to three. They were serving in 1966 in Chile, Bolivia, and Peru. Missionaries who have served have been Margarita Caminos, an Argentine to Bolivia; Dorcas Courvoisier, an Argentine to Bolivia; Berta Garcia, a Bolivian to Bolivia; Rosa Sherlian, an Argentine to Bolivia; Teresa Silvera, a Uruguayan to Bolivia; Maria Glicinia Fernandez, a Brazilian to Peru; Francisca Cariqueo, a Chilean to Chile.

From 1951 to 1966 the confederation published eight study books. The group has also published mission study texts each year since 1953, translating the books published in the United States by Friendship Press of New York. The work has been done with the backing of the COMMITTEE ON COOPERATION IN LATIN AMERICA, and is used in eight countries. This is the only translation of Friendship Press texts into other languages.

Since 1955 the Confederation Bulletin has served women's work in all the Latin American countries where there is Methodist work, functioning as a channel for interchange of ideas. Editors have been Mrs. Evodia C. Silva of Mexico, Mrs. Sylvia P. Huaroto of Peru, and Mrs. Rubi Rodriguez Etchagoyen of Argentina.

Pamphlets are issued on subjects such as prayer and Family Week. Prayer calendars have been published at times by the Spiritual Life Department.

The confederation has enjoyed the support and cooperation of the Woman's Division of the BOARD OF MISSIONS of The Methodist Church in the U.S.A.

LATIN MISSION, located in south FLORIDA, was organized by the M. E. Church, South in 1930. It grew out of work among Cuban refugees and Italian immigrants who resided mostly in Key West, Miami, and Tampa. H. B. Someillan, a young preacher in the Florida Conference, vowed to devote his life to a ministry among the Cubans. His special service began in 1894 in Ybor City, a Latin quarter in Tampa. Someillan had some help from the Woman's Missionary Council of the denomination.

In time some seven churches were organized in the three cities mentioned. Someillan's work laid the foundations for a Latin District which the FLORIDA CONFERENCE formed in 1913. In 1917, the district reported six churches, 481 church members, and 1,212 Sunday school pupils.

In 1930, the Latin District was elevated to the status of a mission. At that time the number of churches still stood at six, but the total church membership had fallen to 320. Gradually the number of members increased. When the Latin Mission was absorbed by the Florida Conference in 1943, there were five churches and 622 members.

LA TROBE, BENJAMIN (1725-1786), British Moravian, was born in DUBLIN on April 19, 1725. A Baptist of Huguenot stock, he was influenced by JOHN CENICK when a student in Dublin. La Trobe became a Moravian minister and did much to make Moravianism understood by members of other churches. Friendly with CHARLES WESLEY, he took part in the abortive negotiations for union of MORAVIANS and Methodists in 1785-86. He greatly influenced Samuel Johnson and visited him on his death bed. With AUGUST SPANGENBERG he compiled an authoritative survey of Moravian doctrine. La Trobe became president of the Brethren's Society for the Furtherance of the Gospel, and warmly supported Count ZINZENDORF's ecumenical ideas. He died in London on November 29, 1786.

LAVINGTON, GEORGE (1684-1762), British critic of Methodism and Moravianism, was born at Mildenhall, Wiltshire, Jan. 8, 1684, and was educated at Winchester and Oxford. He was appointed chaplain to George I and, in 1746, Bishop of Exeter. A faked pastoral charge, representing him as a friend of Methodism, provoked his Enthusiasm of the Methodists and Papists Compared (Parts I-III, 1749-51). To this catalog of Methodist extravagance, which ignored or misunderstood the good results of the revival, replies were published by GEORGE WHITEFIELD and VINCENT PERRONET (1749) and by JOHN WESLEY (Feb. 1, 1750; Dec. 1751). Lavington's most interesting argument was that Methodist conversion experiences could be explained in physical and psychological terms; he rejected Wesley's claim that they were the work of the Holy Spirit. Later Wesley records a visit to Exeter Cathedral on Aug. 29, 1762, when he was "pleased to partake of the Lord's Supper with my old opponent, Bishop Lavington." Lavington died soon after, on Sept. 13, 1762.

LAW, WILLIAM (1686-1761), British Nonjuror and mystic, was born at King's Cliffe, Northamptonshire, and was educated at Cambridge. He refused the oath of allegiance to the Hanoverian King George I, and resigned his fellowship at Emmanuel (1716). After some years in the household of Edward Gibbon (grandfather of the historian) at Putney, Law retired to King's Cliffe (1740) and died there, April 9, 1761.

JOHN WESLEY read Law's Practical Treatise upon Christian Perfection (1726) and A Serious Call (1728) at Oxford, and began to pursue "inward holiness" by self-discipline as Law recommended. By 1738 he had adopted the Moravians' views of salvation by faith, and attacked Law for failing to teach this. From the 1740's Law developed a mystical theology based on the writings of Jakob Böhme (d. 1624). Wesley attacked Law (1756) for departing from Scripture by teaching unconditional salvation for all, based on a divine spark in every man; for his weak doctrine of the atonement; and for his disparagement of the means of grace. Although Law opposed eighteenth-century rationalism, Wesley believed that his system, by contradicting the "Scriptural" scheme of salvation, destroyed the Christian case against Deism.

LAW, METHODIST (U.S.A.). The ruling law of The United Methodist Church is found in the Book of Discipline of that and the other respective Methodist Churches. The Discipline contains and sets forth first the constitutional law of the church. Also certain JUDICIAL COUNCIL decisions interpreting the Constitution may be referred to in the published decisions of that body.

Constitutional law may only be changed by constitutional processes. This calls for the joint action of the GENERAL CONFERENCE and of the members of all the annual conferences who must agree to any constitutional change by a two-thirds majority of those "present and voting" both in the General Conference and in the several annual conferences. In the event an ARTICLE OF RELIGION or a standard of belief is to be changed, it requires a three-fourths vote of the electorate in the annual conferences following a two-thirds General Conference vote recommending the change.

Constitutional law is interpreted by the Judicial Council according to processes outlined in the Constitution, and by the rules of procedure developed by the Judicial Council itself.

The larger part of the Book of Discipline is in the form of statutory law which may be written, revised, amended or changed at the instance of any General Conference acting within its normal powers. A majority vote in most instances suffices to alter or write statutory law for The United Methodist Church.

Statutory law itself may be divided into administrative law dealing with the processes and procedures of the organizational work of the church in all its departments; and trial law or the procedures which are to be followed when a church member—whether a bishop, elder, local preacher, supply preacher, deaconess or regular church member—is to be tried for a violation of some phase of Methodist discipline. Offenses against the moral law are, of course, the most heinous, and when a person is found guilty, such person may be expelled from the membership of the church. Disciplinary infractions for maladministration on the part of certain church officers may be tried according to the processes outlined in the Book of Discipline, if these offenses are such as to warrant a trial. All matters relating to trial law are carefully prescribed and when followed out according to the law of the church, there is no recourse in the civil law by the person found guilty. Civil authorities in the United States have long taken the position that a church member is bound by the law of his own church, which law he subscribed to upon his admission to that church; if therefore the church follows its own announced procedures in dealing with those who offend against its laws, the civil power refuses to take jurisdiction over the result of such ecclesiastical proceedings.

The Book of Discipline containing Methodist law is often held up before judicatory bodies as the "book of law" of The United Methodist Church and referred to in all matters which have to do with its life, teachings, and processes. When any matter touching Methodist rules, regulations, or law is brought before a civil court and the court does take jurisdiction over such matter, the Book of Discipline is usually formally presented to the court as authoritative Methodist law.

Parliamentary law also governs Methodist bodies when they meet in session, in order that proceedings may move smoothly but formally in line with accustomed processes which prevail in such bodies. The General Conference has a Committee on Rules which prescribes all such matters, and many annual conferences likewise formally adopt rules for their own procedures. Quite often the rules of the General Conference in so far as they apply are adopted for the governing of annual conferences and of other formal church gatherings. The authoritative Roberts' Rules of Order which has established itself as the arbiter in this entire field in America, is usually the basic guide and director in all matters of rule and parliamentary governance in American Methodist bodies.

LAW AND GOSPEL. The relation of the religion of the Law to the gospel of God's grace is a matter which is important for the understanding of the gospel, and for its spiritually balanced and healthful proclamation. This was a subject of constant controversy in Wesley's time, and there are numerous references in Wesley's work to teachers whom he felt were in error, and replies to attacks made upon his understanding of the gospel. This controversy still goes on today, though stated in somewhat different terms. A note on this matter is therefore necessary for the understanding of Wesley's doctrine, and for its application today.

Historical background. The preparation for the Christian gospel and the Christian Church was the religion of the Old Covenant, the religion of the Law of Moses. The foundation of this Covenant was in the grace of God, in that He had freely set His love upon the Hebrew people, the descendants of Abraham, and chosen them to be His Covenant people (Genesis xii 1-3, xvii 1-8, etc., Deuteronomy iv 32-9, vii 7-9). However, the basis on man's side for the continuance of this Covenant was obedience to God's revealed Law (Exodus xxiv, 3-8, etc.). Nevertheless, the idea of faith, and of loving trust in God, was always there as well (Genesis xv 6, Deuteronomy vi 3-7, Habakkuk ii 4). Thus the normal pious Jew loved the Law, regarded the possession of it as the privilege of his nation, and obeyed it gladly (Psalm cxix, etc.). In this no formal difference was made between liturgical and ceremonial commandments, such as the law of the Temple, worship, and of unclean meats, and the moral and social commandments, such as justice, truthfulness, humanity, and charity. All these things were the Law of God alike. Thus in the Decalogue some commandments, like those forbidding idolatry and enjoining the Sabbath, are ceremonial; others, like the prohibition of theft and adultery, are moral; whereas the commandment regarding the taking of the name of God in vain is both. It is not possible to draw a sharp distinction between inward and outward commandments, because a sincere worshipper sees an inward meaning symbolized in a religious ceremony. Nevertheless, the more thoughtful and spiritually minded among the Hebrews always contrived to emphasize that God is more concerned with the inward spirit of moral obedience than with the mere performance of customary ritual, no matter how venerable and significant (Psalm xl 6-8, Amos v 21-4, Micah vi 6-8).

Our Lord came as the fitting climax of this tradition. He revered and confirmed the religious institutions of Israel as an expression of the will of God (Matthew v 17-19, xxii 2-3, Luke iv 16, John ii 17). He sternly denounced externalism and hypocrisy (Mark vii 5-16, Luke xi 37-42), and He taught that a stricter standard of inward obedience was required in the new age (Matthew v 27-8, Mark x 2-12). The rest of the New Testament substantially answers to this principle. Thus in particular, though St. Paul under controversial pressure to vindicate the proposition that the Gentile Christians do not need to be circumcised, and to adopt the whole religion of the Mosaic Law, can on occasion make rather extreme statements of the antithesis between Law and Gospel (Galatians v 1-4), yet he does assent to the master-proposition that the Law is of divine origin, and good (Romans iii 1-2, vii 12), and it is the due preparation for the Gospel (Galatians iii 23-4). The great essay upon this theme is the Epistle to the Hebrews. Here the institutions of Judaism are displayed as a divinely given foreshadowing of the higher institutions and permanently valid spiritual principles of the Christian religion.

The church followed upon this track, though she was forced to embark upon the traditional distinction between the moral law of the Old Covenant, which is of permanent validity, and the ceremonial law, which was abolished in Christ. This clearly answers to the practical situation as it has existed in the Church. The Church has always revered the Jewish Scriptures as Christian Scriptures, not as an account merely of the historical origins of the Christian faith, but as a book authoritative for Christian doctrine, and for the guidance of the devotional and moral life. Nevertheless, the Church did not in point of fact literally obey the Scriptural commandments regarding the sacrifices, the festivals, the law of ceremonial cleanness, and the like. The desire of Christian theology to illustrate so far as possible the parallel between the lower and legal institutions of the Jewish religion, and the higher and spiritual institutions of the Christian religion, led many of the traditional theologians of the Church to describe the Christian faith as "the new Law." Just as, in particular, the Jewish Sabbath was a foretype of the Christian day of worship, so in general the whole institution of Judaism (the Law), was a foretype of the whole Christian institution. Difficulty which has been felt by some about this phrase illustrates a point of controversy which arose at the Reformation period.

In his effort completely to outlaw the "merit-earning" theology prevalent in many quarters in the mediaeval church, and to emphasize the principles of salvation "by grace alone" and "through faith alone," Luther fell back upon Paul's rugged antithesis, mentioned above as voiced in some passages, between "Law" and "Grace." It is therefore a characteristic theme of Luther, and of Protestant theology following him, that admission into the Christian Gospel of the religion of law (that is to say, the hope of a man that he may fit himself for God, and win divine favor, by self-imposed effort in obedience to the Law of God), is a radical corruption and a denial of the fundamental principle of salvation by grace alone. Thus "legality" is the opposite quantity to the Gospel. However, this evangelical principle, like other principles, can be perverted by partial and superficial minds into an error. The error in question is that of antinomianism (anti: "against"; nomos: "law"), which is the affirmation that the Christian who is saved by grace, and who walks by faith is on that account released from the duty of obedience to the moral law of God. This clearly is the evangelical principle falling into dangerous unbalance, and into an error of excess.

A fair and balanced reading of Luther makes it plain that he himself was not an antinomian. Yet in some passages in his works there are strong and paradoxical expressions of the antithesis between "law" and "grace" which speak of "the Law" almost as an enemy of "the Gospel." If such passages are isolated from the context they may be interpreted as a substantiation for antinomian doctrine. And some less wise evangelical teachers have at times fallen into this trap of misunderstanding. It may perhaps be said that antinomianism can exist in three degrees. There can be a very mild degree of antinomianism, in theoretical principle only. The believer may profess himself to have escaped altogether from the sphere of duty to obey the moral law of God into the Christian "liberty" of freely following the impulse of love. And on the basis of this he may live a strict moral life. Then there may be a moderate practical antinomianism, in which the believer deludes himself that the deep spiritual experience which he can profess, and the many devotional exercises which he enjoys, in some way compound for minor moral failings in matters of truthfulness, honesty, self-control, or human kindness. Finally there is the outright antinomianism of the "lunatic fringe" of those who affirm that because they are accepted by God through the sole merits of Christ they are in principle free to indulge their vices if they wish. By contrast, it is surely the sound and long-established Christian position that the high purpose of the evangelical experience of salvation by grace is to enable man effectually and from the heart to carry out his unsparing duty of obedience to the moral law of God, sovereign over him, as over all men. The sure guide is that Christ came not to destroy the law, but to fulfill it (Matthew v, 17).

Wesley on the Law and the Gospel. It is plain from everything which he did and wrote that the fully evangelical Wesley, after the ALDERSGATE STREET experience, continued to be every inch the exponent of strict moral discipline. Anything which savored of antinomianism, or which by implication could be used as a religious excuse for moral compromise, was to him anathema. Antinomianism and quietism were to him "Satan's masterpieces," the using of the principles of religion to overthrow religion.

From an early date in 1739 Wesley was troubled in the FETTER-LANE SOCIETY by antinomian and quietist teaching, and it was this issue which caused him to separate from Fetter-lane, and so from the MORAVIANS, on July 20, 1740 (see Journal Nov. 1, 1739—July 23, 1740). Characteristic of the controversy are the notes for June 5, 1740, "I came to London; where finding a general temptation prevail, of leaving off good works, in order to an increase of faith, I began, on Friday the sixth, to expound the Epistle of St. James; the great antidote against this poison:" and for June 23, "I considered the second assertion, that there is but one commandment in the New Testament, viz. 'To believe;' that no other duty lies upon us; and that a believer is not obliged to do anything as commanded. How gross, palpable a contradiction is this to the whole tenor of the New Testament! Every part of which is full of commandments, from St. Matthew to the Revelation!" It was because Wesley had had fragments of Luther thrown at him in this controversy that he later reacted against Luther's Commentary on Galatians in a not altogether judicious manner (Journal, June 15, 1741). (See FAITH.)

Wesley's systematic teaching on the relation of the Law to the Gospel is largely contained in his Standard Sermons, XXIX, "The Original of the Law"; XXX, "The Law Established Through Faith, i"; XXXI, "The Law Established Through Faith, ii"; and also sermon XLIX, "The Lord our Righteousness," and his first and second "Dialogue Between an Antinomian and his Friend." (Works, vol. x). A summary of his authoritative teaching may be given from sermons XXIX and XXX. Christ set aside the Jewish ceremonial law, and established the moral law on a better foundation (XXIX 2,3). The moral law was declared to man at the creation, and is the glorious representation of the nature of God (XXIX ii). The law of God is pure (iii 2,3). It is certainly not of the nature of sin, but is the detector of sin (4). The keeping of it works the blessing of man (12). The first great use of the law is to trouble the conscience of man, and to convict him that he is a sinner (iv 1). The second is as a stern schoolmaster of divine punishment, to bring him to penitence (2). The third office of the law, forgotten or denied by many, is to keep the evangelical believer alert in his spiritual discipline (3). It reminds him of the sin yet remaining in his heart, and of the need for keeping close to Christ (4-7). The antinomian is sternly warned for his careless language: "Who art thou then, O man, that 'judgest the law, and speakest evil of the law?'—that rankest it with sin, Satan, and death, and sendest them all to hell together?" (8).

In sermon XXX, those who would abolish the sovereignty of the moral as well as of the Jewish ceremonial law over the believer have a zeal but not according to knowledge (3-6). The most usual way to make void the law through faith is not to preach it at all, as is the case with those deeply mistaken teachers who use the phrase "a preacher of the law" as though it were "a term of reproach, as though it meant little less than an enemy to the gospel" (i 1,2). Free forgiveness through "the sufferings and merits of Christ" is not to be offered to careless and impenitent men, but only to those who through the preaching of the moral law of God know themselves to be in need of forgiveness (3). This approach is the Scriptural and apostolic method (4-11). If the comfort of free forgiveness through the Cross is the only thing which is declared to the congregation, without the constant reminder of the unsparing demands of the moral law of God, the preaching of the Gospel will gradually lose its force (12). "A second way of making void the law through faith is, the teaching that faith supersedes the necessity of holiness" (ii 1). Any teaching is most dangerous which can be understood as implying that inward and outward righteousness of life is in some way less imperatively necessary for the "converted" Christian who lives by evangelical grace than it is for other men (2-4). This error, which is a mistaken reaction against Christian phariseism, is entirely contrary to Scripture (5-7). Yet the most common way of making void the law is not to teach it, but simply to do it by a careless and easy-going life (iii 1). The evangelical principles ought to make the believer more zealous for right than he was before (2-4).

Wesley then seriously challenges his hearers to compare in detail the manner of their lives previously, when they were struggling outside the evangelical experience, with what it is now after evangelical conversion. Are they as abstemious, contemptuous of show, luxury, fashion, and the praise of this world, as economical of money and time, as austere and plain-spoken, and as careful to avoid gossip and flattery, as they were then? Are they as regular at Church service and private prayer now as they were then, or do they find themselves kept away by "a little business, a visitor, a slight indisposition, a soft bed, a dark or cold morning"? Are they as earnest in speaking to others of Christ? If any believer finds that he has insensibly "let up" on any of these duties since he came to the evangelical experience, he is on spiritually perilous ground (5-8). Clearly for Wesley sanctification and holiness were not emotional experiences, as an alternative to zealous churchmanship and strict morality. They were a life of unsparing devotional and moral discipline, but empowered by the evangelical experience and the indwelling Spirit. Christian liberty is not escape from the law, but power to obey it.

JOHN LAWSON

LAWRENCE, JOHN (1824-1889), American United Brethren clergyman, soldier, jurist, was born in Wayne County, Ind., Dec. 3, 1824. Although educated in public schools with limited academic training, he was considered one of the most brilliant ministers in the Church. For a time he taught public school in northwestern Ohio. Married twice, his first wife died early in his ministry. In 1843 he joined the Sandusky Conference, Church of the United Brethren in Christ, and became a charter member of the Michigan Conference. He served first as a circuit preacher and later as presiding elder.

Lawrence became assistant editor of the Religious Tele- scope in 1850, and two years later the sole editor. He continued in this editorial office until 1864, when he entered the Union Army as chaplain of the 15th U.S. Colored Troops, and later was made a captain of his regiment.

Following the Civil War he was appointed judge of a Freedman's Court, Nashville, Tenn., and afterwards practiced law in that city. He did not return to the active ministerial service.

A. W. Drury wrote, "He [Lawrence] was one of the most brilliant and most successful editors the Religious Telescope has had." Following Lawrence's death the Nashville Daily American paid him a glowing tribute recounting his many virtues as an attorney and honorable, liberal, patriotic citizen. He was a great writer. Some of his contributions were: Manual of Rules of Order; History of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ (2 vol.); Slavery Question; and Plain Thoughts on Secret Societies. He died in Nashville, Aug. 7, 1889.

JOHN H. NESS, SR.

LAWRENCE, KANSAS, U.S.A. First Church has a history which parallels the history of the state. The stand of Methodist citizens on the question of slavery in the 1840's caused the name "Methodist" to be practically synonymous with "Free State," and many of the immigrants sent out by the North were Methodists. The first such groups arrived in August and September of 1854, and in November of that year the first Methodist service was held in the "Hay Tent," so-called because it was made of hay. The first sermon was preached by a Methodist minister from Missouri. Early in 1855, the Methodist Church was organized as a local society and plans were made for building a stone church but these plans failed to materialize. Meetings were held regularly, however, in homes and other available buildings.

In 1856, a primitive church was erected of rough board sides, canvas roof, dirt floor, and black walnut seats. This building was called "The Tent." It was destroyed by a storm in less than a year. In 1857 a frame building was erected which the Methodists shared with other denominations. It was also used by the city school during the winter. Plans were started in 1862 for a larger church building, but on Aug. 21, 1863, Quantrell and his band of guerrillas raided Lawrence, killing and wounding men and ruining buildings. The seats of the little Methodist church were removed and it was used as a morgue. One hundred fifty men were killed, many of them leading Methodists. In spite of this disaster, plans for a new church continued. This red brick building was much larger than its predecessor and it served Lawrence Methodists for twenty-five years. At the laying of the corner-stone in 1864, the Kansas State Journal reported, "this ceremony has eclipsed any other occasion in our history as a state."

By 1872 plans were made for a much larger church building which would be the largest and finest west of the Mississippi River outside of St. Louis. Work progressed rapidly until the financial panic of 1873, when all construction stopped for fifteen years. But by 1891 the congregation was able to move into the beautiful stone church which with very few exterior changes is still in use. In 1959 the sanctuary was enlarged and a new heating and air-conditioning system was installed. An addition to the north side for religious education was built in 1962. Thus the church has tried to keep pace with the growth of the times and of the town. Membership in 1970 was 2,193.

LAWRENCE, MASSACHUSETTS, U.S.A., is situated on the Merrimac River and is a great manufacturing center on the Boston and Maine Railroad, twenty-eight miles from the city of Boston. That part of the city north of the Merrimac River is in the NEW HAMPSHIRE CONFERENCE.

Methodist work in Lawrence began in answer to a request made of the presiding elder, Elihu Scott, at the Methuen, Mass., Quarterly Conference, May 1846, asking that a preacher be sent to Lawrence. At the ensuing annual conference, James L. Slason was sent with a missionary appropriation of $125. There being no place to meet, Charles Barnes on 5 Broadway opened his own home for public worship. A concert hall was later secured. In 1845, L. D. Barrows became pastor with a $200 missionary appropriation and twenty-three members reported. Bridgeman's Hall on Oak Street was then used until a building was erected on the corner of Haverhill and Hampshire Streets, and the basement was finished for dedication March 26, 1848, with Barrows preaching on the theme, "Worship God!"

A second church appearing in 1853 on Garden Street showed a good growth of spiritual interest and the enthusiastic support of the people. The work was continued faithfully and this church had a good deal of evangelistic interest and missionary spirit. A Sunday school was early started on Bodwell Street, and Seth Dawson was superintendent for many years. In 1880 the church known as St. Mark's was organized, and continues to serve today.

Oaklands, in neighboring Methuen, was also a missionary product of the Garden Street Church, where at Cook's Corner, Miss Mary E. Cook had an important part. It later became the scene of growing Italian work with a church building, a pastor, and fifty-four members.

With the influx of French Canadians around Garden Street, a merger of this church was effected with the Haverhill Street Church in 1910. Both David B. Dow and George W. Farmer were appointed to the new Central Church Society. Preliminary plans were then made for a new church edifice. This was built on Haverhill Street opposite from the "Common," under the pastorate of Edwin S. Tasker, beginning in 1912. This church continues its great ministry in the heart of Lawrence.

For several years in the early 1880's a mission Sunday school was conducted by different denominations in a chapel belonging to the Y.M.C.A. of Lawrence, situated on Lake Street in the Arlington section of the city. With most having Methodist leanings, in April 30, 1891 at a meeting called to consider the matter, the presiding elder, George W. Norris of the Dover District, was asked to organize the society into a M. E. Church. This was done and is now St. Paul's. The Vine Street Church came into the New Hampshire Conference by transfer from the German Conference which had work there then.

statehood, as a joint effort of the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE and Amos Adams Lawrence, a Boston merchant with wide philanthropic, educational, and political interests. The present charter makes the institution's forty-two member board of trustees a self-perpetuating body. Its ties with The United Methodist Church are through a board of twelve visitors, six elected by the EAST WISCONSIN ANNUAL CONFERENCE and six elected by the WEST WISCONSIN CONFERENCE. At least nine are alumni members nominated by alumni.

In 1964 Lawrence College and Milwaukee-Downer College merged to form Lawrence University. It is made up of Lawrence College for Men, Downer College for Women, the Conservatory of Music, and the affiliated Institute of Paper Chemistry. A Phi Beta Kappa society was installed in 1914. Degrees offered are the B.A. and B.M. (Music).

LAWRY, HENRY HASSALL (1821-1906), New Zealand minister, was born in New South Wales and was educated at KINGSWOOD SCHOOL, England, where he was converted. He became a local preacher and entered business in LONDON. Prompted by filial duty, he came to NEW ZEALAND with his father, WALTER LAWRY, arriving in 1844. In the same year, Henry was received on probation and studied Maori under JAMES BULLER at Tangiteroria.

After teaching at the Wesleyan Native Training Institution in AUCKLAND, he became the first missionary at the Pehiakura Station, and for five years covered a wide area of country around the Manukau Harbor. A second scattered circuit (Waima) undermined his health. He was brought back to Wesley Three Kings College, and in 1874 superannuated.

Subsequently, he served with the Auckland Auxiliary of the BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY. He revised and re-edited a Maori book of services. He acted as interpreter in the Maori land court. He was a man of rich and varied experience, wide reading, and deep spirituality.

LAWRY, SAMUEL (1854-1933), New Zealand Methodist minister, was born in St. Mabyn, Cornwall, England, in 1854 and came to NEW ZEALAND at the age of eight. For thirty-four years he was a circuit minister, and then in 1911, he became connexional secretary. This position he held for sixteen years. He was secretary of Conference for seven years, and then president in 1904, and again in 1913, on the occasion of Methodist Union.

Steeped in Methodist tradition, thoroughly versed in Methodist polity and procedure, prominent in the philanthropic and social movements of his time, he gave fifty years of devoted service to his church. He died at Christchurch on July 26, 1933.

LAWRY, WALTER (1793-1859), early missionary to AUSTRALIA, TONGA and NEW ZEALAND, was born at Rutheren, Cornwall, England, on Aug. 3, 1793. Converted in early age, he soon began to preach. He was accepted in 1817 as a candidate for the ministry by the Wesleyan Conference in England and was appointed as assistant missionary in NEW SOUTH WALES. He arrived in SYDNEY in May 1818, and became the colleague of SAMUEL LEIGH.

The situation which confronted them was such that they "agreed to live on two meals a day if they could have another missionary and a printing press." Lawry was stationed at Parramatta, and served there with conspicuous success for four years. He then went to Tonga to commence the Friendly Islands Mission. In 1822 the Tongan Islands had been abandoned by the London Missionary Society because of the ferocity of the natives. Lawry worked amongst them until his health compelled him to retire in 1825, when he went back to England.

For nineteen years he remained in English circuit work. He returned to the Southern Hemisphere in 1843, having been appointed General Superintendent of the Wesleyan Missions in New Zealand, and Visitor of those in Polynesia, an office he held for eleven years. He established the Wesleyan Native Training Institution in Auckland and founded Wesley College and Seminary.

In 1854 he retired from the duties of the ministry because of failing health and settled in Parramatta, New South Wales, where he died on March 30, 1859. His diary (as yet unpublished) is a classic description of life in early Australian history.

LAWS, CHARLES HENRY (1867-1958), New Zealand minister, was born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, England, in 1867, and was brought to NEW ZEALAND at the age of seven. He heard the call to the ministry at an early age, and became the leading preacher of the Methodist Church in New Zealand. Mainly through his advocacy, the New Zealand Conference gained its independence from Australia.

He insisted on better training for ministers and was the driving force behind the building of Trinity Theological College and hostel in Auckland (1929). For a period of eleven years (1920-31) he held the position of principal of the theological college, first at Dunholme and then at Trinity College. Earlier, he was secretary of Conference six times, and president twice—in 1910, and again in 1922. As a leader and administrator he was without peer and as a preacher he belonged to the very front rank. He died in Auckland on Feb. 8, 1958.

LAWSON, ANNA ELIZABETH (1860-1951), was a lifelong missionary to India representing the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. E. Church. She was born in Clio, Iowa, U.S.A., Feb. 2, 1860. At the age of fourteen, she joined the M. E. Church and decided to prepare for service in the church at home or abroad. In 1881, she graduated from IOWA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY and became a teacher in country schools. She was active in church work, including teaching Sunday school classes.

In 1885, she went to India as the first missionary from the Des Moines Branch of the Society. She was appointed to the girls' orphanage in Bareilly. After furlough, she was appointed principal of the Methodist Girls' School at Meerut and remained there throughout her second term, establishing a reputation as a skillful administrator and a beloved servant of the church.

In the terrible famine that came late in the nineteenth century, and continued into the twentieth, she was sent to Phulera, Rajputana, as manager of a home in which hundreds of orphaned children were gathered. Returning from a second furlough, she was again appointed to Rajputana and served as principal of the girls' school in Ajmer. Many girls whose lives were saved by her efforts during the famine were then her students.

Miss Lawson had a flair for business. She early became treasurer of the funds of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society within her annual conference. From her parents' estate she received a legacy which, through her stewardship, became a great asset of the Kingdom. She purchased property in the summer resort of Mussoorie, and made it available for missionary recruits studying Indian languages. She engaged competent instructors to help the missionaries, and was one of the founders of the Landour Language School. She also purchased a cottage in Sat Tal for use by women teachers in Methodist schools, so that they might have the advantage of a rest away from the summer heat of the Indian plains, and share in privileges provided by the Ashrams of E. STANLEY JONES.

In 1951 Iowa Wesleyan University bestowed upon her the honorary L.H.D. degree. A short time later that year she passed away, in her ninety-second year.

LAWSON, JOHN (1909-), the editor of the doctrinal articles in the Encyclopaedia of World Methodism, is a minister of the British Methodist Church. He was born in Leeds, Yorkshire, in which city his family have been Methodists ever since his great-great-grandfather, John Lawson, was converted there in 1802. While a student of agriculture he received a call to preach, and later entered the separated ministry in 1932, receiving his theological education at Wesley House, Cambridge. For twenty years he was employed in the pastoral ministry, chiefly in rural circuits in the eastern counties of England. During this time he wrote his dissertation, The Biblical Theology of S. Irenaeus, and a number of other books, chiefly on Wesley doctrine and general theology. Since 1955 he has taught church history, historical theology, Wesley history, and Wesley theology, at the Candler School of Theology, Emory University, Atlanta, Georgia, U.S.A. Among his more recent publications is A Comprehensive Handbook of Christian Doctrine. He is a firm upholder of the Wesley heritage of doctrine and devotion, and keenly interested in the movement for Christian unity.

LAWSON, MARTIN E. (See JUDICIAL COUNCIL.)

LAWTON, OKLAHOMA, U.S.A., Centenary Methodist Church. Less than two weeks after the official opening of Lawton, on Aug. 18, 1901, B. F. Gassaway, missionary to the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indians, organized the M. E. Church, South, with funds provided by the Board of Missions of that Church. The lot where the congregation met was on the corner of 9th and D, and a canvas tent housed the twenty-four original members. In November, the charge was made a station and the new minister, W. F. Dunkle, Sr., arrived, only to have the tent blown down that very night. Members built a box structure to house the church within the week and, shortly, the new church had an organ, active commissions, an EPWORTH LEAGUE, Women's Societies, a full slate of officers, and a modest parsonage.

During the pastorate of A. J. Worley (1903-04), a new frame structure was built and the canvas windows and homemade seats were replaced by oak pews and stained glass windows. R. S. Satterfield (1905-06) and the rapidly growing church were host to the Oklahoma Conference in 1906, an ambitious project considering the fact that the church had no electricity nor plumbing. Business meetings for the gathering were held in the Ramsey Opera House. From this conference, Lawton sent forth her first ordained minister, R. E. L. Morgan.

On Jan. 21, 1907, during the pastorate of A. L. Scales, the present church site at the corner of 7th and D was purchased. The church built a recreational building during the years of World War I in order to better serve the personnel at Fort Sill. With Wilmore Kendall (1918-21) plans were made and funds procured for the new Centenary M. E. Church, South, so-named because of funds used from the Centenary Fund of the Board of Church Extension (MES) and the War Work Commission of the same Church. Wilmore Kendall worked actively but, because of his blindness, requested a new pastor for the supervision of the actual building, J. D. Salter (1922-24). The cornerstone was laid in 1922, and in 1924 the ladies of the church contributed a pipe organ, kitchen and parlor furnishings, stained glass windows, and church pews.

In 1939, the Northern and Southern Methodist churches of the city united and Centenary members took an active part in the united annual conferences. By 1943, under the pastorate of Forrest A. Fields (1941-48), all loans on church properties were paid off. The Second World War gave an added incentive to the youth program, and it expanded to include junior and senior high groups and a flourishing college and career.

During the pastorate of J. W. Browers, Jr., beginning in 1952, the remodeled sanctuary was dedicated, and the old First Presbyterian Church at 8th and D was purchased to be used as the youth building. Under the leadership of Argus Hamilton, Jr. (1960-64), a modern education-office building was completed.

The 1970 membership of 2,874 continues to reflect the pioneer spirit and Christian concern of the original twenty-four men and women who met in August of 1901 with a dream and a commitment to the future.

LAY DELEGATION (U.S.A.). In the early days of American Methodism, indeed from 1784 until 1872 in the M. E. Church, and until 1866 in the M. E. Church, South, the Annual and General Conferences consisted wholly of ministers. There was no representation from the laity of the church, and the great call and demand for "laity rights" and lay representation was a major one in bringing about the organization of the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH. JAMES R. JOY, who was familiar with early Methodist procedures, stated once that in early Methodism no one was allowed in a conference when it was in session, save its own members. All members were, of course, preachers, and there was no "gallery" for visitors, nor indeed were any visitors allowed. The secrecy of conference proceedings as carried on by ministers alone helped to intensify the call for lay rights.

This was, of course, the Conference plan which the Wesleys in England had been carrying on for many years before American Methodism originated. And it should be admitted that the business of the annual conferences was almost altogether ministerial, as few financial matters came under review. But as the Church grew in strength and in numbers, and as property in churches, in educational institutions, in publishing houses, and the like, was accumulated, the desire became more manifest that the laity of the church should have some voice in arranging its general plans.

Local preachers began the first agitation towards this end, as they felt that in the delegated General Conference—meeting first in 1812—they had been left without any representation, and of course without authority. As discussion spread in the Church a period of great turmoil ensued, and the laity rights movement finally brought about the organization of the Methodist Protestant Church.

During subsequent anti-slavery discussions in the General Conference (after the Methodist Protestants had withdrawn), various matters regarding laity rights also came up. In 1842 a number of persons seceded to form the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH which, like the Methodist Protestants, introduced lay representation into their legislative bodies and rejected episcopacy and the presiding eldership.

When the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH, was formed under the PLAN OF SEPARATION, there was no difference between the episcopal Methodisms in the matter of lay representation. But when the Southern Church reorganized following the Civil War in 1866, there was up for adoption a plan for lay representation to be acted on in the General Conference. That Conference created a special committee to report at the next General Conference (1870) upon the whole matter of lay representation.

The Committee duly recommended this in 1870 with a provision that would admit laymen to the General Conference in equal numbers with ministers; and also recommended that four lay representatives should be elected to each Annual Conference from each presiding elder's district; and that these four should be elected by the newly established District Conference—the District Conference being a strictly southern creation as of that date. It was specifically provided that the lay members were not to vote upon ministerial qualifications or character—and it may be said that lay members never have been allowed to vote upon such up to the present day. In spite of opposition by JOHN C. KEENER, NORVAL WILSON, and LEONIDAS ROSSER, HOLLAND N. MCTEYRE—to be elected bishop by that conference—managed to get the report for lay representation adopted by a good majority.

Later on in the M. E. Church, South, the ratio of lay representation in the annual conferences was changed so that in 1914 eight delegates were allowed to be elected from each presiding elder's district; then in 1926 it became one lay delegate for every 800 church members. When the PLAN OF UNION was finally adopted, this became one lay delegate from every pastor's charge, no matter how large that charge should be, or how small.

In the M. E. CHURCH in 1860, the General Conference adopted a resolution expressive of a willingness to introduce lay delegation into the General Conference "when-ever the Church desired it," and agreeing to submit the question to a vote of the lay members of the church, and also to a vote of the ministry. The vote was taken in 1861-62, in the midst of the excitement of the Civil War, and resulted in 28,000 members in favor and 47,000 against; 1,338 ministers for and 3,969 against. Thus it failed.

After the close of the war the subject was again discussed and the General Conference of 1868 submitted another plan for lay delegation to the consideration of the people. In spite of a great many technical matters which were involved in voting upon the proposed amendments, the result of the vote was a two to one majority for lay representation. The General Conference of the church in 1876—still not quite convinced—ordered the appointment of a committee who should consider, in the interim of the conferences, the question of the expediency of lay delegation. It reported favorably to the General Conference of 1880.

The plan of lay representation as proposed by the General Conference of 1872 and ultimately adopted provided for two lay delegates from each annual conference, except where a conference had only one clerical delegate, and in such cases only one lay delegate was allowed. Lay and clerical members were to deliberate in one body but to vote separately (vote by orders), if such separate vote should be called for by one-third of either order. In such cases both orders had to concur.

General Conference lay delegates were to be elected by an ELECTORAL CONFERENCE of laymen which was to assemble on the third day of the session of each annual conference held previous to a General Conference. The electoral conference was to be made up of one layman from each circuit or station, and there were certain specifications as to age and church membership for them before they could be recognized.

The above provisions continued with slight modifications until 1900, when the M. E. Church adopted a written constitution. This put the election of lay delegates in the hands of a regular lay conference which was then established. This lay conference, as called for in 1900, was something more than the old lay electoral conference which had only met once every four years. It was in effect, a parallel conference to that of the ministers, and was established for the purpose of voting on constitutional amendments—and also of considering and acting upon matters relating to lay activities and such other matters as the General Conference might direct. One lay member from each pastoral charge was to be elected to the lay conference. Clerical and lay members were to meet in united sessions for certain parts of the joint program.

When church union came about between the three Methodist Churches of the United States in 1939, it was evident that lay representation would be continued in much the same pattern as had been the case in the two Methodist Episcopal Churches. However, the Methodist Protestant plan of electing one layman from each charge was put into the Plan of Union, and followed out henceforth. The old electoral lay conference, and the conference of laymen which sat in parallel with the conference of ministers in the M. E. Church, was done away in favor of the plan which the Southern Church had always pursued—that of having laymen actual integrated members of the annual conference itself. At present, therefore, each annual conference is organized with its ministerial membership and its lay membership all sitting in a body and acting together upon all matters in general parliamentary proceedings.

The adoption of Amendment X in The Methodist Church allowed those churches which had more than one minister to send a lay delegate for each effective full-time minister in full connection appointed to their charge. This provision was continued in the Constitution of The United Methodist Church, "Each charge served by more than one minister shall be entitled to as many lay members as there are ministerial members" (Discipline, 1968, P. 36.)

When ministerial character is involved, as admission to Conference or voting to grant ordination to a minister, the lay members are not constitutionally allowed to vote.

Several JUDICIAL COUNCIL decisions came about since 1940 defining matters of lay participation in the annual conference. One of them holds that laymen have no right to call a conference of their own lay delegate membership apart from the annual conference itself unless this is to elect delegates to the JURISDICTIONAL or GENERAL CONFERENCE (decision 74 J.C.); also that the ministerial members of the annual conference may exclude from their meeting place (if they choose to do so) the lay members when a matter of ministerial character is involved (decision 42 J.C.). These decisions were made prior to 1968.

Present regulations. The Constitution of The United Methodist Church provides that whatever be the number of ministerial delegates to the General and Jurisdictional Conferences an Annual Conference is allowed to elect, there shall be "an equal number of laymen." It also provides that in electing laymen to the General Conference, the laymen of the annual conference shall sit and vote as a body in electing their delegates; while the ministerial members sit as a body electing their delegates. Recent General Conferences provided that if a minister is selected to act as spokesman and leader of a delegation in one quadrennium, at the next quadrennium the lay leader of the delegation shall be the leader, and so on alternatively. In the General Conference the laymen and ministers sit together with each delegation assigned its own seats, and laymen and ministers are equally assigned to committees in accordance with the rules of the General Conference itself. Voting can be called for by "orders"—that is the lay members must be polled as lay members, and the clerical members as ministers. Such a vote can be ordered by one-third of either order when one of that order makes such an appeal. The vote by orders is, however, a blocking move, designed to defeat a pending measure. It is never made to further a measure since it is much more difficult in a close decision to carry each order by a majority than to carry the whole house.

Women delegates. Women have been given full laity rights in the Methodist Churches since early in the present century. Their admission to the conferences as lay persons followed the victory of lay representation in both Episcopal Methodisms. The struggle for full laity rights for women in the M. E. Church was concluded victoriously for them when the constitution of 1900 of that church was adopted. However, not until 1914 did the M. E. Church, South allow women to become stewards and enjoy all other lay rights except admission to the conference and ordination. Both these rights were subsequently given. Not until after union and in 1956 did the General Conference pass legislation declaring that "women are included in all provisions of the Discipline referring to the ministry" (Discipline, 1960, P. 303). This allowed women to become members of the annual conference and the traveling ministry if and when an annual conference shall elect such to membership. These rights were carried over into the United Methodist Church in 1968.

E.U.B. Church. The struggle for laity rights in the E.U.B. Church and its antecedent bodies followed much the same lines as it did in the Methodist Episcopal Churches. For the successive steps which led to full laity representation, see the synopses of the General Conferences of these Churches listed under General Conference.

LAY LEADER is the name of an officer of The United Methodist Church. He is, of course, a layman who may be an Annual Conference Lay Leader in which case he is elected by the Annual Conference; or a Charge Lay Leader elected by the Charge Conference and serving in his own local church.

The office of Lay Leader grew out of a need felt by the Board of Lay Activities and kindred agencies in The Methodist Church—and its antecedent Churches—before the Union of 1939. The Constitution of The United Methodist Church makes the Conference Lay Leader a member of the Annual Conference by virtue of his office. He is chairman of the Conference Board of the Laity also by virtue of his office. Annual Conference Boards of the Laity, as they are now, have specified membership, and a definite assignment of work and program upon which they report at each session of the Annual Conference.

In the local charge the Lay Leader, who is elected by the CHARGE CONFERENCE, has the following privileges and responsibilities: membership in the Charge Conference; in the Board of Administration; and in the Council on Ministries. In general, he represents the work of the laity in the local church in all manner of ways. In instances where more than one church is on a charge, the Charge Conference must elect additional Lay Leaders so that there will be one Lay Leader for each church. The Lay Leaders, both in the Local Charge and in the annual Conference, each have certain representative responsibilities which they are called upon to assume at the sessions of these respective bodies. Present duties and responsibilities are outlined in the Book of Discipline. (See also LAY MOVEMENT IN AMERICAN METHODISM.)

LAY MOVEMENT IN AMERICAN METHODISM, THE, officially recognized at the organization of The Methodist Church in 1939 with the creation of a General Board of Lay Activities, is in reality as old as Methodism itself.

From the very beginning of Methodism in England, JOHN WESLEY made use of laymen as preachers and leaders. JOHN CENNICK, THOMAS MAXFIELD, JOHN NELSON and others were among the earliest and best known of these laymen. Furthermore, all the preachers Wesley sent to the new world, including FRANCIS ASBURY, were laymen. It was not until the organizing Conference (the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE) of the M. E. Church in 1784 that the preachers of American Methodism received ordination.

The first three Methodist Societies organized in America on the Wesley plan were founded by laymen. PHILIP EMBURY, a carpenter and teacher, organized the JOIN STREET Society in NEW YORK. Captain THOMAS WEBB of the British Army formed the Society later called ST. GEORGE'S in PHILADELPHIA; and ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE, a farmer, began Methodist Societies in MARYLAND. Nor did the laymen cease their activities following the ordination of the preachers at the conference of 1784. ABEL STEVENS, the nineteenth century historian of American Methodism, comments on their value by writing, "Scores of other preachers and laymen of these times, faithful and invincible pioneers of Methodism . . . men who not only labored before the itinerants arrived, and afterward with them, but provided them food and homes and 'preaching houses,' should be commemorated forever by the Church."

Unfortunately, no official recognition was taken of these laymen. They were not members of the annual conferences and they had no place in the GENERAL CONFERENCES of the Church. They had no organization other than a makeshift "District Conference"—which in the pioneer period did not last long—through which they might exert an influence on the growing church.

Agitation for lay representation in the annual and General Conferences, however, was stirring the church. In 1821 a layman, WILLIAM S. STOCKTON, founded a paper called the Wesleyan Repository and Religious Intelligencer. It was later succeeded by a magazine entitled, The Mutual Rights of Ministers and Members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Stockton, a man of progressive views, fearlessly set forth in his magazine his ideas in favor of lay representation and lay activities. He is said to have been the first person publicly to have advocated lay representation, and in this sense is the father of the movement. EZEKIEL COOPER, second Book Editor of the M. E. Church, contributed to the Repository two articles favoring lay representation—one on the "Question of Lay-delegation" and the other on "The Outlines of a Proposed Plan for a Lay-delegation."

The General Conference of the M. E. Church meeting in 1828 rejected all memorials on the subject, and shortly thereafter the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH was organized. That church provided for lay representation in each of the annual conferences and for an equal number of laymen and ministers in the General Conference.

In 1852, following the bisection of the Church in 1844, the M. E. Church was again agitated by laymen and ministers desiring lay representation. In that year a group of laymen met in Philadelphia to discuss the situation. The Philadelphia Christian Advocate was launched, and the question was debated in its pages. In 1860 the General Conference was swayed by appeals for lay representation to the extent that it passed a resolution stating approval of the general idea "when it shall be ascertained that the church desires it." Pastors were requested to take a vote among their male members over twenty-one years of age "for" or "against" lay representation. The measure was voted down by a ratio of almost two to one. Agitation, however, continued. In 1868 the General Conference approved a plan whereby each annual conference was to be represented at the General Conference by two laymen, and sent the plan to the annual conferences for possible approval. This plan became the law of the church, and in 1872 for the first time in the history of the M. E. Church, laymen sat in the General Conference (see LAY DELEGATION).

Two years previously in 1870 the Southern Church had granted equal representation to ministers and laymen in the General Conference, and had passed a law providing for four lay delegates from each district to sit with the ministers in the annual conferences and be an integral part of it.

The new law in the Northern Church, however, did not abate the clamor for greater lay representation; and agitation for equal representation in the General Conference as well as representation in the annual conferences reached hurricane proportions.

Laymen's Associations. In the meantime on Feb. 19, 1889 a group of Methodist laymen in Philadelphia met at the Arch Street Church in Philadelphia and organized "Philadelphia Laymen's Association of the M. E. Church." Membership was limited to residents of Philadelphia, and they dealt with the questions of "new church buildings," "equal lay representation," "the admission of women to the General Conference," and other kindred subjects. The Association, furthermore, corresponded with laymen throughout the country proposing a convention of laymen to take place in Omaha prior to the General Conference of 1872. The meeting was held, memorials were sent to the General Conference for equal lay representation, and to this end an amendment to the constitution was proposed. The General Conference approved the measure, but it failed to pass the annual conferences.

Another step, however, was now taken by the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE. A convention of laymen met in Norristown on March 9, 1893, where the annual conference was meeting, and formed the Laymen's Association of the Philadelphia Annual Conference, the former Association being formally dissolved. According to Charles F. Eggleston, writing in Pioneering in Penn's Woods, it was the "first Methodist Laymen's Association of any Annual Conference in the United States."

The Association actively promoted similar organizations in other conferences. These Associations continued to agitate for equal representation of laymen and ministers in the General Conference, and by 1900 this goal was achieved.

The next step was to secure equal lay representation in the annual conferences—a measure that was voted down by the annual conferences in 1920 and 1924, but became the law of the Church in 1932.

Southern Church. Ten years previous to this action of the Northern Church, the Southern Church, with a more progressive outlook, had organized a General Board of Lay Activities on Aug. 23 at Lake Junaluska, N. C. J. H. Reynolds was elected General Secretary but immediately resigned in order to continue his work as president of HENDRIX COLLEGE. GEORGE R. MORELOCK was elected to succeed him, and Morelock continued in this position until Methodist union in 1939, and then was elected the first executive secretary of the General Board of Lay Activities of The Methodist Church. He continued in this position until his retirement in 1948.

Northern Church. The Northern Church had not been totally lax in challenging its laymen, but had at the General Conference of 1908 also formed the Methodist Brotherhood. The first Executive Secretary was Fayette L. Thompson, 1908-1912. He was succeeded by WILLIAM S. BOVARD. The General Conference of 1916 placed the responsibility for this work on the Superintendent of the Adult Department of the Board of Sunday Schools and named Bovard as Director. He served until 1920, when he was elected Executive Secretary of the Board of Sunday Schools, and Bert E. Smith was elected his successor. In 1924 the General Conference formed four boards into the BOARD OF EDUCATION and Bovard was then elected as Executive Secretary of this board. Smith was elected as Superintendent of Adult Work of the Board of Education and served in that capacity from 1924-1934. He was also Director of Men's Work, an adjunct of the Board of Education. EDGAR T. WELCH was the first president of this commission. He was succeeded by Judge H. R. Snavely who served up to the time of unification in 1939.

Steps in Cooperation. On Feb. 28-29, 1928, in LOUISVILLE, Ky., an "All Methodist Conference on Men's Work" was held involving representatives of the M. E. Church, South, and M. E. Church. Out of this conference came the Joint Commission of Men's Work. This commission held its first meeting in Louisville on Dec. 27, 1928. JOHN R. PEPPER was elected president, Edgar T. Welch, vice president, and H. R. Snavely, secretary. This commission formed a Joint Men's Council which later became the Inter-Methodist Men's Council. The Inter-Methodist Men's Council held its first meeting in Louisville Dec. 5-6, 1929.

Toward Unification of Lay Work. When it became apparent that the M. E. Church, M. E. Church, South, and the M. P. Church would unite, a meeting of responsible persons in Lay Activities and Men's Work of the three denominations was called on April 6, 1938 in St. Louis, Mo. At this meeting the group unanimously approved the idea of a General Board of Lay Activities as an autonomous administrative arm of the united church. Approval was also given to organize Boards of Lay Activities in annual conferences and districts. The Official Board was to be the arm of lay activities in the local church.

A Steering Committee on Lay Activities and Men's

Work was set up to direct further procedures toward union. The Steering Committee drafted a communication to the Commission on Union dealing with the matter of Lay Activities and Men's Work. On April 26, 1939 in KANSAS CITY, Mo., the Uniting Conference approved the organization of a General Board of Lay Activities as an official agency of The Methodist Church, U.S.A.

The General Conference of 1940 fixed the headquarters of the General Board in Chicago, Ill. In 1962 headquarters were moved to Evanston, Ill. George L. Morelock was elected the first executive secretary, a position he held until his retirement in 1948. Chilton G. Bennett was elected his successor, serving from 1948 until 1951. E. Lamont Geissinger served as acting executive secretary during 1951-52. ROBERT G. MAYFIELD was elected General Secretary in 1952, and served until 1968.

The General Board of the Laity. At the 1968 Uniting Conference, the General Board of Lay Activities (as it had been) of The Methodist Church and the Department of Christian Stewardship and the general organization of Evangelical United Brethren Men of the former E.U.B. Church were united under the name General Board of the Laity. (Paragraph 1183, Discipline, 1968.) This was mandated to operate under the charter of its own incorporation and the Discipline of The United Methodist Church "to hold and administer trust funds and assets of every kind and character . . . and to develop and promote a program in keeping with its objective and functions." These functions are stated to be "that all persons be aware of and grow in their understanding of God, especially of his redeeming love as revealed in Jesus Christ, and that they respond in faith and love—to the end that they may know who they are and what their human situation means, increasingly identify themselves as sons of God and members of the Christian community, live in the spirit of God in every relationship, fulfill their common discipleship in the world, and abide in the Christian hope." (Paragraph 1186, ibid.)

The organization of the new Board was provided for by the Discipline of 1968 and it was greatly enlarged over what the old Board had been. It was empowered to function through two divisions—the Division of Lay Life and Work and the Division of Stewardship and Finance. Lay Life and Work is directed to function through two sections: the Section of Lay Ministries, and the Section on United Methodist Men. Detailed directions for the proper administration of these and other divisions of the General Board of the Laity will be found in the current Discipline. Stewardship and Finance is heavily stressed.

In each jurisdiction there may be a Jurisdictional Board of the Laity auxiliary to the general board, as the Jurisdictional Conference may determine.

Annual Conferences are each directed to create a Conference Board of the Laity auxiliary to the general and jurisdictional board, and to follow through the general program of the whole Church in this field.

A Conference lay leader shall be elected annually by the Annual Conference on nomination of its particular Board of the Laity. The duties of this office are carefully outlined in the Discipline as are the duties of the Charge Lay Leader.

It is also directed that there shall be a Conference organization of United Methodist Men which is auxiliary to the general, jurisdictional, and conference Boards of the Laity. This organization is designed to supplant and enlarge the work of the old former Methodist Men as this organization was known in The Methodist Church.

District Boards of the Laity are called for in regarding the general plan of work for these. As with other boards of the Church, general regulations governing this board may be changed by succeeding General Conferences in minor particulars from time to time.

LAY PASTORS. In the late nineteenth century some British LOCAL PREACHERS were paid to assist circuit ministers, though without securing the training, status, allowances, and security of the ministers themselves. They were known variously as "hired local preachers," "lay agents," and "lay pastors," the latter becoming their official designation. Their employment was considered a necessary expedient in the Methodist Church after METHODIST UNION in 1932, though it was viewed with increasing misgivings. They were accepted and appointed by the HOME MISSION DEPARTMENT, usually from the ranks of accredited local preachers, and served four years on probation, pursuing a directed course of studies, before being accepted on an approved list. The lay pastor was expected to wear civilian attire, and was subject to the jurisdiction of the LOCAL PREACHERS' MEETING of the circuit to which he was appointed. After earlier attempts had been made to eliminate this "second class ministry," or at least to reduce its numbers, the Conference of 1947 urged circuits no longer to employ them, and this exhortation was re-emphasized by the Conference of 1963. Many of the former lay pastors were able through special training to gain acceptance to the regular ministry, and the Minutes of Conference no longer officially recognizes the standing of any except those who have retired in that work, whose names are listed. LAYMEN'S ASSOCIATION, FIRST. (See LAY MOVEMENT IN METHODISM.)

LAYTON, (MISS) M. E. (1841-1892), was the first missionary of the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY sent to an appointment in INDIA outside of the original India Mission field in Oudh and Rohilkhand. She started the Calcutta Girls' School on its great career of service. Originally its students were mainly Europeans and Anglo-Indians. Now they represent many racial and creedal communities, and the school contributes powerfully to both the national strength and to church growth. She was born in Delaware, U.S.A., February 1841, and died at Cawnpore, India, April 28, 1892.

LAZENBY, MARION ELIAS (1885-1957), American minister, missionary, editor, and church historian, was born at Forest Home, Butler Co., Ala. Feb. 8, 1885. He was licensed to preach in 1906; was admitted into the ALABAMA CONFERENCE in 1907, and was appointed at that Conference to CUBA, where he served as pastor of the Trinity Church, Havana. Returning to his home conference, he served as pastor of several churches. In 1922 he became editor of the Alabama Christian Advocate, and in 1928 he transferred to the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE and continued as editor until 1935. After serving as district superintendent and as pastor, he went to CHICAGO in 1943 to become assistant editor of the Christian Advocate. Returning to ALABAMA in 1949, he was for one year superintendent of the Huntsville District before being recalled to the editorship of the Alabama Christian Advocate. In 1953 he retired and was asked to write the History of Methodism in Alabama and West Florida. This last—a monumental task—was accepted by the conference shortly before Lazenby's death on Sept. 12, 1957, at Montevallo, Ala.

LEADERS, LEADERS' MEETING. The CLASS MEETING arose in BRISTOL in 1742 as financially expedient, and rapidly developed into a valuable pastoral instrument, with the leader of each class not only collecting small weekly contributions for society expenses, but admonishing and encouraging his (or her) members. Otherwise their title might well have become "collectors" rather than "leaders." By about 1744 the CLASS LEADERS were exercising this pastoral oversight, not chiefly by visits to the homes of those members on their class list, but by conducting a weekly fellowship meeting for them. Many who thus began as class leaders developed sufficient theological acumen and eloquence to become LOCAL PREACHERS. The office of class leader was one which offered large scope for women as well as men.

The leaders brought the money which they had collected to the STEWARDS of their society, and in early years this took place weekly. Gradually this led to a regular meeting of stewards and leaders with the minister or his preaching helpers in order to discuss the spiritual welfare of the society, and this became known as the Leaders' Meeting, comprising the preacher in charge (in the chair), the stewards (the executive officers), and the class leaders. Throughout Wesley's lifetime the leaders' meeting possessed only advisory powers, and Wesley himself, or his preaching helpers, made the real decisions. The conference of 1797 for the first time gave the leaders' meeting the right of veto in the admission of members and in the appointment of the leaders themselves, thus slightly reducing the prerogatives of the preachers. The spiritual influence of the class leaders was very high indeed, but their administrative power remained very limited. The undercurrent of dissatisfaction about this was one of the factors in the rise of most of the major disputes within Wesleyan Methodism. Most of the daughter bodies reduced ministerial prerogative and increased the power of the lay leaders, and gradually this liberalizing tendency affected the parent body also. At METHODIST UNION in 1932 this was unequivocally written into the constitution of the new Methodist Church. The local Leaders' Meeting now possesses much greater authority, having complete oversight of the spiritual welfare of the society, including the appointment of leaders and stewards, and the admission and discipline of members.

LEBANON VALLEY COLLEGE, Annville, Pennsylvania, U.S.A., is a college of The United Methodist Church, formerly of the E.U.B. Five citizens of Annville attended the East Pennsylvania Conference, Church of the United Brethren in Christ, in 1866, and offered an Academy building there valued at $5,500, for an institution of learning. It was accepted, but no one could be found to operate the new school. There was no college graduate in the entire conference. G. W. Miles Rigor, who had attended college for three years, enlisted his neighbor, Thomas R. Vickroy, a Methodist minister and graduate of DICKINSON COLLEGE, to join him in a joint partnership and take over the lease. Thus on May 7, 1866, the school opened as scheduled with Vickroy running the school, Rigor as agent, and fifty-nine coeducational students.

Vickroy's term saw eleven acres added to the "lot and a half of ground" conveyed by the original deed. A spacious four-story building was erected. A charter was granted by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. A complete college curriculum was established, based on the classics but including music and art, and two classes were graduated before Vickroy gave up his lease and moved west in 1871. At that point, it was decided that the College would not be leased again but would be operated henceforth by a board of trustees.

The five presidents during the next twenty-five years had great difficulty in keeping the College afloat, due to lack of support ranging from open opposition to disinterested apathy. A library was established in 1874, and a college newspaper appeared in 1888. However in the fall of 1896, the school was debt-ridden, with an enrollment of only eighty.

The administration of President Hervin U. Roop, starting in 1897, marked the first real period of expansion. Under his leadership five new buildings were erected, including a library donated by Andrew Carnegie, and the administration building was re-built after the disastrous fire of Christmas Eve, 1904. By 1905, enrollment had soared to 470, with a faculty of twenty-three.

Loss of public confidence and financial support prompted Roop's resignation in 1905 and the College faced its darkest days. Bankruptcy was averted by the keen business sense and generosity of President Laurence Keister, who served from 1907 to 1912.

President George D. Cossard finally gave the College stability when he achieved for it accreditation and a million dollar endowment fund. By the end of his twenty-year term in 1932, there were 653 students and thirty-two members of the faculty.

Clyde A. Lynch, who came in 1932, faced a series of external crises during his eighteen years as president. The stock market crash shrank the handsome endowment raised by his predecessor; the Depression of the 1930's shrank the enrollment, followed by World War II; the post-war influx of returned war veterans then stretched it to more than capacity. Lynch's administration started the policy of buying property adjacent to the campus to allow for future expansion, and also raised over a half million dollars, part of which was to be used for a new physical education building. This building was named in Lynch's honor upon completion.

The twelfth and latest president of the College, FREDERIC K. MILLER, served for almost seventeen years. During his term, inflation caused mushrooming costs, but the so-called "Tidal Wave of Students" made possible selective admissions. The greatest physical expansion in the history of the College then occurred, with seven new buildings erected and several renovated. Two major fund-raising drives were successfully concluded. Enrollment increased by eighty percent, with a corresponding increase in faculty and administrative staff. The centennial of the founding of the College was observed by a year-long series of events. Miller became the first Commissioner for Higher Education in the State of Pennsylvania.

At the start of its second century, as a fully-accredited, church-related, coeducational college of the liberal arts and sciences, Lebanon Valley occupies a thirty-five acre campus and twenty-eight buildings, and has a full-time enrollment of 838 students and a faculty of seventy-two members. A Master Plan for its development has been adopted by the Board of Trustees.

W. EARL LEDDEN

LEDDEN, WALTER EARL (1888-), American bishop, was born in Glassboro, N. J., March 27, 1888, the son of Joseph Jackson and Miriam Riden (Higgins) Ledden. He graduated from Pennington, N. J., Seminary, Music Department (organ) in 1907. In 1910 he received the Ph.B. degree and in 1913 the A.M. from DICKINSON COLLEGE. He was awarded the B.D. by DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in 1913 and in 1913-14 did graduate work at Drew University. From SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY, in 1927, he received the D.D. degree and, in 1944 was given the LL.D. degree by Dickinson College. In addition to these degrees and honorary doctorates, he is widely recognized as an accomplished organist and an authority on church music.

Ledden was married to Lida Iszard July 2, 1913 (deceased October 1957). They had two sons and a daughter.

Bishop Ledden was on trial as DEACON, NEW JERSEY CONFERENCE, 1912, and received in full connection as ELDER in 1914. He served as pastor of the Goodwill Church, Rumson, N. J., 1910-14; the First Church, Belmar, N. J., 1914-19; State Street Church, Camden, N. J., 1919-20; Broadway Church, Camden, N. J., 1920-26; Richmond Avenue Church, Buffalo, N. Y., 1926-30; Mathewson Street Church, Providence, R. I., 1930-38; and Trinity Church, Albany, N. Y., 1938-44.

He was elected bishop and assigned to the Syracuse Area in 1944 and served as bishop of this area until his retirement in 1960. He was president of the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS, 1956-57, and has served in many other important capacities, including chairman of the Interboard Committee on Missionary Personnel; chairman, Interboard Committee on Materials for Training in Church Membership; vice-president, BOARD OF EVANGELISM; vice-president, COMMISSION ON WORSHIP; member, BOARD OF WORLD PEACE and BOARD OF MISSIONS; member of the executive committee of the Commission on Family Life.

He was on the Division of Christian Life and Work, NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES; and from 1945 until 1949 he was president of the New York State Council of Churches.

He has been trustee of Drew University, Syracuse University, Folts Home for the Aged, Williamsville Home for Children, and Clifton Springs Sanitarium.

He represented the Council of Bishops in visitation in Central and South Africa in 1948, and in South America in 1954.

On Jan. 25, 1964, Bishop Ledden was married to Henrietta Gibson in the chapel of Christ Church, Methodist, New York. An unusual feature of the ceremony was that the marriage rites were performed by Bishop HERBERT WELCH, one hundred and one years of age, believed to be the world's oldest bishop, who was assisted by HAROLD A. BOSLEY, minister of Christ Church.

After his retirement Bishop Ledden joined the faculty of WESLEY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY where he taught in the field of Ritual and Church Music. He has continued to work closely with the NATIONAL FELLOWSHIP OF METHODIST MUSICIANS. He and his wife presently reside in Syracuse, N. Y.

LEDNUM, JOHN (1797-1863), American minister, historian and member of the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE, was born in Sussex County, Del., Nov. 15, 1797. He died in Philadelphia, Nov. 18, 1863. He was converted at nineteen years of age and became an itinerant in the spring of 1823. Considered by his colleagues as a "profitable preacher" and as a "theologian of the first class," he is, nevertheless, chiefly remembered for his book, A History of the Rise of Methodism in America . . . from 1736 to 1785. The book contains some errors, but, for the most part, it is accurate. Making no attempt at a literary style, Lednum presented his material in terse, factual statements. It is one of the recognized sources on early Methodism in America.

LEE, ADA HILDEGARDE JONES. (See CALCUTTA, India, Lee Memorial Mission.)

LEE, ANNA MARIA (1803-1838), American missionary pioneer, was born in New York City, Sept. 24, 1803, the daughter of George Washington and Mary (Spies) Pittman. With a group of missionaries she sailed from Boston, July 29, 1836, by way of Cape Horn to Honolulu, arriving the day before Christmas. In April she continued her voyage to OREGON, and arrived at Fort Vancouver, May 17, 1837.

She wrote many poems. When JASON LEE, founder of the first mission in Oregon, asked her to be his wife, she gave her answer in a poem, "Yes, where thou goest I will go."

Their wedding Sunday, July 26, 1837, was the first marriage of a white man and white woman in the Oregon Country.

In the spring of 1838 Jason Lee was urged to return to the United States to report on the work, and try to secure more support. Before he left, she gave him another poem, "Must my dear Companion leave me./Sad and lonely here to dwell?"

Her son died soon after birth, and she died the next day, June 26, 1838. She was buried in the beautiful fir grove where she had taken her marriage vow. Her body has since been moved to the Lee Mission Cemetery at SALEM, Ore.

LEE, BENJAMIN FRANKLIN (1841-1926), American bishop of the A.M.E. Church, was born in Gouldtown, N. J., on Sept. 18, 1841. He graduated from WILBERFORCE UNIVERSITY in 1872 with the B.D. degree. He was ordained DEACON in 1870 and ELDER in 1872. He was a theological professor at Wilberforce University (1873-1875), and later was President of Wilberforce (1875-1884). He was also an editor of The Christian Recorder (1884-1892). He was elected bishop in 1892, and retired voluntarily in 1924. He was a delegate and member of the Permanent Committee of Arrangements of the ECUMENICAL METHODIST COUNCIL in 1881.

His voluntary retirement in 1924 was noted as remarkable since he was the only bishop of his Church ever to do so. He was austere in appearance but had a keen sense of humor; was a man of deep learning, impatient of petty ambitions and jealousies. Bishop Wright said of him, "He seldom sought honors. 'They are too empty,' he said, 'but I do seek service.'" He answered in the same manner when someone asked, "Dr. Lee are you running for the Bishopric?" His answer was, "No, but I am standing for it." He has churches named for him at Jacksonville, Fla.; Cincinnati, Ohio; Nashville, Tenn.; Little Rock, Ark.; Morgan City and Oak Grove, La. and Brownwood, Texas.

LEE, DANIEL (1807-1896), was an American missionary to the Indians of OREGON, 1834 to 1843. No account is given of his early life but in 1833, as a member of the NEW HAMPSHIRE CONFERENCE, he was commissioned by the Foreign Missionary Society of the M. E. Church as a missionary to the Indians of Oregon. The commission came from the Foreign Missionary Society because the U. S. Claim to the Oregon country was not established until 1846. He was to work under the superintendency of his uncle, JASON LEE.

In the spring and summer of 1833 the mission party of five men made the arduous six-month journey across the plains and mountains to Oregon, travelling in company with Nathaniel Wyeth's fur traders.

In Oregon the main mission station was established in the Willamette valley about ten miles north from where SALEM, the capital city of Oregon, is now located. Here Daniel Lee carried his full share of the hard labor needed to build log houses for the mission, and prepare wild land for farming. The missionaries were largely dependent on their own efforts to feed themselves and the Indian children in their school.

In 1838 Jason Lee gave Daniel the difficult job of opening a second mission station at the Dalles of the Columbia River. Under his direction this station was the most successful of the missions in the Indian work. He continued his work there until 1843, when his own ill-health and that of his wife (in June 1840 he had married Marie Ware, a newly arrived mission teacher), forced him to return to New England. There he published, in collaboration with another returned missionary, J. H. Frost, a history of the Oregon mission, Ten Years in Oregon (N. Y.: 1844), a book which did much to inform the church about the Oregon mission.

After some years of labor in the churches of the New Hampshire Conference, ill-health caused him to relocate. Shortly after he followed his sons westward where in OHIO, KANSAS and ILLINOIS he served small churches as his strength permitted. He died in Illinois, and he and his wife, who died some years before him, are buried near Butler, Ill.

LEE, DAVID HIRAM. (See CALCUTTA, India, Lee Memorial Mission.)

LEE, EDWIN FERDINAND (1884-1948), American missionary bishop, was born in Eldorado, Iowa, July 10, 1884, son of Andrew and Carrie (Anderson) Lee. He received his education at NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY (B.S., 1909) and GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE (B.D., 1924). He was awarded five honorary doctorates. He married Edna Dorman on June 8, 1909.

Lee joined the UPPER IOWA CONFERENCE in 1908, and his appointments were: New Hampton, Iowa, 1908-10; missionary to Batavia, Java, and pastor of Wesley Church, Kuala Lumpur, MALAYA, 1910-12; Central Church, MANILA, Philippines, 1912-15; Rockford, Iowa, 1915-17; and chaplain in the U. S. Army in France, 1917-19. He was decorated by the French Government for his war service and by the government of Serbia for his relief work after the Armistice, and was given the King George V Jubilee Medal in 1935.

Lee was Associate Secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions in New York, 1919-24, and pastor of Wesley Church, Singapore, Straits Settlement, and superintendent of the Singapore District, 1924-28. Elected MISSIONARY BISHOP of Malaya and the Philippines in 1928, he served as such until he retired.

Bishop Lee was a delegate to the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY CONFERENCE, Madras, India, 1938; a Fellow of the Royal Geographic Society, London; member of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, New York.

Caught in Singapore when the Japanese attacked the city in December 1941, Bishop and Mrs. Lee and fifty missionaries held out as long as possible against leaving the country. Just before the city's fall, Lee broadcast a message of hope assuring the people of America's ultimate victory. The Lees were evacuated on Jan. 30, 1942, with the Japanese only seventeen miles from the city.

He served as director of the General Commission on Army and Navy Chaplains in 1944. He returned to Malaysia and the Philippines after the war and re-established Methodist churches and schools. He expressed great hope for the future of Christianity in that area.

Retiring in June 1948, after forty years of unusual service around the world, Bishop Lee died Sept. 14, 1948.

LEE, HANDEL (Li Han-to, 1886-1961), preacher and seminary president, was born in Kiangningchen, Kiangsu province, CHINA, and received his education at the University of Nanking, Nanking Theological Seminary, BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, and DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, receiving the Ph.D. at Drew in 1933. After pastorates in Wuhu and Nanking he was appointed district superintendent in the Central China Conference (later called the Mid-China Conference) in 1927, and was elected president of the union (Methodist, Presbyterian, Disciples, and Baptist) Nanking Theological Seminary in 1931. He held this position until his retirement in 1949.

Under his administration the seminary greatly enlarged its activities. During the Japanese War the seminary moved its main center to Shanghai, where it continued even after the attack on Pearl Harbor. Another branch of the seminary was opened in Chengtu, the educational center of Free China, and continued until the end of the war, when both branches were reunited on the Nanking campus.

Lee's wise leadership, both in his own church and in interdenominational activities, strengthened the church in central China to meet the difficulties of the Communist period, and the seminary which he headed for eighteen years is presently the only theological seminary still continuing in mainland China.

FRANCIS P. JONES

LEE, JAMES WILDERMAN (1849-1919), American clergyman and author, was born in Rockbridge, Ga., Nov. 28, 1849. A graduate of Emory College, he joined the NORTH GEORGIA ANNUAL CONFERENCE, M. E. Church, South, in 1874. He married Eufaula Ledbetter in 1875. He served churches in this conference intermittently a total of nineteen years, among them, Trinity Church, ATLANTA.

Lee transferred to the ST. LOUIS CONFERENCE in 1893, and was appointed to St. John's Church, St. LOUIS, where he served with distinction three separate appointments, 1893-97, 1901-05, 1911-15. He was presiding elder of the St. Louis District 1897-1901, and Chaplain of Barnes Hospital, 1916-19.

Lee joined with Dr. Wagner of the M. E. Church to edit and publish the short-lived Illustrated Methodist Magazine (1902-03), in expectation of promoting fraternity and the ultimate union of the two Episcopal Methodisms. Under his leadership the present magnificent St. John's Church was built (1902-03), which the city listed as something visitors to the St. Louis World's Fair should by all means see. It is one of the finest examples of classic Roman Temple architecture in the United States.

His journeys to Palestine for study, begun in 1894, resulted in Lee's writing The Romance of Palestine, Footprints of the Man of Galilee, and A History of Jerusalem. Three of his books received warm praise and wide circulation—Robert Burns, The Geography of Genius, The Making of a Man, which was translated into several languages, and The Religion of Science, the theme of which was the oneness of truth in science and religion. It placed Lee among the foremost "harmonizers" in the period of "science" versus "religion" controversy.

The catholicity of his spirit and his instinctive humanitarianism gave support to the many missionary, educational and charitable enterprises with which he was associated in the cities of St. Louis and Atlanta, and in the annual conferences of the Church. Lee died in St. Louis, Oct. 4, 1919, as the result of a fall at the home of his son, Ivy Ledbetter Lee, in Rye, N. Y. He was buried in Bellefontaine Cemetery.

LEE, JASON (1803-1845), American pioneer of Protestant Christianity and United States territorial aspirations in the area of the present states of Oregon and Washington. He was born near Stanstead, Lower Canada (thought at that time to be south of the boundary and part of the U. S.), June 28, 1803, the son of one of the Minutemen who fought at Concord and Lexington. His ancestral roots reached back 200 years in Massachusetts.

JASON LEE

At the age of twenty-three he was converted in a Wesleyan Methodist revival, and in 1829, in preparation for the ministry, he entered Wilbraham Academy, Wilbraham, Mass.

In response to a request from four northwest Indians who in 1831 travelled to St. Louis asking about the white man's religion, a plea publicized through the church press, WILBUR FISK, President of WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, recommended Jason Lee to lead a missionary journey to that area. Lee accepted an appointment from the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church and gathered a party including his nephew, DANIEL LEE, Cyrus Shepard, a teacher of Lynn, Mass., and two other laymen, P. L. Edwards and Courtney M. Walker, both of Independence, Mo. The expedition's goods were shipped around Cape Horn to the Columbia River, and the party, consisting of seventy men in all, plus 250 horses, mules, and cattle, was led overland by Nathaniel J. Wyeth, a fur trader of the Rockies.

At Fort Hall, near the present city of Pocatello, Idaho, Jason Lee preached the first Protestant sermon heard west of the Rocky Mountains on July 27, 1834. After a kindly reception by P. C. Pambrun, Hudson's Bay official at Fort Walla Walla (now Washington), on September 1, the party traveled by barge down the Columbia River, arriving at Fort Vancouver, 100 miles from the Pacific, September 15. Upon advice of John McLoughlin, Chief Factor of the Hudson's Bay Company on the Pacific coast, Lee established his mission on the east side of the Willamette River about sixty miles above its confluence with the Columbia.

Their desire to convert the Indians of the area was frustrated by difficulties of communication and, before long, by catastrophic illnesses which heavily decimated the tribal population. The INDIAN MANUAL LABOR TRAINING SCHOOL for the natives was established, and on its discontinuance in 1844 the building was sold to another institution also founded by Lee—the Oregon Institute, which later became WILLAMETTE UNIVERSITY, the first school of college rank west of the Rockies.

Lee opened Christian work at various places, including a mission at The Dalles, on the Columbia River, in 1837. He encouraged the emigration of Christian families to the OREGON country as a means of bringing civilized and Christian influences to that raw society.

Jason Lee early became involved in the political development of the northwest, urging measures which would settle in favor of the United States the long-standing dispute with England over the boundary. He was instrumental in drawing up a petition, signed by American citizens and Canadians who desired to become American citizens, asking that the laws of the U. S. be extended over Oregon. In the course of his journey east with this petition he learned that his wife, ANNA MARIE LEE, had died in childbirth, the child also perishing. After two years' absence from Oregon, time spent in persuading governmental and church leaders of the urgency of development of the Oregon territory, Lee returned west by ship, with thirty-one new missionaries, including his new wife, the former Lucy Thompson, of Barre, Vt.

As the Oregon mission grew, it became increasingly occupied with white settlers, the Indian population having substantially diminished. Lee was deeply involved in the political controversy over British or American possession of the territory. The dispute also divided the missionaries, and JOHN P. RICHMOND, a critic of Lee's political intervention, persuaded the Mission Board to replace Lee as superintendent of the mission. Lee learned of this action in November 1843, in the Sandwich Islands, to which he and his daughter (his second wife had died in 1842) had travelled in hopes of securing a ship to New York.

Lee continued his dual role as political pioneer and Christian missionary by going to Washington in an attempt to persuade officials of the need for urgent action to establish American sovereignty in the Oregon territory, and by appearing before the Mission Board and successfully defending the administration of the mission. In failing health, he returned to his boyhood home in Stanstead, Canada, where he died March 12, 1845.

Jason Lee must be counted as a strong influence in the spread of Protestant Christianity to the Pacific Northwest, and in the securing for the United States the area south of the 49th parallel—the Puget Sound Country, Cascade Mountains, and the great watershed of the Columbia River. Cornelius J. Brosnan has summarized these achievements:

Consider Lee's visit in 1838 to the East, with his lectures in 85 cities and towns, including the capital of the nation; his meetings and lectures promoted by a great and influential denomination . . . ; consider Slacum's widely quoted report; consider the Second Petition or Memorial of the Oregonians, framed at Lee's Mission House; the introduction of the Linn Bill; of Cushing's elaborate report, embodying two Lee documents, with a publication and distribution of 10,000 copies; consider the fact that Lee's widely attended and published lectures dwelt upon the desirability of the Pacific Coast as a place of settlement and thus assisted in awakening an interest that sent the Peoria Party to Oregon in the spring of 1839, and was a factor in bringing between eight hundred and a thousand settlers . . . ; consider the Provisional Government of Oregon and the important part Lee's Mission had in its inception and promotion; consider that experienced politicians saw in the movement for an American Oregon vitality enough to make it an issue in a presidential campaign on the basis of our claims to that territory. When all these contributions are appreciated one cannot doubt that, though incidental and not primary, the Lee Mission was a significant factor in the settlement of the Oregon boundary controversy.

JOHN C. SOLTMAN

LEE, JESSE (1758-1816), early American preacher, father of Methodism in New England and commonly regarded as next to ASBURY in influence, was born on March 12, 1758, in Prince George County, Va., sixteen miles from Petersburg. His father was converted under DEVEREUX JARRATT, an evangelical Anglican who in the beginning days cooperated with Asbury and the Methodist movement. This led to the conversion of Jesse Lee. His education was limited but he attended a singing school and became a good singer.

He joined the Society in 1774 under ROBERT WILLIAMS, who was then serving the Brunswick circuit, which included Halifax and Bute Counties in NORTH CAROLINA as well as fourteen counties in VIRGINIA. Three years later Lee went to North Carolina to take temporary charge of the farm of a widowed relative, and there he became a class leader, exhorter, and local preacher. He preached his first sermon at a place called "the Old Barn" on Sept. 17, 1779.

JOHN DICKINS was on the Roanoke Circuit and in order to devote time to literary work he asked young Lee to take his place for a few weeks, and thus began Lee's career as a traveling preacher.

In July 1780, Lee was drafted into the army. He had scruples against war and refused to take the rifle that was offered him. Placed under guard, he prayed with his captors and was soon singing and preaching to them. He was willing to perform any unarmed duty and so he was made a wagon driver and became a sergeant of pioneers and unofficial chaplain. He was honorably discharged after serving three months.

In 1782 he rode a circuit in North Carolina and Virginia and was admitted to the Conference on trial the following year. He did not receive word of the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE, which he always regretted and attributed to the fact that FREERBORN GARRETTSON, the courier sent to summon the preachers, had preached too much along the way.

His first appointment, in 1783, was to the Caswell Circuit, after which he served five years in North Carolina, Virginia, and MARYLAND. In 1785 he went from Salisbury, N. C., to meet Asbury at the home of Colonel Joseph Herndon in Wilkes County. Asbury had been a Superintendent (later called bishop) for only a month, and he appeared in "black gown, cassock, and band," whereupon Lee objected to the attire as unbecoming to Methodist simplicity. The rebuke caused Asbury to lay aside the regalia.

Asbury took Lee with him on his southern tour. At Cheraw, S. C., a young man from MASSACHUSETTS described the low state of religion in New England and Lee determined to go there. In 1790 he preached under "the Old Elm" on Boston Common and gave the next ten years of his life to New England, where he became the virtual founder of Methodism.

Jesse Lee weighed 250 pounds and on at least one occasion he used two horses, leading one and changing from time to time. He was elected to deacon's orders in 1786 but declined ordination; however, at the conference of 1790 in NEW YORK he was privately ordained DEACON by Asbury, and publicly ordained ELDER the following day.

In 1797 Asbury called Lee to assist him in the work of the episcopacy and at the General Conference of 1800 he expected to be elected a bishop and had some reason to think that Asbury encouraged the hope. But he was defeated by RICHARD WHATCOAT. This he attributed to Asbury, to whom he later wrote a scathing letter of denunciation. He had previously made attempts to reduce Asbury's power and on one occasion THOMAS COKE objected to the passage of Lee's character. But when on May 10, 1816, the funeral procession of Asbury, including the whole GENERAL CONFERENCE and an immense throng of citizens, moved through the streets of BALTIMORE, among the leading marchers and mourners was Jesse Lee.

In 1801 Lee returned to the South as presiding elder in Virginia, and except for a roving commission as far southward as Savannah, he spent the next fourteen years in his native state, where he bought a small farm near his father.

In 1809 Lee was elected chaplain of the U. S. House of Representatives and was reelected four times. In 1814 he was elected chaplain of the Senate. The next year he was transferred to the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE and sent to Fredericksburg, a move which he considered to be a political maneuver to prevent his election to the General Conference. He refused to go to the appointment because it was not then in his conference.

Jesse Lee in 1810 published A Short History of the Methodists in the United States of America, the first ever written. The Conference would not sponsor it and the author secured subscriptions for its publication. It seems that Asbury was not favorably inclined, but when he had seen the book he wrote, "It is better than I expected. He has not always presented me under the most favorable aspect; we are all liable to mistakes, and I am unmoved by his."

Lee also wrote a life of John Lee, his brother, and he published two sermons. He kept a voluminous Journal, which was destroyed when the Publishing House in New York was burned in 1836; Asbury's Journal was lost in the same fire. Fortunately, much of Lee's work was preserved in the biography written by his kinsman, LEROY LEE.

Jesse Lee died on Sept. 12, 1816, while attending a CAMP MEETING near Hillsborough in Maryland. He was laid to rest in the old Methodist burying ground in Baltimore, but in 1873 his body was moved with others to Mount Olivet Cemetery where it rests today by that of Asbury, Bishops GEORGE, EMORY, and WAUGH, ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE and other stalwarts of early Methodism.

LEE, LAWSON (1918-), missionary to URUGUAY, was born in Homestead, Okla. He studied at Oklahoma Northwestern College at Alva, SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY, and the University of Southern California. He held pastorates at Alva, Arnett, Terral, Mutual, and Enid, all in Oklahoma.

Lawson and Sylvia Lee came to MONTEVIDEO in March, 1948. They worked one year as assistants in CENTRAL CHURCH while learning Spanish. In 1949 they went to Paysandu, Uruguay, where they took a dying church and made it into a going concern. They built a church and parsonage from Lawson's own plans. In an outlying district, St. Luke's Church was founded.

In 1962 the Lees were transferred to Montevideo, and he became executive secretary of The Methodist Church in Uruguay and later mission treasurer for Uruguay, as well as interim minister of Emmanuel Church. In 1966 he was appointed one of the two ministers of Central Church, keeping his two executive positions as well.

Lee's interests range from painting pictures to making plans for churches or assembling electronic organs.

EARL M. SMITH

LEROY M. LEE

LEE, LEROY MADISON (1808-1882), American minister, editor and leader of Southern Methodism, was born at Petersburg, Va., on April 30, 1808. He was the son of Abraham and Elizabeth Lee and was related to JESSE LEE, whose biography he was later to write. He was converted in Petersburg on April 1, 1827, under the preaching of W. A. SMITH and admitted to the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE in 1828, then in session at Raleigh, N. C., under Bishop SOULE. As eastern NORTH CAROLINA was then a part of the Virginia Conference, Lee served several appointments in that state, including New Bern, later being moved to Trinity, Richmond, where his parsonage was destroyed by fire in 1835. Never robust, he was recuperating from a spell of illness shortly after this in FLORIDA, and while there was elected editor of the Christian Sentinel, a paper which had just been purchased by the Virginia Conference. For reasons of health he dropped out of the editorship for several months, but eventually came back and resumed the editorship of the publication which was now named the Richmond Christian Advocate—a paper destined to last under that name until 1940 when it became the present Virginia Christian Advocate.

LeRoy Lee kept his name "at the masthead of this for nearly a quarter of a century." He became a stalwart champion of the Southern point of view, and was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1844, which divided the Church; of the LOUISVILLE CONVENTION the next year; and of the first General Conference of the M. E. Church, South, in Petersburg in 1846. He declined reelection to the editorship in 1858 and was made presiding elder of the Norfolk District, but the Federal fleet taking possession of NORFOLK on May 10, 1862, ended his work there for a time.

Later Lee served Centenary Church, Lynchburg; Granby Street in Norfolk; Union Station, RICHMOND; and served as presiding elder two terms, and then spent one year at Ashland, in part acting as a chaplain of RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE there until he retired in 1881. Lee, besides his voluminous editorial writings, published in 1847, Life and Times of Jesse Lee, his distinguished kinsman.

Lee—who was given the degree of D.D. by Transylvania College in 1848—married first Nancy Mosely Butler of Elizabeth City, N. C., who died the following November. Afterward he married Virginia Addington in 1836 and to them were born nine children.

The action for which Lee became most famous was his move in the 1870 Conference of the M. E. Church, South, to so arrange it that the power of the Southern bishops to "check" an action of the General Conference was made a properly constitutional provision, and not (as it had been since its adoption in 1854) a merely statutory one. Lee's old pastor and mentor, W. A. Smith, had written and sponsored the adoption of the statutory resolution in 1854, but Smith himself realized the legislation was not constitutional and should have personally made a move to see that it was made constitutional had he not died. LeRoy M. Lee was chairman of the Committee on Episcopacy of General Conference of 1870, and brought in a statesmanlike report of which Bishop DuBose says, "The report of Dr. Lee on this provision has become one of the great State papers of Methodism. It is, in fact, a priceless dissertation on the constitution and particularly stresses the rights of the body of the elders, from whom the constitution was derived (or rather their successors, the clerical and lay members of the present-day Annual Conferences) to determine the processes by which unconstitutional acts of the General Conference may be arrested." (DuBose, p. 113-4.). The upshot was that this whole matter was passed by the General Conference and referred for approval to the Annual Conferences. They adopted it and thus this constitutional provision as drawn up by Lee was firmly written into the organic life of the M. E. Church, South, to remain there until union with the M. E. and M. P. Churches in 1939. Lee acted as chairman of the powerful Committee on Episcopacy both in 1870 and in 1874. He died in Ashland, Va., on April 20, 1882, and was buried in Virginia's famed Hollywood Cemetery overlooking the James River in Richmond.

LEE, LIM POON (1910-), American lay leader among California Oriental United Methodists, was born in Hong Kong, Dec. 19, 1910. At the age of eight months he and his parents came to the United States to make their home. He was educated in the SAN FRANCISCO public schools, graduated from the UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC in 1934 with an A.B. degree, did graduate work at the University of Southern California from 1934 to 1936, and received a LL.B. degree from Lincoln University School of Law, San Francisco, in 1954. He was in the U. S. Army, 1943-46; and served with the Counter Intelligence Corps in the Philippine Islands and Hokkaido, Japan. From 1939 to 1963 he was in public welfare and juvenile court work in San Francisco. He was field representative for Congressman Phillip Burton, San Francisco, from 1963 to 1966. In 1966 he became acting postmaster of San Francisco and in 1967 was made postmaster, in which position he directs the work of over 10,000 postal workers. He has been a member and chairman of the board for the Department of Veteran Affairs in CALIFORNIA; as chairman he presided over the board that determined policies for 1,021 civil service personnel, and administered an annual budget of $15 million. He has been very active in the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and has served as vice chairman of the National Legislative Committee. He is a member of the Chinese United Methodist Church in San Francisco, and has been lay leader of the California-Oriental Provisional Annual Conference. He teaches a church school class each Sunday, and is the church's lay leader. He serves as board member for the Chinese Branch of the YMCA; Telegraph Hill Neighborhood Center; Columbia Park Boys' Club; the Greater Chinatown Community Service Association; the Multi-Culture Institute, and is a member of the Chinese Cultural Foundation which is building the Chinese Culture and Trade Center in San Francisco; he is the co-chairman of the Mayor's Committee on Survey and Fact-Finding in Chinatown. He and his wife Catherine were married in 1941, and have four children.

WALTER N. VERNON

LEE, LUTHER (1800-1889), American preacher, was born of illiterate parents in Schoharie, N. Y., Nov. 30, 1800. He joined the Methodist Church at the age of nineteen, and could barely read the Bible or hymn book, even after becoming a local preacher. On July 31, 1825, he married a school teacher, Mary Miller, and they had five sons and two daughters. She gave him all the education he ever received.

Joining the GENESEE CONFERENCE in 1827, when it extended into CANADA and the roads and trails could be traveled only on horseback, he was assigned to Malone Circuit. Ordained DEACON and ELDER a few years later, Lee served charges in Henvel, Lowville, Martinsburg, Watertown, and Fulton, N. Y., 1831-36. Transferring to the BLACK RIVER CONFERENCE in 1836, he rose rapidly to a place of leadership. A fighting reformer, a powerful debater, the growing anti-slavery agitation captured his interest. After the assassination of Luther Lovejoy at Alton, Ill., in 1837, he declared himself an abolitionist. In 1838 he located and became an agent in New York for the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society. In 1840 he took part in organizing the Liberty Party.

At the organization of the WESLEYAN METHODIST Connection in 1843, he entered their traveling ministry and was president of their first General Conference in Cleveland, Ohio, in 1844. He was editor of the True Wesleyan for eight years, and served as pastor of Wesleyan churches in Syracuse, and Fulton, N. Y., and Felicity and Chagrin Falls, Ohio. His last Wesleyan position was professor in ADRIAN COLLEGE, 1864-67.

With many others he returned to the M. E. Church in 1867, and for ten years served the Court Street Church, Flint; Ypsilanti; Northville, and Petersburg charges in Michigan.

Luther Lee was the author of several valuable books which had a large sale. Among these were, Universalism Examined, Systematic Theology, Immortality of the Soul, and Autobiography of Luther Lee, D.D.

Superannuated in 1877, Lee died in Flint, Mich., Dec. 13, 1889.

LEE, THOMAS (1727-1786), British Methodist, was born at Keighley, Yorkshire, in 1727. As a young man, while working only half-time as an evangelist, he was able to establish societies where no itinerant had yet been. Eventually he became one of WILLIAM GRIMSHAW's preachers in the Haworth round, and then a regular itinerant from 1755 until his death in 1786, traveling around the huge northern circuits. He was one of the most heroic of the early preachers, and often he and his wife suffered terrible persecution and hardship.

UMPHREY LEE

LEE, UMPHREY (1893-1958), American preacher, educator and author, was born in Oakland City, Ind., March 23, 1893. He went to Texas when his father, Josephus Lee, transferred there in 1910. He was educated at Trinity College (A.B., 1914), SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY (M.A., 1916), and Columbia University (Ph.D., 1931). He served several pastorates before going to the University of Texas to establish the Wesley Bible Chair in 1919.

In 1923 he became pastor of Highland Park Methodist Church, DALLAS, Texas, on the campus of Southern Methodist University; it became one of The Christian Century's "Great Churches of America," and by 1960 was the largest in the denomination. During this time he also served as professor of homiletics of S.M.U.'s School of Theology and from 1937 until 1939 he was dean of the VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY School of Religion.

In 1939 he became president of Southern Methodist University and by 1954, when he left the presidency to become chancellor (because of health problems), the university's endowment had increased by $20,500,000 and eighteen new buildings had been erected. He was credited, more than any other individual, with molding the university into the great institution it had become at the time of his death June 23, 1958.

Above and beyond his official posts, he was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1934, 1940, 1944, 1948, the Uniting Conference of 1939, and the ECUMENICAL CONFERENCES of 1946 and 1951. He was the Cole Lecturer at Vanderbilt University (1946); Quillian Lecturer at EMORY UNIVERSITY (1947); Fondren Lecturer at Southern Methodist University (1957). Also he was President of the Civic Federation of Dallas, President of the Dallas Rotary Club, and President of the Philosophical Society of Texas.

Umphrey Lee was author of the following books: Jesus the Pioneer (1926); A Short Sketch of the Life of Christ (1927); The Lord's Horseman: John Wesley (1928), which was revised in 1954; The Bible and Business (1930); Historical Backgrounds of Early Methodist Enthusiasm (1931); John Wesley and Modern Religion (1936); The Historic Church and Modern Pacifism (1943); Our Fathers and Us (1958).

During the years that Umphrey Lee was pastor of the Highland Park Church he was engaged in research projects in Europe toward his volumes pertaining to JOHN WESLEY. At home and abroad he was recognized as one of the interpreters of the Arminian tradition and the Wesleyan movement.

He held membership in the Medieval Academy of America, the American Historical Society, the American Society of Church History, and the Philosophical Society of Texas. Excelling as scholar, author, preacher, speaker, lecturer, and columnist, he was universally acclaimed by his colleagues for his pre-eminence among the ministers of Texas in his generation.

CHARLES A. SAUER

LEE, WILLIAM BOWMAN (1864-1955), American preacher and missionary to BRAZIL, was born in Newbury County, S. C., on July 16, 1864, son of a Methodist preacher. Having lost both parents in childhood, William Lee was forced to work for a living early in life. He united with the Methodist Church at sixteen; studied at Painesville, S. C., then moved to Durham, N. C., where he continued his studies while working with the Duke industries. He was esteemed by the Duke family and married a niece of the family, Mamie Fonville, on May 28, 1891. Deciding to become a preacher, he earned his B.D. degree in theology from Trinity College, and was ordained a deacon at the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE in 1893.

Accepted by the Board of Missions (MES), the Lees sailed for Brazil in 1895. Through long years in Brazil, Lee served as pastor, presiding elder, professor of mathematics at INSTITUTO CRANBERY, and later as Reitor (principal) of the same school; and he was for a time editor of the official weekly, Expositor Cristão. He also translated articles, hymns, and the Methodist Discipline of 1910, and the History of the Church, by Williston Walker. He was author of a book of sermons and a volume on The Teachings of the Prophets. He served on several church-wide committees, including the one on autonomy of the Methodist Church of Brazil. At first he had difficulty mastering Portuguese, but he later became the most fluent and eloquent of all missionaries, and was especially loved for his close identification with the Brazilians.

Mamie F. Lee, his wife, taught for some years at Instituto Cranbery, and was a director of Colegio Mineiro. She is best remembered as the founder in June 1900, of the Joias de Cristo (Christ's Jewels), the first missionary society for children in Brazil. Under her inspiration and leadership, these children's societies helped raise funds to support Hipolito de Campos, Brazil's first missionary to Portugal.

Four children were born to the Lees—Wesley, Mary, Lucy, and William. After his wife's death in July, 1944, Lee married the widow of Michael Dickie—Julia Coachman, also an effective worker in the church. Before her death in 1956, she edited Aleluias, a new hymnal which the Methodist press published. Lee retired in Brazil, died in São Paulo in his daughter Lucy's home, and was buried in the Santo Amaro Cemetery.

LEE, WILSON (1764-1804), pioneer American preacher, was born in Sussex County near Lewes, Del., in November 1764. He was converted at the age of seventeen and entered the traveling ministry in 1784. He was probably a member of the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE, and was Bishop WHATCOAT'S assistant for one year. On the Allegheny circuit in 1784, situated among the mountains of WEST VIRGINIA with no defined limits, he crossed the lofty ranges many times.

Redford wrote of him: "Reared in the midst of refinement and surrounded with the luxuries of life, his manners polished and possessing talents of a high order, Lee might have achieved eminence in any profession." His neatness of attire and habits, his love, his consuming zeal and excellent voice commanded respect. With an ardent spirit but with slender physical resources, Wilson Lee hazarded his frail body for nine years in the roughest frontier circuits of West Virginia, PENNSYLVANIA, KENTUCKY and TENNESSEE.

His early charges were Allegheny circuit, 1784; Redstone circuit, 1785; and Talbot, 1786. Spending six years in Kentucky and middle Tennessee, Lee's frontier circuits were from the Monongahela to the banks of the Ohio—Kentucky, Slat River, Green River, Great Barrens, and Cumberland River—in which stations there was great savage cruelty and frequent deaths. Wilson Lee apparently had great success in the vicinity of NASHVILLE, Tenn. The first church building was erected of stone in 1789 or 1790—now McKendree Church, Nashville. Two of Lee's converts were General James Robertson, the founder of Nashville, and his wife.

In 1793 Lee came east, and in 1794 went to New England. He was pastor of JOHN STREET CHURCH, New York, 1795; St. GEORGE'S, Philadelphia, 1796-99, and presiding elder of the Baltimore District, 1801-03. A fervent spirit, he lost his health in 1804 and was superannuated, dying October 11 of that year. He was buried in Anne Arundel County, Md.

Henry Boehm wrote, "I heard Lee preach in 1797 at St. George's when he was stationed there. He was a tall, slender man, had a musical voice and his delivery was very agreeable. He was one of the great men of Methodism and a great favorite of Mr. Asbury."

LEE, JESSE, PRIZE was established by the Association of Methodist Historical Societies to encourage research and publication in the field of American Methodism. It is part of the program of awards, which includes grants-in-aid, administered by the Awards Committee of the COMMIS-SION ON ARCHIVES AND HISTORY. In response to annual announcement of competition for the prize, numerous manuscripts of book length have been submitted. Awards were made as follows: in 1967 to Lewis M. Purifoy, "Negro Slavery, the Moral Ordeal of Southern Methodism"; in 1968 to Lester Scherer, "Ezekiel Cooper, an Early American Methodist Leader," and in 1970 to William B. Gravelly, "Gilbert Haven, Racial Equalitarian." The prize was made a biennial affair in 1970.

LEEDS, England. In 1740 JOHN NELSON heard JOHN WESLEY preach in Moorfields, London, and returned to Birstall, near Leeds, to share his experience. By 1742 his evangelism had spread to Armley; and here WILLIAM SHENT heard him, brought by his wife, Mary, who had been converted at John Nelson's door. Shent invited Nelson to Leeds, and there he preached outside Shent's barber's shop in spite of threats to kill him. This shop, at the bottom of what is now Briggate, became the headquarters of a society that numbered fifty when John Wesley first visited it on April 8, 1743. The house was licensed for Methodist worship on April 7, 1746, and remained the center of Methodism until the first chapel was built in 1751. This chapel was built around the house of a basket-maker, Mathew Chippendale; and when it was roofed over, the old house was pulled down and the debris thrown through the chapel window. It got the name of the "old Boggart House" because it was supposed to be built in a haunted area. Shent continued his barber trade; his preaching and accounts exist today (in the handwriting of the steward, Thomas Hey, the eminent surgeon), noting payment to Shent of 7/6 a quarter for shaving the preachers, and a similar sum was spent on kneecaps for John Wesley. John Nelson died in 1774.

After his wife's death Shent "fell into sin" and was turned out of the society. An eloquent letter to the Keighley society restored him, but in 1787 he died a drunkard. Methodism had taken firm root in Leeds, however; one hundred years later the vicar of Leeds wrote "the de facto established religion is Methodism." The Boggart House was the only chapel until Albion Street (1802); then Isle Lane (1815), Wesley Meadow Lane (1816), Brunswick (1825), St. Peter's (1834), and Oxford Pace (1834) were built. Of these only BRUNSWICK remains as it was. For about a hundred years these chapels remained fairly full, and revivals kept them so. In 1794 a thousand members were added, and another thousand in 1838, under the preaching of John Rattenbury. Numbers rose between 1797 and 1840 from 2,460 to 8,079.

There were also reversals. Leeds took part in the controversies which followed Wesley's death, and added a few of its own. Most Leeds Methodists were originally "Church Methodists" and held their services at 7 A.M. and 5:30 P.M. to avoid the hours of service of the parish church. It was freedom from establishment which led the builders of Albion Street out of the Wesleyan connection in 1802. ALEXANDER KILHAM's reforming party sent seventy of its members to the Wesleyan Conference which met in Leeds in 1797. Not being able to agree, they withdrew to Ebenezer Chapel (bought from the Baptists) and began an independent existence as the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION.

A more severe reversal began with the proposal in 1826 to build an organ in the new Brunswick Chapel. This was the start of the Leeds Organ Case. When the Conference of 1827 overruled an adverse vote of the District Meeting, seventy of the Leeds local preachers and leaders went on strike against the plan, and in the end more than a thousand members left the Leeds circuits and set up the PROTESTANT METHODISTS. When controversy broke out again in 1849 as a result of the FLY SHEETS agitation, the WESLEYAN REFORMERS began in Leeds with a huge tea meeting, in which "a thousand persons partook of the beverage." Two thousand members left the Wesleyan Methodist societies in the course of this controversy. In 1857 these joined with the Protestant Methodists and others to form the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES. At about the same time the Church of England, under the leadership of the famous Vicar of Leeds, Walter Farguhar Hook, reorganized and reanimated itself. Hook rebuilt the parish church, and with it twenty-one other churches, twenty-seven schools, and twenty-three vicarages. He won many back to the Established Church.

PRIMITIVE METHODISM first entered Leeds on Nov. 29, 1819, when WILLIAM CLOWES opened a mission. In a single year the membership of the Primitives was 984, but it was three years before the first chapel was built at Quarry Hill. By 1830 forty preaching places were on the plan, and by 1932 there were nine circuits, though some of these were single-minister stations. As a consequence of the FORWARD MOVEMENT, Oxford Place Chapel became the head of a new circuit in 1891, and three years later SAMUEL CHADWICK was sent to be superintendent of the "new mission." Thirty thousand pounds was spent on remodeling the premises, and in his twelve-year ministry the membership rose from 294 to 957. Aggressive evangelism and social work went hand in hand, and tracts were distributed every week to 2,500 houses. Chadwick went to Cliff College in 1907, and in 1910 George Allen began another great ministry of ten years.

Brunswick Chapel had an Indian summer dating from the ministry of A. E. Whitham, who began to preach there in 1918. He had musical and poetic gifts which enriched his sermons. Brunswick began to grow, and in 1925 LESLIE D. WEATHERHEAD began there a ministry of eleven years, in which it was necessary to be at the church door an hour before time if one wanted a seat. He removed to the London City Temple in 1936 and was succeeded by WILLIAM E. SANGSTER. On the day that war started in 1939, Sangster began his term in London. None of the large Leeds city congregations survived the war intact, and Brunswick was no exception. In an effort at reorganization, Brunswick and Oxford Place Chapels were placed together in a new central circuit. A team ministry, committed to serve the city, hopes in the redevelopment of the city center to build premises fit for mission to the twentieth century. But Leeds has been no exception to the rule that the Methodist churches in the inner belt of the industrial cities have declined sharply since 1932, and this decline has been only partly compensated by growth among the suburban societies.

LEESBURG, VIRGINIA, U.S.A., thirty-eight miles northwest of Alexandria, is the county seat of Loudoun County.

Settled in 1749 and incorporated in 1758, it was probably named for Francis Lightfoot Lee and Philip Ludwell Lee, local landholders who were among the town's first trustees. The town still has some old houses of stone and brick with ivy-clad walls shaded by elms and oaks, and doorways with massive knockers.

Prior to 1769 Methodism flourished in four places in America—New York; Philadelphia; Sam's Creek, Maryland; and Leesburg, Virginia. The Methodist Society in Leesburg is regarded as the oldest in the state, and presumably it began under the leadership of ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE or some of his local preachers. In the early days Leesburg was one of the towns nearest to Sam's Creek where Strawbridge, according to Asbury's Journal (April 30, 1801), built the first Methodist chapel in America.

SITE OF OLD STONE CHURCH, LEESBURG,
FIRST METHODIST CHURCH PROPERTY IN AMERICA

The Old Stone Church. On May 11, 1766, the Methodist Society purchased a half-acre lot in Leesburg for "no other use but for a church and meetinghouse and graveyard." The Old Stone Church, as it came to be known, was begun in 1766, completed in 1770, and dedicated free of debt, June 24, 1790. The earliest dated tombstone in the Old Stone Church cemetery is 1777. It stands at the grave of Captain Wright Brickell who was converted at Norfolk under JOSEPH PILMORE. Brickell was one of the original BOOK STEWARDS of the Methodist Societies in America. RICHARD OWINGS, the first native-born Methodist local preacher in America, died at Leesburg in 1786, and he and a number of other prominent Methodist preachers are buried in the cemetery.

When the 1796 GENERAL CONFERENCE designated six annual conferences with geographical boundaries, the "northern neck of Virginia," including Leesburg, became a part of the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE. When the M. E. Church divided over slavery in 1844, the Baltimore Conference adhered North. However, in 1848 more than half the members of the Old Stone Church in Leesburg decided to affiliate as a congregation with the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE (MES). For a few years the two groups worshipped alternately in the Old Stone Church, but in 1850 a lawsuit ensued and the court ruled that the church belonged to the M. E. Church because that body had held title to it since 1766. In 1853 the members who adhered South built their own church.

As time passed the Northern membership in Leesburg dwindled, and in 1894 the Old Stone Church was abandoned. In 1897 the Negro congregation of the WASHINGTON CONFERENCE (ME) in Leesburg instituted and lost a lawsuit for possession of the Old Stone Church. In 1900 the parsonage adjoining the church was sold for $416.05, and in 1902 the Old Stone Church was torn down. The communion table was then given to the Leesburg Southern church as the descendant congregation of the Old Stone Church group which adhered South in 1848.

Today the Old Stone Church Site and Cemetery, designated as one of the historic SHRINES of American Methodism by the 1964 General Conference, is the property of the Virginia Methodist Historical Society.

Recent History. The Leesburg Southern Church continued as an appointment in the Virginia Conference until 1861 when the Baltimore Conference (ME) divided into northern and southern branches. The Leesburg church then adhered to the Old Baltimore (southern) part of the conference. As is well known, that wing of the Baltimore Conference was officially received into the M. E. Church, South at the 1866 General Conference and it continued as the Baltimore Conference of that denomination until unification in 1939.

As a strategic town in northern Virginia, Leesburg was involved in the Civil War, and the church suffered, but in after years it grew, had distinguished pastors, and was regarded as a strong, cultured, conservative appointment in the Baltimore Conference (MES). One feature of the church program in comparatively recent years has been a summer union Sunday evening service in front of the Loudoun County Courthouse with the square largely filled with worshippers, some of them passersby who stop for the service at the county crossroads.

At unification, Leesburg and all of the Virginia territory of the Baltimore Conference (MES) became a part of the Virginia Conference (MC), and when the Arlington District was formed in 1962, Leesburg, which had been in the Alexandria District for many years, fell within the new district.

In 1969 the Leesburg Church reported 725 members, property valued at $274,500, and $32,836 raised for all purposes.

LEETE, FREDERICK DELAND (1866-1958), American bishop, was born at Avon, N. Y., Oct. 1, 1866, of English Puritan and French Huguenot ancestry. He was the son of Menzo Smith Leete, under whom he was converted in a revival at thirteen. A grandson of Alexander Leete, the bishop was the eighth descendant from William Leete, Colonial governor of Connecticut. Frederick Leete was educated at SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY (A.B., 1889; A.M., 1891), and held the honorary D.D., LL.D., and LL.D. degrees. He married Jeanette Fuller on July 28, 1891, and they had three children.

Leete united with the NORTHERN NEW YORK CONFERENCE in 1888 and was appointed to Dryer Memorial Church, Utica, 1888-91. He served as Y.M.C.A. Secretary, Utica, 1891-94; First Church, Little Falls, 1894-98; Monroe Avenue, Rochester, 1898-1903; University Church,

FREDERICK D. LEETE

Syracuse, 1903-06; Central Church, DETROIT, Mich., 1906-12. He was elected bishop in 1912 and assigned to the ATLANTA Area, 1912-20; the INDIANAPOLIS Area, 1920-28; and the OMAHA Area, 1928-36, when he retired.

Bishop Leete was a member of three ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCES, 1911, 1921, 1931, and was president of the Ecumenical Council of the Americas and Orient, 1931-44. He was a life member of the American Historical Association; a Fellow of the Royal Society of Arts, London.

Bishop Leete served on every commission that dealt with church union prior to 1939, and was said to be one of the most creative minds of the Northern commission. Bishop Moore wrote, "Bishop Frederick D. Leete was one of the most valuable members of the Commission. He spoke always with directness and understanding, and his suggestions, motions and decisions contributed greatly to working out the plan of Union. By his long ministry in prominent pastorates in the Northland, his discerning episcopal service in the Atlanta area, he had acquainted himself not only with the mind of his own church but with the necessary position and requirements of the Church, South. . . . He met the issues with deep insight, clear vision, broad churchmanship, calm courage and genuine statesmanship." (Long Road to Methodist Union, p. 128.)

Leete's Methodist Bishops, published in 1948, contains interesting facts about 250 Methodist bishops. Though the accounts are not always accurate in minor matters, it is a valuable collection of biographies.

Bishop Leete's personal "Methodist Bishops' Collection," containing nearly all the books and pamphlets written about the 250 bishops covered in his book and including some 4,000 letters from bishops, has been housed at SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY, along with his rare library of Methodist historical material.

Bishop Leete died on Feb. 16, 1958.

LEEWARD ISLANDS (district of the METHODIST CHURCH IN THE CARIBBEAN AND THE AMERICAS), formerly referred to a group of British islands in the Eastern Caribbean, including St. Kitts (properly called St. Christopher), Nevis and Anguilla, Antigua and Montserrat. St. Kitts, Nevis and Anguilla form a self-governing associated state within the British Commonwealth, though Anguilla in 1968 refused to recognize the connection with St. Kitts and Nevis. Antigua is also an associated state. The term "the Leeward Islands" also includes Guadeloupe which is an overseas department of France.

The Methodist district includes the above mentioned, though there is no work on the island of Guadeloupe, and also St. Eustatius, which forms part of the Netherlands Antilles, and St. Martin (St. Maarten), which is partly a French possession, and partly within the Netherlands Antilles. In addition, the district includes the British associated state of Dominica, geographically the most northerly of the Windward Islands; the American and British Virgin Islands and Aruba and Curaçao, in the Netherlands Antilles, 500 miles to the southwest off the coast of Venezuela. Its work is carried on in English.

Antigua, the headquarters of the district and of the MCCA, is the subject of a separate article.

The broad lines of development throughout the district are similar, though there are variations from one island to another. In most places, lay Methodist initiative preceded the visits of THOMAS COKE and the stationing of the first British ministers. A period of rapid expansion despite opposition, was followed in the 1820's by a decline in membership. The liberation of the slaves in British colonies in 1834, occasioned some political disturbance from which the church suffered, and in the mid-nineteenth century, economic depression in the West Indies led to emigration from the smaller islands, while the internal struggle of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Britain led to the withdrawal of some missionary staff. Nevertheless, the church gradually expanded during the late nineteenth and twentieth centuries, and in some islands, such as Tortola in the British Virgin Islands, Methodism came to form the largest Christian community. The Leeward Islands District (then known as the Antigua District) was incorporated into the autonomous West Indian Conference in 1884, despite the opposition of its chairman and a majority of members of the synod.

Methodism entered Curaçao about 1930, when a local preacher named Obed Anthony began preaching in a hired hall, and in the open air. He and his followers later entered the Dutch Protestant Church, but a Methodist minister was stationed in Curaçao from 1945. Meanwhile, in Aruba, Methodist services and prayer meetings had been begun by Thomas Markham, a local preacher from Montserrat, and others. The first minister, W. J. Barrett, was appointed in 1939, and was transferred to Curaçao in 1945. The first Methodist minister in St. Croix, American Virgin Islands, was appointed in 1967.

In 1967 the district became a founder member of the METHODIST CHURCH IN THE CARIBBEAN AND THE AMERICAS. It has maintained throughout its history connections with other parts of the Caribbean area and of world Methodism.

Methodism was introduced into St. Kitts by Lydia Seaton, a servant who had lived in the house of Frances Turner, one of NATHANIEL GILBERT's converts in Antigua. The first Methodist community, which Thomas Coke visited in 1787, 1789 and 1805, included the editor of the local newspaper, named Cable, and a jeweller named Bertie. WILLIAM HAMMETT was stationed in St. Kitts by Coke, and followed by THOMAS OWENS and others. A schism, led by an Anabaptist local preacher and a former missionary, divided the church in 1806, but a revival took place about 1815. The church contained at this time an unusually high proportion of white members. Relations with Anglicans in the 1820's were tense, but the Methodist community was by far the largest denomination on the island. Education made slow progress, and support by missionaries from Britain diminished. A second revival took place in 1870, after a long period of decline, but lives and property were lost from time to time through fire (1867), hurricane (1871) and flood (1880). The first Kittitian minister, Alban E. Belboda, began work in 1913. During the period of the West Indian Conference (1884-1904), the St. Kitts District became distinct from the Antigua District. From 1904, when the Leeward Islands District was created, to 1950, the chairman of the district resided in St. Kitts.

Coke's first visit to Nevis in 1787 was unsuccessful, but the island was visited soon after by William Hammett, and Thomas Owens was stationed there after Coke's second visit in 1789. On this occasion, Coke held in Nevis a conference of West Indian staff. A chapel was built in Charlestown, the main town, in 1790, with the support of prominent planters such as the cousins Richard and Walter Nisbett and William Brazier. By the time of Coke's third visit, in 1793, the church had 400 members in Charlestown alone. In 1797, controversy on moral issues between the minister and some planters led to an attempt to burn down the church, and there were further attacks on the church in 1816. Local leadership was difficult to maintain, and membership ebbed and flowed in Nevis as elsewhere. Wesleyan Methodist discipline aroused some opposition. The abolition of slavery caused less disturbance in Nevis than in St. Kitts, and churches were crowded by the mid-1830's. A further period of decline in mid-century was followed in 1861 by a revival of the Obeah cult. Under a succession of capable ministers, the Church was steadily built up until the period of the autonomous West Indian Conference (1884-1904). It was from Nevis that William Claxton and William Powell emigrated to Guyana in 1802, to establish Methodism there.

Methodism was brought to Anguilla by one of its own citizens, John Hodge, who returned home in 1813, to find no minister of any denomination on the island. Two years later, a missionary from St. Barts (St. Bartholomew) visited Anguilla, to find that Hodge had gathered around him a Methodist community of 250 members. The deputy governor of the island paid public tribute to his work in 1817, and he was ordained in 1822. During the years of economic depression, most Methodists remained faithful to the church, and the island has made a disproportionately large contribution to the ministry and deaconess order.

Before Coke's first visit to the Dutch Island of St. Eustatius (Statia) in 1787, a class of twenty Methodist members had been gathered by a Negro slave, converted in North America, and known as "Black Harry." At first he was allowed to preach freely, and the Dutch governor went to hear him, but later his influence over his fellow-slaves aroused the apprehension of the white planters, and public preaching was forbidden. Coke preached privately to the authorities, and organised six classes during a two weeks' visit. On his return at the end of 1788, Coke found that Black Harry had been banished, and an edict prohibiting public prayer was in force. Nevertheless, Coke baptised 140 people. William Brazier of St. Kitts was sent to lead the Methodist community, but he was soon driven from the island. Within a year Coke returned, to receive a personal rebuff from a new Dutch governor, though Methodists were allowed to meet privately. No minister was appointed to the island until Myles Coupland Dixon arrived in 1811, but under his successor, Jonathan Raynar, (1815-1818), St. Eustatius became a separate circuit, and relations with the Dutch authorities greatly improved. The church was destroyed by earthquake in 1842, but the church's work was helped by government grants.

St. Martin is an island of thirty-nine square miles, divided between Dutch and French administration. John Hodge of Anguilla visited both parts of the island in 1847. He was driven from the French sector after one successful meeting, but found a more friendly reception in the Dutch colony. At first, the island was visited by the missionary stationed in St. Bartholomew, but in 1819 a new circuit of St. Martin's and Anguilla was constituted. The attitude of the French authorities changed, and they gave an annual grant to the mission. Emancipation of the slaves came in 1849 to the French part of the island, and in 1863 to the Dutch part, as to St. Eustatius and other Dutch possessions. The French government later pressed for the appointment of French-speaking ministers, and few local preachers were to be found, so that although the church enjoyed a good reputation, its pulpits were sometimes unfilled.

When Coke visited Tortola, the largest of the British Virgin Islands, with William Hammett in 1789, he found no church there, though he was well received by the authorities, and the MORAVIANS had been at work in the neighboring island of St. Thomas for over fifty years. The church grew rapidly, until in 1796, it included among its members almost half the slave population. The Wesleyan missionary John Brownell was assaulted in 1806 by one of a group of white men whose conduct Brownell had attacked in print, and in 1814, a schismatic movement was led by an ex-missionary named Stewart. Nevertheless, there was no official opposition to the church. In the early years of the nineteenth century, the islands had been served by a staff of three ministers, but by 1854 these had been reduced to one. Nevertheless, by the beginning of the twentieth century, the Methodist community included more than eighty percent of the inhabitants. The proportion has since declined, but a majority of the people are still Methodists. Methodism has played a prominent role in education, and women's and youth organizations are active.

Methodism was a relatively late arrival to the United States Virgin Islands. St. Thomas, then a Danish possession, became a center of Moravian work in 1732, and, with St. Croix, was brought within the Anglican diocese of Antigua in 1848, but it was not until 1891, during the period of the autonomous West Indian Conference, that the first Methodist minister, J. B. Foster, was stationed there. Work is expanding in St. Thomas and in St. Croix, and a Methodist minister was stationed in St. Croix for the first time in 1967.

A Methodist society with a dozen members existed in Montserrat as early as 1793, and Coke already planned to establish a circuit there, but it was not until 1820 that the first missionary, John Maddock, arrived. He died within a year, and although he was immediately replaced, the growth of the church was steady rather than spectacular. Many of the settlers were Irish Roman Catholics, and among the indigenous inhabitants, there were periodic revivals of the Obeah cult. There has been close cooperation with government, particularly in educational work.

Dominica was visited by Coke in 1787 and 1788. The small Methodist community, led by a Mrs. Webley, received its first minister, an Irishman named William McCornock, in 1788. Within six months, he had died. The early history of Dominican Methodism, until 1817, is marked by a high rate of mortality and sickness among missionaries, and consequently by periods during which the station was left vacant. Controversy about church property in 1810 severely reduced the membership, but by 1833 it had risen to almost 1,000. Roman Catholicism was well established in Dominica before the beginning of Methodist work, and its influence has continued to predominate. (See also WEST INDIES.)

LEFFINGWELL, CLARA (1862-1905), American FREE METHODIST missionary, was born at Napoli, N. Y., Dec. 2, 1862. In 1886 she was licensed to preach, and served churches in New York and PENNSYLVANIA. In 1896 she went to CHINA under the China Inland Mission. She was there during the Boxer riots. Her concern was the evangelization of the Chinese and in having her own denomination share in it. After a term she returned home to crusade for the establishment of Free Methodist missions in China. The General Conference and Missionary Board were persuaded. She was appointed superintendent for China with the authority to raise the needed funds, and secure recruits for the field. In less than two years she had done both—breaking her health through overwork. However, she went to the field with several new missionaries. Within a few weeks, she had located a field for the Free Methodists in Honan Province. Stations were opened at Chengchow and Kaifeng. She lived only a few months afterward and died in China, July 16, 1905.

LEFLORE, GREENWOOD (1800-1865), American Indian chief and strong supporter of Methodist mission work among Indians, was born on June 3, 1800 near what is now JACKSON, Miss. He was the son of a French-Canadian trader and merchant, and of a French-Indian mother. When twelve years old he went to NASHVILLE, Tenn., where he was educated, living in the home of Major John Donly whose daughter, Rosa, he married. Returning to MISSISSIPPI he became one of the chiefs of the Choctaws and was soon very influential among them. He opened his home as headquarters for Alexander Talley in his preaching tours, and also served as interpreter. He was one of the chief leaders in the signing of the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, which caused much bitterness among the Choctaws who opposed leaving their old home for the lands of OKLAHOMA. Leflore decided to stay in Mississippi rather than to migrate west, and became a prosperous land and slave owner. He served four years in the state senate, built a magnificent mansion near the town later named for him—Greenwood, in Leflore County. The Civil War brought him great financial loss as he remained loyal to the Union until his death on Aug. 31, 1865. Other members of the Leflore family moved to Indian territory. A half-brother, Forbis Leflore, served as an assistant Methodist preacher and interpreter for preachers. For a time there was a Methodist appointment called Leflore, and a county in Oklahoma named for the family.

LEGAL HUNDRED. The name used in the Wesleyan Methodist Church for the select hundred preachers and their successors to whom Wesley assigned the legal conduct of CONFERENCE business by his DEED OF DECLARATION, 1784.

LEGION OF SERVICE was a Youth movement started by the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH in Britain in 1922, and intended as an advance on both the CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOUR and the Scouting movement. Some idea of its mood may be gathered from the Aspiration of its highest grade of membership, the Guides:

As the shepherd counted the flock
And through the night sought high and low
The missing sheep, so let me seek
The lost until I find;
Nor the lost man alone,
But Heaven's ideal of all he may become,
The mother-thought of God for every life,
Giving myself with joy to win his best,
Believing still, though failures oft recur,
Drinking the cup Christ drank,
'For their sakes,' saving with Him,
'I sanctify myself.'

A Fellowship of Service was also created, to serve the leaders of the Legion, and those who did other types of Youth work. At the time of Methodist Union, the Legion of Service reported twenty-two Senior branches with 687 members, and fourteen Junior branches with 363 members. The United Methodist Church had about 139,000 members at the time.

JOHN KENT

LEIFFER, MURRAY HOWARD (1902-), American clergyman, educator, JUDICIAL COUNCIL member, was born at Albany, N. Y. He was educated at the College of the City of New York and the University of Southern California, receiving also the B.D. degree from GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, M.A. from the University of Chicago and Ph.D. from NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY. He was ordained and joined the SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA-ARIZONA CONFERENCE, 1927, but has since served as an educator.

As a teacher he has been instructor in sociology at Chicago Training School, 1929-32; associate professor of sociology and social ethics at Garrett, 1929-32; associate professor, 1932-35; and professor since 1936. He organized and directed the Bureau of Social and Religious Research, making surveys that were of great value to church bodies, general and local. Among these was a study of the Methodist episcopacy, carried on with the aid of the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS.

His membership on church board and committees has included the Board of Temperance, the Board of Christian Social Concerns, and the General Conference Committee on correlation and editorial revision, which last helped in editing the Discipline (TMC) in 1952, 56, 60 and 64. He was elected to the Judicial Council of the church in 1964 and in 1968 became its president.

Dr. Leiffer has written: Manual for the Study of the City Church, City and Church in Transition and The Effective City Church. He edited The Urban Fact Book and Crowded Ways. Two of his books centered about laymen—The Layman Looks at the Minister and In That Case. His involvement with the ministry and training ministers spurred his authorship of The Methodist Ministry, Retirement and Recruitment in the Methodist Ministry, The Role of the District Superintendent; and The Episcopacy in the Present Day. After and while teaching at Singapore and Manila in 1961 and 1965 he wrote The Methodist Church in Singapore, and Methodist and Other Protestant Churches in Manila.

He is a member of a number of learned and professional societies.

In 1924 he married Dorothy Corinne Linn and they had one son, Donald John, a teacher of sociology.

SAMUEL LEIGH

LEIGH, SAMUEL (1785-1852), first Australian Methodist minister, was born on Sept. 1, 1785, at Milton, Staffordshire, England. Associated with the Independent Church at Hanley, he enrolled in a Theological School conducted by the Rev. Dr. Bogue, a strict Calvinist. Leigh favored Arminianism and quietly withdrew. He then joined the Wesleyan Society at Portsmouth, England and assisted JOSEPH SUTCLIFFE. Appointed to the Shaftesbury Circuit, he interested himself for two years in Christian Education. He was deeply influenced by an interview he had with THOMAS COKE, who was then setting out for missionary fields in CEYLON.

On Oct. 3, 1814, he was ordained and his authority "to feed the flock of Christ and to administer the holy sacraments" was signed by ADAM CLARKE, SAMUEL BRADBURN, THOMAS VASEY and John Gaultier.

Leigh left Portsmouth on Feb. 28, 1815, enroute to New South Wales, AUSTRALIA. He arrived in SYDNEY in the "Hebe" on August 10, and the following day presented his credentials to Governor Macquarie who, suspicious of "sectaries," gave Leigh the opportunity to become a servant of the Government. To the credit of Macquarie, Leigh's sincerity and forthrightness won his admiration and practical support.

Leigh held services in the Rocks area, Sydney, and pioneered work at Castlereagh, Parramatta, Windsor, Lower Portland and Liverpool. By 1819 he had established the first Methodist circuit with fourteen preaching places. This involved riding horseback over 150 miles each week. He visited and preached in Newcastle on several occasions. He befriended and was supported by Samuel Marsden, who held the position of Senior Chaplain (C of E), and became an active member in the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge and Benevolence.

Leigh helped establish the Colonial Auxiliary Bible Society in 1817. On Marsden's suggestion and with his support, he was able to visit NEW ZEALAND. He returned for health reasons to England in 1820 and married Catherine Clewes.

In 1821 he established a mission in Hobart, leaving William Horton in charge. In February 1822, he founded the first Wesleyan mission at Whangaroa. Returning to New South Wales he became acting superintendent of Sydney Circuit and later was stationed at Parramatta. It was there his wife died on May 15, 1831, and was buried in St. John's cemetery. Because of indifferent health he again returned to England. He died May 2, 1852.

He has an honored place in Australasian history and his work is perpetuated in New South Wales by the Leigh Theological College, Enfield, and the Leigh Memorial Centenary Church, Parramatta.

STANLEY G. CLAUGHTON

LELIÉVRE, MATTHIEU (1840-1930), French pastor and historian, was the son of Jean Lelièvre (1793-1861), who was born in Normandy of Roman Catholic parents. On his return from fighting in Napoleon's armies, Jean Lelièvre was converted at the age of thirty-eight and became a Methodist minister. Three of his sons entered the Methodist ministry. Matthieu, born circa 1840, though he entered the ministry quite young, quickly became one of the leading men. Succeeding one of CHARLES COOK's sons, he became secretary of the French Sunday School Union. He started a teacher's paper, which was an immediate success, and continues to this day.

He was known, not only as a preacher, but also as an author. He wrote lives of several of the early French Methodist ministers, of JOHN HUNT of Fiji fame and of WILLIAM TAYLOR of California. His volume on the pioneer preachers of the West in the United States does them justice. His life of JOHN WESLEY ran through five editions, carefully revised and improved. It was translated into five languages: English, German, Italian, Spanish, and Tamil. He also edited, with D. Benoit, Crespin's Livre des Martyrs, the French equivalent of Foxe's Book of Martyrs, his share being two large quarto volumes. Several volumes on French Huguenot history show the breadth of his interests. His last book was on Wesley's theology, written only a couple of years before he died, well over eighty years old, a labor of love.

With others he started a Home Missionary Society, after the 1870 war with Prussia, in order to revive the churches of all denominations.

For years, he was editor of the French Methodist paper, l'Evangéliste. Though Methodism was a small minority compared to the Reformed and Lutheran Churches, Lelièvre made this journal one of the most influential religious papers.

He was several times President of the French Conference and was awarded the D.D. (honoris causa) by the University of Ohio.

LEINHART, JOHN L. (1805-1862), American clergyman and Navy chaplain, was born Oct. 29, 1805, to a well-known Pennsylvania family. In 1830 he entered the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE, though his membership subsequently was in the NEW JERSEY and NEWARK CONFERENCES. Illness came while at Cross Street, Paterson, N. J. His physician recommended a seashore appointment, whereupon he became a chaplain in the U. S. Navy. Retaining membership in the Newark Conference when it was set off from the New Jersey Conference, he was the first chairman of the conference board of stewards.

The Civil War found Lenhart serving aboard the Cumberland. Eligible for retirement, he chose to serve further. He was the first Navy Chaplain to die as the result of enemy action, when the Cumberland was rammed and sunk by the Confederate ship Virginia (formerly the Merrimack) at Hampton Roads, Va., March 8, 1862. "When it was seen that the Cumberland must go down all the officers in charge of the wounded were ordered on deck and to bring with them such of the wounded as there might be some hope of saving, which order was obeyed by the surgeons and others. The Chaplain, instead of coming on deck, went into his room and shut the door when in a few minutes he met his fate, the ship going speedily down." It was thought the door swung shut after the chaplain entered the room and that he was unable to open it due to damage to the vessel. Writing to a friend before the fatal attack he said: "It is just as near my heavenly home from the Cumberland as from any other place."

EDGAR R. ROHRBACH

LEONARD, ADNA BRADWAY (1837-1916), American pastor, presiding elder, missionary secretary, was born at Berlin, Ohio, on Aug. 2, 1837, the son of John and Nancy (Davis) Leonard. Educated at Union College in Alliance, Ohio (A.M., 1881; Hon.D.D., LL.D.), he entered the PITTSBURGH M. E. CONFERENCE in March, 1860. From then until 1886 he served churches in OHIO and the Leavenworth District in the KANSAS CONFERENCE. He was elected corresponding secretary of the Missionary Society and Board of Foreign Missions in 1888, serving as such until 1912.

Leonard's pastorates were characterized by revivals. During his three years at Central, Springfield, Ohio, the membership rose from 590 to 805. As presiding elder in KANSAS at the first and fourth rounds he would preach and hold Quarterly Conference on Saturday, then preach twice on Sunday, administer Communion, and hold a love feast. On the second and third rounds he would preach and hold Quarterly Conference. As far as was possible, he aided pastors in revivals during the fall and winter. In 1885 Adna Leonard was a candidate for Governor of Ohio on the Prohibition ticket. He was elected a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE eight times, and was sent to three ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCES, 1891, 1901, and 1911.

On Feb. 19, 1861, he married Caroline Amelia Kaiser and they had seven children, one son, ADNA WRIGHT LEONARD, in time becoming a bishop.

A. B. Leonard was elected corresponding secretary of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church and served longer than any of his predecessors, or from 1888 to 1912. He visited twenty-five foreign countries one or more times on five missionary tours, 1893, 1901, 1904, 1906, and 1907. On the 1907 trip, lasting eight months and eighteen days, he preached forty times and transacted the business of the Missionary Society. Financial expenditure for foreign missions in 1888 amounted to $244,000. By 1912 it increased to $822,000, having reached its highest peak in 1906, which was $831,000. The 1912 General Conference unanimously adopted a resolution stating that Leonard had set an example of devotion to the cause of missions and that he be made Secretary-emeritus for life, empowering the Board to make him a grant annually as it should judge advisable. After writing his autobiography, The Stone of Help, in 1915, he died April 22, 1916.

A strong figure in the Church, Dr. A. B. Leonard was an outstanding preacher and great Missionary Secretary.

JESSE A. EARL

LEONARD, ADNA WRIGHT (1874-1943), American bishop, was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, on Nov. 2, 1874. He was educated at New York University, DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, and The American School of Archeology, Rome, Italy. He was received on trial in the CINCINNATI CONFERENCE in 1899 and ordained deacon the same year. He was united in marriage to Mary Luella Day, Oct. 9, 1901.

Churches served by A. W. Leonard include Green Village, New Jersey; First Church, San Juan, Puerto Rico; American Methodist Church, Rome, Italy. He returned to America in 1903 and afterwards served Grace Church, Piqua, Ohio; Central Church, Springfield; Walnut Hills Church, Cincinnati; and First Church, Seattle. He was elected bishop of the M. E. Church in 1916. As bishop he served the following areas: San Francisco, 1916-1924; Buffalo, 1924-1932; Pittsburgh, 1932-1940; and Washington, D. C., 1940-1943.

The following colleges and universities conferred honorary degrees upon him: OHIO NORTHERN UNIVERSITY, College of Puget Sound, University of Southern California, SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY, ALLEGHENY COLLEGE, WEST VIRGINIA WESLEYAN COLLEGE, THE AMERICAN UNIVERSITY, and WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE.

ADNA W. LEONARD

Bishop Leonard died in an airplane accident over Iceland in 1943, while on an inspection tour of the American forces in Europe and Africa, at the request of President Franklin D. Roosevelt, and in the interest of the Commission on Chaplains of the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES of Christ in America. He was buried in Iceland. His children were Adna Wright Leonard, Jr., and Mrs. Henry G. Budd, Jr.

Bishop Leonard was an impressive soldierly looking man of great force of character. He was a stickler for parliamentary order and saw that his conferences followed out exactly the procedures outlined in the Discipline, and drove ahead with the programs of the church. His tragic death in the line of duty for both his church and nation was deeply felt by his brethren.

ERLE HOWELL

LESLIE, DAVID (1797-1869), an American missionary, circuit rider, and leader in Christian education in the Pacific Northwest.

A member of the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE, he volunteered for service in the OREGON mission to the Indians in 1836. He and his family reached Oregon in September 1837, completing an eight-month voyage from Boston around the Horn. For two years, when the superintendent, JASON LEE, was seeking reinforcements from the east coast, Leslie was acting-superintendent.

Before the United States and Great Britain settled the Oregon boundary in 1846, there was no legal government in Oregon established by a sovereign state. In 1838 the settlers near the mission appointed Leslie a justice of the peace. In this capacity he conducted the first trial by jury held in Oregon, a trial in which one of the settlers was acquitted from the charge of murder. He prepared a memorial for the American settlers, petitioning the U.S. Congress to extend protection to the settlers in Oregon. He joined with the settlers to establish a temporary government, which served the pioneers as their only government until the U.S. established the territorial government of Oregon in 1848.

After the close of the Indian mission in 1846, Leslie remained in Oregon to work among the white settlers. Never a man of robust physical strength, the work of the circuit rider left him broken in health and, at the early age of fifty-two, he took the supernumerary relation. But his labors for the church never ceased until death closed his work in March 1869.

Living on his land claim near SALEM, he served the church in many ways, but the service which gave him a large place in the history of Methodism in Oregon was his long service to WILLAMETTE UNIVERSITY, the Methodist school which is the oldest university in the Pacific Northwest. He was a member of the original board of trustees in 1842 (known as Oregon Institute until its charter in 1853), and continued a member until his death in 1869. He was president of the board, succeeding Jason Lee, until his death, a period of twenty-five years. It was a period when the work to maintain the struggling pioneer university required his full devoted efforts, best described as a full-time, but non-salaried position. The Oregon Conference committee on education said in its report the year of Leslie's death, concerning Willamette University and Leslie's relation to it, "much of the honor of its place in the history of the church in Oregon will arise from the part he bore in laying its foundations, and carrying it through its earliest struggles and difficulties."

ROBERT MOUTLON GATKE

LESLIE, ELMER ARCHIBALD (1888-1965), American clergyman and educator, was born in Tolono, Ill., April 8, 1888, the son of Robert and Mary (Campbell) Leslie. He received the A.B. degree from the University of Illinois in 1910; the S.T.B. degree in 1913 and the Ph.D. degree in 1916 from BOSTON UNIVERSITY. He also studied at Leipzig, Glasgow, Halle, Berlin, Oxford and Jerusalem.

Admitted on trial to the MAINE CONFERENCE in 1911, he was ordained a DEACON in 1912, joined the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE in full connection in 1913, and received his ELDER's orders in 1915. He served Methodist churches in Urbana and Savoy, Ill.; Kittery, Me.; Arlington, Medford, Cambridge and Brookline, Mass. He founded and directed the WESLEY FOUNDATION at Harvard University in Cambridge from 1918 to 1921. From 1921 until 1957 he was professor of Hebrew and Old Testament literature at Boston University. He was widely known as a lecturer and writer.

His numerous published works include Old Testament Religion (1936), The Psalms (1949), Jeremiah (1954) and Isaiah (1963). He was a contributor to Abingdon Bible Commentary and The Interpreter's Bible.

Beloved by colleagues and students alike, he was not only a scholar whose work was marked by carefulness and thoughtfulness, he was also one who never lost the pastoral touch. His deep faith and prayer life profoundly influenced his associates.

On June 26, 1913 he married Helen Fay Noon, daughter of a New England clergyman, by whom he had four children: Jean Taylor (Mrs. A. Donald Hackler), Robert Campbell, James S. and Donald William (deceased).

Elmer A. Leslie died at his winter retirement home in Winter Park, Fla., Feb. 26, 1965.

LESSEY, THEOPHILUS (1787-1841), British Methodist and one of the most noted Wesleyan preachers of his time, was born at Penzance, Cornwall, and was baptized by JOHN WESLEY himself. He was educated at KINGSWOOD SCHOOL, entered the ministry in 1808, and became president of the Conference in 1839, the first son of a Methodist minister to be elected to that office. He died in London on June 10, 1841.

LEVERT, EUGENE VERDOT (1795-1875), American minister and colorful character who was one of the "founders of Methodism in Alabama," was born Oct. 20, 1795, King William County, Va., the son of Dr. Claudius Levert, who was surgeon of Count Rochambeau's French fleet when it came to help the Americans win their independence. Dr. Levert married about 1785, Ann Lea Metcalfe, of one of the old families of Tidewater, Va. Eugene Levert came to ALABAMA first in 1818, and joined the Methodist church near Huntsville in 1819. In 1821 he joined the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE which then extended over the western part of Alabama, and was appointed to the Tuscaloosa Circuit, with Samuel Patton as his senior minister.

In 1822 he was sent to the Alabama Circuit with Joshua Boucher, but in 1823 was located by the Conference against his desire, because he had married on Jan. 23, 1823, Martha Patton. (She subsequently became the mother of fifteen children.) The feeling in that day against young ministers marrying was very strong, hence the unwilling location. However, in 1825 he was readmitted and assigned to the New River Circuit, and in 1826 to the Cahaba Valley Circuit, but in 1827 he was forced to locate again, this time voluntarily due to his own health. In 1828 he was readmitted a second time, and served the Tuscaloosa Circuit, being one of the original presiding elders at the organization in 1832 of the ALABAMA CONFERENCE. Thereafter he served several appointments in his Conference including the Selma District and the Demopolis District. He was elected delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1840, and was one of the original trustees of Centenary Institute at Summerfield, in Dallas County, Ala. A zealous Mason, he became Grand Master of the Grand Council of the Masonic Lodge for Alabama in 1866-67. It is said that more children were named for Eugene V. Levert than probably for any minister in Alabama. The History of Methodism by West (page 613), gives some interesting facts in connection with Eugene V. Levert's connection with the Tarrant family.

Levert died April 19, 1875, and was buried at Marion, Ala.

HYUNKI J. LEW

LEW, HYUNKI J. (1897-), Korean bishop and author, was born in Hichyun, North Pyeng-An Province, KOREA, Nov. 17, 1897. He attended a Methodist Mission school, graduated from Aoyama College in Tokyo, OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, and then received his M.A. from Harvard in 1927.

Returning to Korea that year he began work in religious education for the M. E. Church Mission. In 1932 he became general secretary of the Department of Education of the newly organized Korean Methodist Church. During these years he produced thirty volumes, including a translation of the Abingdon one-volume Bible Commentary.

Pressure of Japanese military authorities forced Lew and other American trained personnel out of church leadership in 1941, and he endured severe persecution until the end of World War II. In 1945, the American Military Government of Korea placed him in charge of the largest Japanese printing plant in Korea.

In 1948 he was made President of the Theological Seminary, where he continued until 1953. When Bishop Yu-Soon Kim was kidnapped by the Communists after the invasion of 1950, Lew was elected to succeed him. His two terms involved care for thousands of refugees at Pusan, and rehabilitation of some 400 churches under the Bishop's Appeal Fund.

In 1958, due to constitutional limit of two terms, he returned to editorial work. A large Korean Bible Dictionary came off the press in 1960. A Korean Bible Commentary in four volumes, averaging some 1,200 pages each, covering the entire Bible, was completed in 1968. Work has begun on a biography of church leaders.

CHARLES A. SAUER

LEWES, DELAWARE, U.S.A., the site of the first Methodist Society in America, formed by GEORGE WHITEFIELD. Whitefield visited the place, then known as Lewiston or Lewis Town, on Oct. 30, 1739 and remained two days.

He was met in the evening by two or three leading persons and on the following day "preached at two in the afternoon to a serious and attentive congregation." "Persons of different denominations were present," he wrote, "and the congregation was larger than might be expected in so small a place, and at so short a notice. After sermon, the High Sheriff, collector, and chief men of the place came and took leave of me; and by their means we were provided with horses and a guide for our journey at a reasonable expense."

In April 1741, William Becket, Anglican rector at Lewes, wrote: "It is surprising to observe how the vulgar everywhere are inclined to enthusiasm. Mr. Whitefield (the early minister of Methodism) had a vast crowd of hearers in May last when he preached four or five times from a balcony. They continued, unknown to me, to set up a religious society."

The Society had seventeen members and survived only three years. It was revived in 1779 by FREEBORN GARRETTSON. A frame church building, known as old Ebenezer, was erected in 1788 and Bethel Church was built about two years later. In 1970 Bethel reported a membership of 556.

ELMER T. CLARK

LEWIS, EDWIN (1881-1959), American theologian, lecturer, author, and professor, was born on April 18, 1881, in Newbury, England. He was the son of Joseph and Sarah (Newman) Lewis. He married Louise Newhook Frost (deceased 1953) on Jan. 5, 1904, and their children are Olin Lewis, Velva (Mrs. Kenneth B. Grady), and Faulkner Lewis (vice-president of the MacMillan Company). He married a second time Josephine Stults, who survives him. When Edwin Lewis was nineteen years of age, he went to Labrador with Sir Wilfred Grenfell and joined the Newfoundland Methodist Church of Canada, 1900-03, and then went into the NORTH DAKOTA Conference where he served from 1904-05. He was educated at Sackville College, Canada; Middlebury College; United Free Church College, Glasgow; DREW SEMINARY (B.D., 1908; Th.D., 1918); New York State College for Teachers (B.A., 1915), and DICKINSON COLLEGE (D.D., 1926). He transferred to the TROY CONFERENCE in 1910 and served North Chatham, 1913-16; First Church at Rensselaer, New York; and then became an instructor in Greek and Theology at the Drew Seminary, 1916-18. He became adjunct professor of Systematic Theology there in 1918 and in 1920 became a professor, which position he occupied until he retired in the early 1950's.

Lewis publicly stated that his theological attitude changed somewhat as he progressed in his work, and he challenged certain extremely liberal teachings in his book, A Christian Manifesto, published in 1934. He also wrote Jesus Christ and the Human Quest, 1924; A Manual of Christian Beliefs, 1927; God and Ourselves, 1931; Great Christian Teachings, 1933; The Faith We Declare (the Fonden Lectures for 1938); A Philosophy of the Christian Revelation, 1940; A New Heaven and a New Earth (which were the Quillian Lectures at EMORY UNIVERSITY, 1941); and The Creator and the Adversary, in which he opposed the rather widely held idea that there was no positive spirit of evil in the universe and that the goodness of God was everything. "We have gone too far toward a benevolent monism," he told the writer of these lines. He was one of the co-authors of the Abingdon Bible

Commentary, 1929, a work which is still held in high repute.

Upon his retirement from Drew, he taught for a time in Temple University in PHILADELPHIA, though he continued to maintain a home in Madison, N. J. He died in the winter of 1959.

LEWIS, FELIX L. (1888-1965), twenty-third bishop of the C.M.E. CHURCH, was born on Sept. 4, 1888, at Homer, La. He was licensed to preach in 1901 and was admitted to the Louisiana Conference in 1906. He received a B.S. degree from WILEY COLLEGE and attended GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE. He served churches in TENNESSEE and LOUISIANA, and was appointed presiding elder for fifteen years. In 1934, he was elected general secretary of the Kingdom Extension Department, where he served until 1946 and his election to the office of bishop. He retired from service in January 1960, and died in August 1965.

RALPH C. GAY

LEWIS, THOMAS HAMILTON (1852-1929), American Methodist Protestant president and church statesman, was born in Dover, Del., on Dec. 11, 1852. His father died in 1853 and the family moved to MARYLAND where he lived until he moved to WASHINGTON, D.C. in 1920.

He entered WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE in 1871 and was graduated in 1875. Entering the MARYLAND CONFERENCE of the M. P. Church in 1875, he served two pastorates: the first at Cumberland, Md., 1875-6; the other at St. John's Church in Baltimore, Md., 1876-81.

On Dec. 11, 1877, he married Mary Ward, daughter of J. T. WARD, president of Western Maryland College.

In 1881 he organized the WESTMINSTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY (now WESLEY SEMINARY) and served as its first president from 1881 to 1885. He then became president of Western Maryland College, which he served until 1920, a period of thirty-four years. In the meanwhile he was elected president of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. P. Church, serving one four-year term. In 1920 he was again elected president of that body, serving eight years as its first full-time president.

In 1928 he was elected Contributing Editor of the combined denominational papers, The Methodist Protestant and The Methodist Recorder, continuing in that capacity until his death in 1929. To the last he was in full possession of his extraordinary mental and spiritual gifts. He was buried in the Westminster city cemetery after a service in the Baker Chapel of the College.

"Such in brief outline is the life story of the most remarkable man the Methodist Protestant Church has produced." (1930 Maryland Conference Journal, p. 133). He was a superb preacher, a great orator. His presidency of the College gave it a firm educational and financial foundation. His three terms of president of the General Conference were conspicuous in administrative grasp of denominational policies and programs, giving to the Church a sense of unity and direction it greatly needed. Much of this focused in the great centenary celebration (Methodist Protestant) in BALTIMORE in 1928.

Perhaps his greatest achievement was in relation to Methodist unification. In 1908 he was elected president of the General Conference of his church. The General Conference of the M. E. Church, in session in Baltimore, sent a delegation, consisting of Bishop WARREN, JOHN F. GOUCHER and Senator J. P. DOLLIVER, to the General Conference of the M. P. Church, in Pittsburgh, with a proposal to "renew organic fellowship with the Methodist Episcopal Church." Their coming was enthusiastically received and their message referred to the committee on union. This latter committee acted in reply: "That a commission consisting of nine members be appointed by this Conference for the purpose of meeting with a like commission of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and of other Methodist Churches in this country to promote as far as possible the reunification of Methodists in America."

A deputation of three—T. H. Lewis, A. L. Reynolds, J. W. HERING—was sent to Baltimore. It was here that he made his remarkable appeal for Methodist union. He was at his best in voice and material. At the close, referring to his Church, the smallest body—"Brethren, if little Benjamin may but beat a drum or carry a flag while Judah and Ephraim once more march on to the same music of peace, joyfully we will say, Amen, God wills it."

The editor of the Advocate wrote of the event: "At the appealing climax, they (the Conference) were on their feet again—laughing, cheering, saluting, singing—delegates and spectators alike swayed by the fraternal impulse."

It happened, however, that the Conference took no further action for union and no meetings were ever held.

Undaunted, T. H. Lewis made his way to the 1910 session of the M. E. Church, South, and had a similar response as at Baltimore. That Conference also reached no conclusive decision with reference to union.

Fortunately, both of the other Churches had appointed commissions to deal with the problem of overlapping areas. It was at a meeting of these two groups that he appeared, whether by invitation or voluntarily, for he was not a member of either body. But out of it all developed a tri-church movement for organic union. Several meetings of the three commissions were held, resulting in a body of "Suggestions" for union. And though he did not live to see it, the movement for Methodist unification, for which Thomas Hamilton Lewis labored, continued in various phases, culminating at Kansas City, Mo., in 1939.

JAMES H. STRAUCHN

LEWIS, WILLIAM BRYANT (1891-1956), American missionary medical pioneer of the M. E. Church, South in the Belgian Congo, was born in Vicksburg, Miss., Oct. 24, 1891. Educated at MILLSAPS COLLEGE, and the Medical School of VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, he practiced medicine in LOUISIANA, 1913-16. He was with the Louisiana National Guard on the Mexican border, 1916-17, and then in France 1917-19 as a medical officer of the A.E.F. during World War I. He afterward continued medical studies at Tulane University, but the call to Christian service was overwhelming and he was appointed a medical missionary to the CONGO in 1923.

Lewis received permission from the Belgian government to establish a leper colony in association with the hospital and medical service he directed in Tunda Station. He also pioneered in the opening of rural dispensaries in outlying and remote villages in a wide area surrounding Tunda.

These were served by trained native hospital attendants. Mrs. Lewis, the former Zaidee Hunter Nelson of Jackson, Miss., assisted her husband in the Tunda Hospital and in the organization of an evangelistic and health ministry in the mission area. On retirement they returned to MISSISSIPPI. A large and commodious hospital, the Lewis Memorial Hospital, has been built at Tunda and named in honor of the Lewises.

WILSON S. LEWIS

LEWIS, WILSON SEELEY (1857-1921), American educator and bishop, was born near Russell, N. Y., June 17, 1857. Although raised in poverty and with little formal education, he started teaching rural school at age sixteen. He worked his way through three years at St. Lawrence College at Canton, N. Y., and went to Iowa in 1880 to teach in the public schools. He felt he was called to preach and joined the UPPER IOWA CONFERENCE in 1885. He was appointed pastor at Blairstown. In 1888 he became principal of Epworth Seminary, a Methodist preparatory school at Epworth, Iowa. After notable success there he was elected president of MORNINGSIDE COLLEGE, Sioux City, Iowa, in 1897 and transferred to the NORTHWEST IOWA CONFERENCE.

He travelled a year in Europe before assuming his post. The conference had recently taken over Morningside College from a group of local promoters. It had one small building, a large debt, no assets and no public goodwill. Under President Lewis its academic standards were raised, the debt and the main building which now bears his name was erected. He secured financial support from near and far, including gifts from Andrew Carnegie and the General Education Board which formed the beginning of an endowment fund.

National attention was attracted to his ability and in 1908 he was elected bishop. His assignments were eight years at Foochow, CHINA, and four years at Shanghai. He and Bishop JAMES W. BASHFORD superintended the work in China during the downfall of the Manchu dynasty and through the First World War. He was called back to the U.S.A. in 1913 to participate in a nationwide campaign for finances to save GOUCHER COLLEGE in Baltimore, Md. He came home again to give leadership in raising the CENTENARY FUND for Missions in 1919. He strongly supported the ill-fated Interchurch World Movement for missions which followed.

A self-devised philosophy of missions guided his work. He made himself accessible to the Chinese pastors. He strengthened the local churches by increasing their self-dependency. He schemed to create among the Methodists an all-China awareness and loyalty in contrast to the local and regional fragmentations typical of that land. He insisted upon the steady up-grading of the church's educational institutions. The church membership grew from 22,000 in 1903 to 77,000 in 1920.

His son, John, served as a missionary in China. His daughter, Ida Belle, eventually became President of Hwa Nan College at Foochow under the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY. In 1920 he was assigned to the Peking area. His health broke soon afterward and he returned to Sioux City, where he died on Aug. 24, 1921. He is buried there in Graceland Cemetery under an impressive stone monument erected by the citizens. A boulevard and a city park also bear his name.

LEXINGTON, KENTUCKY, U.S.A. (population 107,944) is a city situated in the heart of the famous blue grass region of Kentucky, and Lexington itself is sometimes called the "capital of the blue grass." For the origin and the development of early Methodism in Lexington see the history of the FIRST METHODIST CHURCH there in the article below.

Centenary Methodist, now located in north Lexington, celebrated its 100th anniversary in 1966. It dates its origin from the latter part of December 1865, when 133 members withdrew from the Hill Street M. E. Church, South—now First Church—and met and organized on Jan. 3, 1866, a new church which adhered to the M. E. Church. The first unit of this church's building was upon the corner of Broadway and Church Street and was dedicated on Oct. 14, 1866. The sanctuary was added in 1870. In 1955 the congregation moved to the present location and remained there until it combined with Trinity Church which had been established under the district superintendency of A. C. Stone in 1940-46. Trinity itself was established as a church in 1945 when a pastor was appointed there.

Old Centenary in its downtown location had by that time begun to face problems of limited space and inadequate parking facilities, and its members were moving out to suburban areas. So Trinity and Centenary worked out a combination—"the most beautiful church wedding that has ever been held" states the Centenary brochure celebrating this event. The new Centenary is quite commodious and has a new educational building attached to the church. Centenary members claim that it "has the vitality of a young church and the stability of a mature church." Donald W. Durham was the pastor of the church on the 1966 centenary occasion. In 1970 the membership was 1,984.

Recent statistics indicate that total membership of the Methodist churches in the Lexington district is 19,109 and property values are of $9,438,065 last reporting.

First Church is the historic downtown church of Lexington. Here the first Lexington Society was organized in 1789 while Lexington was still a frontier village. Five miles from Lexington in 1790 Bishop ASBURY held the first Annual Conference west of the Alleghenies. In this conference plans were made for the starting of BETHEL ACADEMY, the first Methodist institute of learning west of the Alleghenies. In 1804 the society of Lexington became the first station west of the Alleghenies. In 1815 Bishop ASBURY preached his last sermon in KENTUCKY in this church from the text found in Zephaniah 3:12-13. In 1819 the church consisted of 113 white and seventy colored members.

The first session of the newly formed KENTUCKY CONFERENCE was held here in 1821. All three of the Bishops—WILLIAM MCKENDREE, ENOCH GEORGE, and ROBERT R. ROBERTS—were present. The Conference also met here in 1822. The second location of the church was on Church Street between Upper and Limestone. On this lot a sturdy brick church 60x50 feet was built with a gallery above for colored people.

Colored people continued to be listed as members of the church until the period following the Civil War, when the number greatly decreased. Stephen Chipley should be mentioned. He was an apprentice to Maddox Fisher, Lexington businessman and member of the Methodist Church. Fisher taught him the bricklayer's trade and reading, writing, and arithmetic. Stephen Chipley served on the Board of Trustees of the Methodist Church for fifty years.

H. H. KAVANAUGH was pastor in 1833 and 1834. In the summer of 1833 the epidemic of Asiatic cholera caused nearly 500 deaths in less than three months time. Every family was affected and business was paralyzed. Under Kavanaugh's ministry, however, a revival began in January 1834 and lasted two months, and 200 people were added to the Methodist Church. He was elected bishop in 1854.

The increasing membership of the Lexington congregation made it necessary to select a new location. Property was acquired on High, or Hill Street, from the German Lutheran Community and here was built a church long known as the Hill Street M. E. Church, South. This was in 1841. In 1842 the Annual Conference was entertained here and H. B. BASCOM dedicated the new church in that same year. H. H. Kavanaugh was pastor again in 1847-48. In 1842 H. B. Bascom became president of TRANSYLVANIA UNIVERSITY, at that time a Methodist institution.

Through the efforts of Kavanaugh and Bascom another great revival was held with far reaching effects that greatly strengthened the local church. R. K. HARGROVE, later a bishop, was pastor in 1867. In 1878 H. P. Walker was pastor. During that time the Hill Street Auxiliary of the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY, authorized by the GENERAL CONFERENCE in May of that year, was organized in the Hill Street Church. Their first annual session was held in the Hill Street Church in March 1879. F. W. Nolan was pastor from 1882-86. Under his pastorate the church was fully remodeled, and he was assisted in a notable revival in 1884 by HENRY CLAY MORRISON. Bishop R. K. Hargrove, former pastor, presided at the Annual Conference session at Hill Street Church in 1890.

Under the pastorate of E. G. B. Mann, 1907-11, the present First Methodist Church was built. Mrs. Scola Inskeep Chenoweth left by will $10,000 toward the building of the new stone church. She made three provisions: "The church was to raise $25,000. The new building was to be completed in two years. It was to be without debt when dedicated." These stipulations were carried out and the new church was dedicated on Jan. 10, 1909. The old name Hill Street M. E. Church, South was changed to First M. E. Church, South, Lexington. Following unification in 1939, the church became known as the First Methodist Church of Lexington.

First Church in its long history has always assisted in starting other Methodist churches in Lexington. E. L. Southgate, pastor in 1894, with H. P. Walker, presiding elder, assisted in the organization of the Sunday school in the north section of the city. This later became Epworth Church. U. G. Foote, pastor in 1902-06, assisted in the establishment of the church that later became Park Church. For several years it was a mission under the Quarterly Conference of the Hill Street Church.

In September 1907, O. B. Crockett was appointed as the first regular pastor of the Park Church.

Under the ministry of Gilbert Combs in 1922-28 the Wesley Foundation of the University of Kentucky met in First Church. The Wesley Foundation continued here until it moved to the new location in 1964.

On Oct. 10, 1940 the Woman's Society of Christian Service was organized here. The new Educational Plant was dedicated free of debt on Oct. 24, 1965. Present membership is 1,306, constituting a cross section of the city of Lexington.

RUSSELL R. PATTON

LEXINGTON CONFERENCE (ME), was organized at Harrodsburg, Ky., March 2, 1869, with Bishop LEVI SCOTT presiding. A Negro conference, it was formed by dividing the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE (ME) along racial lines. The conference began with two districts, Lexington and Louisville, twenty-six charges, and 3,526 members. The 1872 GENERAL CONFERENCE added OHIO and INDIANA to the territory of the Lexington Conference, and in 1873 it reported an Ohio District with twelve charges. In 1876 the conference boundaries were extended to include ILLINOIS. That year the conference had an Indianapolis District, and it reported fifty-eight charges and 6,871 members. Later MICHIGAN, MINNESOTA, and WISCONSIN were added, while southwest Illinois was surrendered to the Central Missouri (later CENTRAL WEST) Conference.

The Lexington Conference continued with two districts in Kentucky, one in Ohio, and one in Indiana, and for some years there was little growth in membership. In 1900 the conference reported 9,182 members. In 1914 the Chicago-Indianapolis District was formed, and the conference reported 12,506 members that year. In 1917 the Chicago District was organized with ten charges. During the First World War Negro migration to the north increased, and by 1920 the conference membership had risen to nearly 17,000. In 1938 the conference had 124 charges, and nearly 25,000 members.

The Lexington Conference's St. Mark Church in CHICAGO was known widely for years as one of the strongest congregations in Methodism. From 600 members in 1915, it grew to nearly 3,500 by 1930. From 1939 to 1964 the church regularly reported 4,000 to 4,700 members every year. In more recent years the St. Mark membership has greatly decreased.

At unification in 1939, the Lexington Conference became a part of the Central Jurisdiction.

Two members of the Lexington Conference were elected bishops in The Methodist Church, M. W. CLAIR, JR. (1952) and M. LAFAYETTE HARRIS (1960).

The Lexington Conference supported PHILANDER SMITH COLLEGE at LITTLE ROCK, Ark. In 1942 the churches of the conference raised about $1,100 for the college. GAMMON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY was commended as the one institution in the Central Jurisdiction for training ministers.

In 1964, its last year, the Lexington Conference reported 124 charges, 130 ministers, 40,689 members, property valued at $10,522,390. At that time the Kentucky churches of the conference were merged with the Tennessee Conference (CJ) to form the TENNESSEE-KENTUCKY CONFERENCE, and the remainder of the conference was absorbed by the overlying conferences of the North Central Jurisdiction.

LEYLAND, ARTHUR STANLEY (1901-), British minister, was born Nov. 25, 1901, in St. George's, Shropshire, England. Accepted for the ministry in the PRIMITIVE METHODIST CHURCH in 1922, he was sent for theological training to Hartley College, Manchester, and served in circuits in different parts of the kingdom until 1945, when he came to the London area for the first of four terms there in Highgate, Barnet, Brixton Hill, and Streatham. From 1940 onward he acted as Assistant Secretary of the British Methodist Conference, and for many years conducted a weekly feature in the Methodist Recorder.

Dr. Leyland pioneered the ministerial exchange program of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL in 1946, when he exchanged pulpits with Dr. Theodore C. Mayer of The Methodist Church, U.S.A. Since that time he has served as chairman of the British Committee on Ministerial Exchanges in the World Methodist Council. He is also a member of the British Council of Churches Visiting Preachers and Exchange Committee. He has been a delegate from British Methodism to the WORLD CONFERENCE on several occasions.

LIBERIA is a country on the southern "bulge" of West Africa. Methodism is as old as the country. Both Methodists and Baptists share honors in having had outstanding leaders among the original settlers. When the colonists gained foothold in present-day Liberia in January 1822, the Methodist leader, Elijah Johnson held the little group together in a critical hour. During a revival in 1824, "upwards of twenty persons, all professing Christ for the first time," were added to the Methodist Society. A few days later they were given a lot for a church, which was built and finished in 1825.

When the first Methodist missionary, MELVILLE B. COX, arrived in Liberia in 1833, he helped stabilize the Methodist work and brought it under episcopal supervision from America. Although Cox lived only four and one-half months after his arrival, he had carried the work beyond the boundaries of Monrovia. An Annual Conference was organized on Jan. 10, 1834, by Rufus Spaulding and S. O. Wright; however, formal authorization had to wait until the General Conference of 1836. There were three ministerial members at that conference: Spaulding, Wright, and the Liberian, Anthony D. Williams. Williams had been ordained in 1833 at the Oneida Conference. Wright is buried in Monrovia. Spaulding had to return home because of health. Late in 1834, John Seys arrived to assume leadership of the mission. Born in the West Indies, he was able to stand the tropical climate better than others. The Liberia Conference Seminary was opened in 1839, with Jabez Burton as principal. On March 19, 1837, a new Methodist church was dedicated in Monrovia. Built of stone, sixty-six by fifty feet, it is still in use today.

The period 1833 to 1844 has been called the "Golden Age" of Methodist Missions in Liberia. Because of the toll in lives and broken health among the missionaries, the local leadership gradually shifted over to the Liberians. A turning point in the life of the church came in 1851, for the conference had to decide whether to disband or go on under their own leaders; at this time FRANCIS BURNS was acting as President of the conference. In 1853 Bishop LEVI SCOTT visited Liberia for the Annual Conference session held in Cape Palmas. There, for the first time in the country, an ordination service was held. Eleven men were ordained as DEACONS and eight as ELDERS. For the first time since its founding the conference had ministers set apart to perform the ordinances and sacraments of the church. In 1856 Francis Burns was elected the first Liberian missionary bishop by the General Conference of the M. E. Church. He was the first "missionary bishop" ever elected, the office largely being created to take care of the type of supervision Burns was to give. He gave leadership until his death in April 1863. He was followed in the episcopacy by another well qualified Liberian, JOHN W. ROBERTS, brother of the first President of Liberia, JOSEPH J. ROBERTS. By 1868 the Liberia Annual Conference was given full status in the M. E. Church with representation in the General Conference. Bishop Roberts served until his death in 1875, when again the episcopal supervision was assigned to bishops from America. In 1876 the conference had five districts and twenty-one appointments. In 1877 the membership reached 2,488.

In 1884 the General Conference elected the veteran missionary, WILLIAM TAYLOR, as bishop for Africa. Taylor's plan was to establish self-supporting mission stations in a chain across Africa. After having started the work in the Congo he brought a number of missionaries to Liberia. Soon seven stations were established along the Cavalla River, six along the Kru Coast, and ten in Sinoe and Grand Bassa Counties and on the St. Paul River. Over fifty missionaries, the majority of them women, were taken by Bishop Taylor to Liberia. During the period the Mission Board sent out nineteen men to do district and educational work. When Bishop Taylor retired in 1896 his methods had been criticized and many casualties had been reported. But though a number of stations had closed, his work has in several places brought permanent results. It should be noted that the great membership strength of the Methodist Church today lies in the areas where his work was established. Most of the men entering the ministry today come from this Kru Coast area.

After having been without a resident bishop for thirty years, Liberia received Bishop ISALAH B. SCOTT, an American Negro elected by the General Conference of 1904. A period of progress followed. The membership rose from 3,301 to 10,959 by 1916 when Bishop Scott retired. During this period special emphasis was given to self-help and self-support, education, and evangelism among the Grebo and Kru tribal groups.

A visit by THOMAS S. DONOHUE, secretary of the M.E.

METHODIST CHURCH, GANTA, LIBERIA

Mission Board, in 1923 brought about a reorganization of the mission work. An important decision was to begin a new station at Ganta in the interior. After a two weeks' trek through the jungle, GEORGE W. HARLEY and his wife arrived at Ganta in 1926. The Ganta station became one of the largest Methodist stations in Africa; it includes the hospital, elementary and junior high schools, girls' and boys' dormitories, evangelism department, literacy work, nursing school, and industrial work with a fine carpenter's shop, where mahogany furniture is built. The Harleys retired in 1960. Thousands of treatments are given in the clinic every year; two new hospital wings were equipped for modern surgery with a staff of three doctors; the leprosarium with 700 patients and twelve out-stations was set up; and evangelistic work in over seventy villages was started. Another important project following this 1923 visit was the strengthening of the COLLEGE OF WEST AFRICA.

The assignment of Bishop Willis J. King (1944-56) as resident bishop assured the work in Liberia of more stability and expansion, as there had been no resident bishop since 1928. New work was begun at Cbarnga, located 120 miles inland at an important crossroad. A significant step forward was taken when a Conference Board of Missions was organized to assume in part the responsibility for the new mission. Cooperation with Cuttington College was started with the providing of a Methodist professor on the staff. The Woman's Division (TMC) opened a well-equipped hostel for girls attending the College of West Africa, and has since provided a home economics teacher for the school. The academic standards of the school were raised considerably and the position of the College of West Africa as the leading college preparatory school in the country was further strengthened.

Under Bishop Prince A. Taylor, Jr. (1956-64), much was done to strengthen the administration of the Annual Conference and to bring the Liberian Church to the point of self-sustenance. This has partly been brought about due to the foresight and vision of WILLIAM V. S. TURMAN, President of Liberia, and a dedicated layman in the Methodist Church.

In 1964 the General Conference (TMC) voted an enabling act which would permit Liberia to become either an autonomous church or a CENTRAL CONFERENCE. At the Annual Conference session in February 1965, the Liberia Annual Conference voted unanimously to establish a Central Conference, and to elect a Liberian as bishop. This historic conference was held Dec. 8-12,

MT. SCOTT CHURCH, CAPE PALMAS, SITE OF
FIRST SESSION OF LIBERIA CENTRAL CONFERENCE

1965, at Mt. Scott Memorial Methodist Church in Cape Palmas, the same place where the first Liberian ministers were ordained by Bishop Levi Scott in 1853. STEPHEN TROVEN NACBE, SR., is the first Liberian to be elected bishop and consecrated in Liberia. He conducted his first Annual Conference and service of ordination at Caldwell, near Monrovia, the place where Melville Cox held his first camp meeting 133 years before.

Among important developments after World War II was cooperation with Cuttington College in theological training, and a mission and church were organized in Gbarnga—the joint theological training program at Cuttington is no longer in effect.

The Church in Liberia has started to train a full-time indigenous ministry. Admission to Conference membership has been raised from eight to twelve years of schooling. By 1962 three congregations had full-time pastors with college degrees. A Pastors' School has been established at Gbarnga which takes men who have completed tenth grade in school and gives them two or three years theological training.

LIBERIA ANNUAL CONFERENCE organized in that land (see LIBERIA) was given authority by the General Conference of 1964 to become organized into a Central Conference during the quadrennium ending in 1968 provided that it should have a minimum of twenty ministerial members on the basis of one delegate for every four ministerial members of the Annual Conference. Pursuant to this requirement during the quadrennium, Liberia became a Central Conference of The United Methodist Church through the actions which have been outlined above in the general account of Liberia.

LIBERTY CHURCH, Greene County, Georgia, U.S.A., cradle of Methodism of Central Georgia and one of the oldest Methodist churches in continuous operation. Around

1786, John Bush erected a brush arbor as a community center for CAMP MEETINGS in what was then called Crackers Neck. It became a preaching place for Methodists and from this grew Liberty Chapel. In 1797, JAMES JENKINS, a pioneer Methodist itinerant, served the Washington Circuit which included Greene, Wilkes, Taliaferro, Lincoln, Elbert, Hart, Franklin, Madison, and Oglethorpe Counties. After preaching at Liberty, Jenkins reported in his journal that following a fiery exhortation, a man in uniform came down the aisle and fell at his feet crying for pardon. Others came after him, and according to Jenkins, this occurrence at Liberty Chapel was the origin of the Methodist custom of penitents coming to the altar. "The meeting became so noisy," he continued, "that it was a wonder the horses did not take fright."

Many of the great men of early Methodist history were connected with Liberty. Bishop ASBURY preached there several times. "In Liberty there is life," he wrote in 1801, "and many souls have been brought to God, even children." Again he preached there on Christmas Day, 1806, noting that the new chapel measured thirty by fifty feet.

In December of 1808, the twenty-third session of the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE, which also served GEORGIA, met at Liberty. Bishops Asbury and McKENDREE attended, and Asbury estimated that between 2,000 and 3,000 people were present, for one of the first winter camp meetings in America was held in conjunction with the annual conference. LOVICK PIERCE was ordained an ELDER, and WILLIAM CAPERS was admitted a preacher on trial. Liberty continued to serve the rural area in which it was located, and in 1966 it was on the White Plains Circuit in the Augusta District of the North Georgia Conference.

LICENSES, PREACHERS' AND PREACHING HOUSES'

The Act of Uniformity (1662) was followed by the Conventicle Acts of 1664 and 1670, whereby anyone attending "any unlawful assembly, conventicle or meeting under colour or pretence of any exercise of religion" would be fined or imprisoned. The Toleration Act (1689) gave relief to bona fide Dissenters, but did not provide for Methodists, who were recognized by neither Anglicans nor Dissenters. The only way out of the dilemma was for Wesley to license his itinerants as "preachers of the Gospel," though against their will they had to accept licenses in which they were described as "Dissenting Preachers." They were accused of "acting under a lie" (see Wesley's letter to Thomas Adam, July 19, 1768), i.e., while professing themselves members of the Church of England, they licensed themselves as Dissenters. To obtain a license a preacher had to take the oaths, make certain declarations, and generally comply with the Act of Toleration.

As persecution set in, it became increasingly necessary for Methodist buildings to have the protection of being licensed. They were registered as buildings "for the worship of God and religious exercises as Protestant Dissenters." The New Room, Bristol, was the first to be thus registered (October 17, 1748). The Large Minutes (Minutes i. 602) of 1763 lays down the proper form for such a license. In 1812 the Methodists played a large part in the events which led up to the repeal of the Conventicle Act.

LICHFIELD PLAN was drawn up in 1794, three years after Wesley's death. April 1 and 2, THOMAS COKE consulted at Lichfield with ALEXANDER MATHER, THOMAS TAYLOR, JOHN PAWSON, SAMUEL BRADBURN, JAMES ROGERS, HENRY MOORE, and ADAM CLARKE about the future organization of Methodism. The plan recommended: (1) preachers be received into FULL CONNEXION by being ordained deacon; (2) preachers approved by the Conference be ordained elders; (3) an order of SUPERINTENDENTS be instituted.

The plan went on to suggest geographical "divisions," listed the personnel to be appointed superintendents (largely the same as the authors of the plan!), and outlined the extent of their authority. The Conference that year "treated" the Lichfield Plan as "tending to create invidious distinctions among brethren and those who attended the meeting were considered as aspirants after honour." Thus it was rejected, though doubtless its authors argued that it accorded with Wesley's intentions when he "set apart" Coke and Mather by the laying on of hands to be superintendents.

J. SCOTT LIDGETT

LIDGETT, JOHN SCOTT (1854-1953), British Methodist, once called "the greatest Methodist since John Wesley," was born at Lewisham, Kent, on August 10, 1854, and entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1876. His services to the church were recognized by his election to the LEGAL HUNDRED in 1902, and he became PRESIDENT of the Wesleyan Conference in 1908 and first president of the reunited Methodist Church in 1932.

His main life work was the Bermondsey Settlement, which he founded in 1891 with WILLIAM FIDDIAN MOULTON, and of which he remained warden until 1949. Lidgett's services to the borough were acknowledged when he was made an honorary freeman, but his influence extended into the life of the whole of London, especially in educational matters. He became an alderman on the London County Council in 1905, and was a member of the senate of London University from 1922-32. In 1931-32 he was vice-chancellor of the university.

He was a member of many interdenominational organizations, and in 1913 served on a royal commission. From 1907-18 he edited The Methodist Times, and from 1911 was the joint editor of The Contemporary Review. In addition he was a distinguished theologian, his main works being a FERNLEY LECTURE, The Spiritual Principle of the Atonement (1898); The Fatherhood of God (1902); The Christian Religion (1907). He died at Epsom, Surrey, on June 16, 1953.

LIEBNER, OTTO (1879-1946), missionary and statistician, was born Feb. 3, 1879, to Jewish parents in Vienna, Austria. After graduation from high school he attended the University in Vienna. Shortly after his graduation he came to New York City, was converted, and enrolled in the Biblical Seminary of New York. He graduated in 1914 and was accepted by the Board of Missions of the M. E. Church as a missionary. From 1919 to 1928 he served in South America. In 1929 he was put in charge of the work of the Baltic countries, Bulgaria and Yugoslavia. In 1933 he returned to America and served as a pastor at Evansville, Ind. From 1936 to 1939 he served as a professor of Biblical Interpretation at the Biblical Seminary in New York. The final seven years of his life were spent doing statistical work for the Chicago office of the General BOARD OF PENSIONS of The Methodist Church.

EGLISE EVANGELIQUE METHODISTE
DE LA REDEMPTION, LIEGE, BELGIUM

LIÉGE, Belgium, The Methodist Church (French) began in 1925 as an annex of HERSTAL Church. In 1930 a beautiful church building was erected by H. H. STANLEY, overlooking the Meuse River at Pont Maghin. The church was twice damaged by the blowing up of a bridge in 1940 and 1944. During the Nazi occupation, Pastor Henri van Oest was arrested and sent to a death camp in Germany. He died in Siegburg on March 10, 1945. Pastors have been F. Cuenod, 1924-37; H. van Oest, 1938-41; P. Sprangers, 1944-46; A. Wemers, 1947-58; J. Coviaux, 1959-64; and L. Berchier since 1965.

LIGHTWOOD, JAMES THOMAS (1856-1944), British pioneer in the study of Methodist music and hymnology, was born in Leeds, the son of a Wesleyan Methodist minister. He was educated at KINGSWOOD SCHOOL. After some experience in trade, with his brother Edward in 1879 he opened a boarding school at Lytham St. Annes, Lancashire. He was one of the founding members of the WESLEY HISTORICAL SOCIETY, and in 1910 began the Methodist musical monthly, The Choir. In 1892 he published thirty-two Tunes with Hymns for use in Day and Sunday Schools, and continued to write hymn tunes throughout his life; five of them were included in the Methodist Hymn Book (1933). Of his many books the following are probably the most useful: Methodist Music in the Eighteenth Century (1927), Stories of Methodist Music (1928), Samuel Wesley, Musician (1936), and especially the standard reference work, The Music of the Methodist Hymn Book (1935).

LIM SI SIN (1910-), bishop for two terms of the autonomous Methodist Church of Lower Burma, whose election was the highlight of the Conference (Oct. 5-10, 1965), at which the Burma Annual Conference of The Methodist Church became the Autonomous Methodist Church of Lower Burma. Previous to his election, he had been the pastor for sixteen years of the Christ Methodist Church in Rangoon, and superintendent of the Chinese District of the Conference for almost the same period. He and his wife are the parents of seven children—three daughters and four sons, one of whom is Dr. Lim Toh Bin, a graduate of Northwestern Medical College (Illinois) and now practicing medicine in Canada. Bishop Lim was born in CHINA in 1910 and came to BURMA from Amoy in 1949 as pastor of the Chinese-language Christ Methodist Church.

The consecration of Bishop Lim was presided over by Bishop HOBERT B. AMSTUTZ. A purple stole was presented to Bishop Lim by Bishop Amstutz. At the same moment Bishop Amstutz said, "I hereby dissolve the Burma Annual Conference of The Methodist Church and declare the establishment of the Autonomous Methodist Church of the Union of Burma."

Among the distinguished guests who attended this consecration were the Roman Catholic Archbishop Bazin; Anglican Bishop of Rangoon, H. V. Shearburn; Rev. John Thet Gyi, general secretary of the Burma Christian Council; representatives of the Baptist Church, and the Rev. Vulchuka, fraternal delegate from the Upper Burma Methodist Church which became autonomous in 1964. Bishop Lim's two terms as bishop ended in September 1969.

LIMA, Peru, is the capital of that nation and is one of the most interesting cities in the world. It is one of the oldest cities of the Americas and contains within it both Indian and Spanish colonial tradition, as well as modern buildings and processes. In it there is the oldest university in the Americas—the University of San Marcos, founded in 1551. The city's population in 1970 is given as 2,415,700.

LA VICTORIA CHURCH, LIMA

There are today about ten regular Methodist Sunday schools and preaching places in Lima, as well as the several institutions whose work is described below. Three congregations are near self-supporting. The First Methodist Church is perhaps the strongest of these.

Colegio Maria Alvarado is a school for girls formerly known as Lima High School. Founded in 1906, it was one of the first girls' schools in PERU to offer secondary education. At the present time it has both elementary and secondary departments. It offers college preparatory, commercial and home economics courses. Enrollment in 1968 was 645.

The school is located near downtown Lima in a building provided in 1932 by the WOMAN'S DIVISION OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE and added to in 1954. Funds for the building were secured and administered through the service of Gertrude Hanks, who was principal for many years. The school is directed by Mrs. Olga Vanderghem, a graduate of Maria Alvarado and its first Peruvian principal.

Escuela America de La Victoria is an elementary school in the La Victoria section of Lima. Begun in 1916 as the parochial school of a Methodist church, Escuela America in 1966 enrolled 700 students. The director, Moises Huarato, and the entire faculty were Peruvian.

La Florida Methodist Center is a social center in Lima, founded in the early 1950's by Martha Vanderberg, missionary of the Woman's Division of Christian Service. It was the first project of its type undertaken by any Protestant church in Peru and stimulated similar projects in Chincha, Miramar, Pedregal, and other places.

By the year 1950, villages of squatters had begun to spring up on the hills across the Rimac River from Lima. Miss Vanderberg learned of the needs of families there, beyond the reach of churches, schools, and social services. She was a teacher at Colegio Maria Alvarado and recruited a student to help her conduct a small vacation church school.

The interest continued, with students donating books for a reading room. Additional vacation schools were held, and Sunday classes were begun. Church services were added. Miss Vanderberg directed the work while continuing to teach, later becoming full-time director. A building was erected with the aid of the BOARD OF MIS- sions in New York and was occupied in 1954. By 1959 more than 1,300 persons were registered for various services of the center.

Activities included child care, a kindergarten, club work, distribution of clothing and other emergency supplies, and health services.

Panamericana Normal School is a Methodist teacher-training school, established in 1961. The normal school was started in order to help alleviate a chronic shortage of trained teachers in Peru, and especially to increase the number of Evangelicals (Protestants) qualified to teach in the day schools affiliated with Evangelical churches. Many Methodist local churches maintain day schools, and the thirteen Methodist schools in Peru enroll more than 3,500 pupils. The school hopes to train future teachers in new educational methods, stressing participation by the child in the learning process as opposed to a traditional emphasis upon memorization.

The first graduation exercise was held on Dec. 12, 1964—just one week after long-delayed official recognition was given by the government. The student body is coeducational, and the course of study is for four years. Enrollment runs around fifty.

LINCOLN, England. Methodism was securely rooted in the county of Lincolnshire some forty years before the city of Lincoln itself heard JOHN WESLEY, and before Sarah Parrott and Dorothy Fisher became the first two members. It was in the year 1787 that Mrs. Fisher came from Gonerby to live in Lincoln, and she came in response to a pressing invitation from the small society at Sturton by Stow, where Sarah Parrott was a member. Two years later the first chapel was built in the city, and from that time the cause moved forward with vigor. By the end of the century there were close to a hundred members. By 1815 the little Waterside Chapel became too small, and the Bank Street building was erected; and if the first generation of Wesleys was growing a little old by 1836, they were sufficiently enterprising to launch the big Wesley Chapel, and over 500 members joined a cause which had connectional fame.

This chapel stood for 125 years while Methodism expanded into all parts of the city. Before "Big Wesley" was built, a society had started in the north in Newport, and two chapels preceded the present Gothic-style Bailgate Chapel, erected in 1880, dominating the more ancient Newport Arch of Roman fame. In the south, the Wesley members established a society in 1864 which resulted in the building of Lincoln's famous Hannah Memorial Chapel, and still later St. Catherine's Chapel. In 1859 they started the Rosemary Lane Day School, but there had already been twenty years of educational activity on the Big Wesley premises. Bailgate and St. Catherine's in turn pioneered the fringes of the town north and south, and chapels were built in the new housing estates. Various Lincoln business firms were connected with Wesleyanism, such as Mawer and Collingham, drapers; Ruddocks, printers; Bainbridge, another draper; Stokes, confectioner; besides many influential men in industry, and a large number of aldermen and councillors. A number of Lincoln's mayors were men from Wesley Chapel. RICHARD WATSON, an early president, was brought up at Wesley. JOHN HANNAH entered the ministry from here, and became the first tutor at Hoxton, the start of Wesleyan Methodist ministerial training. FREDERICK J. JOBSON was a Lincoln man; he laid the foundation stone of the Hannah Memorial Chapel and himself became president. John Hornabrook also entered the ministry from Lincolnshire Methodism.

The Wesleyan Conference met at Big Wesley on two occasions, in 1909 and 1925; and the large premises housed all kinds of civic, cultural, and social functions. When at last the building had to be demolished, a brass tablet telling of the efforts of Sarah Parrott and Dorothy Fisher was carefully removed, and is now located in the new chapel at Sturton, where Lincoln Methodism really began.

PRIMITIVE METHODISM began in Lincoln about the year 1818, when WILLIAM CLOWES visited the city and held a meeting in Castle Square. In 1819 a chapel was erected in Mint Lane, and twenty years later the first of the Portland Place causes. Primitive Methodist enterprise in Lincoln, as elsewhere, reached out to other areas; and though it was centered in Portland Place for a long period, by the middle of the century societies were established at Rasen Lane in the north, Carholme Road in the west, and Newark Road in the south. One notable feature of Lincoln Primitive Methodism was the appointment of Mary Birks as the third minister in 1824; and in 1828 another woman, Ann Tinsley, was minister. One of Ann Tinsley's converts was Edward Chapman, who served the cause for half a century.

To Joseph Broadberry, another lifelong member, belongs the distinction of having been a working man who climbed to the city magisterial bench. In later years, Alderman C. T. Parker, who gave distinguished service to Lincoln Primitive Methodism, was mayor of the city three times. Portland Place, now named Lincoln Central Methodist Church, remains alone of the Primitive Methodist churches, combining the work of Hannah Memorial and other once flourishing chapels in the city center.

The Reform movement of the early 1850's affected the Wesley and Newport societies to the extent of their losing some 250 members; yet in 1863 both these societies had fully recovered these losses. The WESLEYAN REFORMERS worshiped in the Corn Exchange until they bought Zion Chapel, where members of the COUNTESS OF HUNTINGDON's connection had recently ceased to meet. By 1864 the Silver Street Free Methodist Chapel replaced the old Zion, and for almost a century its witness was as strong as any in the city. Elsewhere the Reformers, now known as the Free Methodists, built chapels in the city, which in their prime were greatly progressive. The UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES Annual Assembly met in the Silver Street Chapel in the year 1898, when the Rev. J. C. Brewitt, a Lincolnshire man, was appointed secretary. He became president the following year. Honored names in the Free Methodist world in Lincoln were the Allmans, Crosbys, and the Meltons, besides the still more honored name of WILLIAM C. JACKSON, the last of the United Methodist Church presidents, and president of the Methodist Church in 1935.

With the union of Methodism in 1932, the task of circuit realignment began, and the fusion of societies. Not until 1957, however, was a position reached in circuit arrangement which satisfied the many differing traditions. The three circuits into which the city and villages are divided make for administrative purposes a well-defined ordering, and Methodism in Lincoln today is worthily maintained.

LINCOLN, NEBRASKA, U.S.A., the capital of the state, with a population of 148,092 (1970), is a city surrounded by fertile farms. Settled in 1856 and incorporated as a city in 1877, Lincoln was the home of the orator, William Jennings Bryan, three times Democratic candidate for president of the United States. Bryan Memorial Hospital, started with a gift of Bryan's home to the Methodist Church in 1922, is one of Lincoln's outstanding hospitals. The original Bryan home, "Fairview," a museum on the hospital grounds, is visited by thousands each year.

Lincoln is the seat of the University of Nebraska, NEBRASKA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, and Union College. The Lincoln statue, replica of the monumental Washington, D. C. statue by Daniel Chester French, is located here.

Methodism's mother church in NEBRASKA was organized in 1854 by William Goode, first superintendent in Nebraska. A Reverend Gage was the first pastor in Nebraska City in nearby Otoe County.

Salt Creek Mission, started in 1857, is now St. Paul Church in Lincoln. In 1866 the M. P. Church started a school for children here. It became the first public school in Lincoln. Nebraska Wesleyan University moved from York to Lincoln in 1887. The episcopal headquarters of the Nebraska Area are in Lincoln.

Bishop DWIGHT LODER, a native Nebraskan, was born in the small village of Waverly near Lincoln. He was elected bishop in 1964. Bishop GERALD KENNEDY was pastor of St. Paul Church in Lincoln at the time he was elected to the episcopacy in 1948.

In 1970 Lincoln had nineteen churches with a membership of 17,157.

First Church was organized Nov. 18, 1888, in Nebraska Wesleyan University's "Old Main" at the call of the chancellor. Services were held weekly in the chapel and the chancellor or one of the professors provided the sermon. It was not long before the annual conference appointed a pastor to the rapidly growing new charge. The congregation met in Old Main for several years and then erected a parsonage. Plans to build a church were delayed by the severe droughts and national panic of the nineties, when the college suffered severely.

By 1900 two lots were purchased at the corner of 50th and St. Paul, University Place. Two years later men of the congregation built a basement, covered with a flat tin roof, which was first used in February 1903. Leaks and noise made it unsatisfactory. However, increased population and college enrollment gave the college priority in building, and the church moved back to the new auditorium on the campus in 1907.

Construction of the church attracted the town's attention, the problem being how the great steel framework and large pillars could be raised. The financial drives and costs were greater than expected. On dedication day, Dec. 12, 1909, the bishop in charge took three dramatic collections, from three capacity congregations, to raise enough money for the dedication service. Although St. Paul, Trinity, and Grace were older, the new church took the name First Church.

From the beginning the congregation had been evangelical in spirit and behavior. The new church proved more restrained emotionally. The basement of First Church was used by the Ladies Aid Society to feed the Student Army Training Corps of World War I.

After the drouth-stricken thirties and war-anxious forties, a new educational building seemed imperative in the early fifties. Several financial campaigns resulted in a structure for the church school.

Throughout its history First Church has been a focal point in the community, trying to meet the social and spiritual needs of all its members and constituents. In 1970 First Church had 2,237 members and church property valued at $941,279.

ST. PAUL CHURCH, LINCOLN, NEBRASKA

St. Paul Church was started in 1857 when Zenos B. Turman was appointed to the Salt Creek Mission and preached probably the first sermon in Lancaster County, Neb., in the cabin of James Eatherton about twelve miles south of Lincoln. It was one of sixteen preaching places embracing seven counties.

In 1867 Lincoln was made the state capital. The population increase led the Methodists to build a church under the leadership of R. S. Hawks. In this building a reception was held for the first Governor of the state, David Butler, Jan. 18, 1868.

The first pastor assigned to Lincoln was H. T. Davis in the spring of 1868. He dedicated the church in June, when the population was about 200, with sixteen Methodists. By the end of the year the church building was outgrown and the congregation accepted a free lot from the Capital Commission and erected another church, costing $3,000. This was located on the present church site and was dedicated Sept. 26, 1869.

By 1871 the membership was 202. The next year it reached 300, and a parsonage was built. A wing was added to the church under W. B. Slaughter in 1874-77. Subsequently what became known as the Old Stone Church was erected and completed Aug. 23, 1885. It burned in 1899, and the present edifice was built and finished Nov. 17, 1901.

During the twenty-two-year pastorate of Walter Aitken 1920-42, the church experienced considerable growth. The next pastor was Gerald Kennedy, 1942-48. His pastorate doubled the membership and more than doubled the budget. In 1945 the Second Methodist (German) Church and St. Paul merged. Kennedy was elected bishop in 1948. In 1954 a needed educational building was completed.

From the beginning St. Paul has tried to serve the spiritual needs of the community. While other churches have moved out to the residential sections, it has remained a down-town church within walking distance of hundreds of University students. A complete renovation of the sanctuary took place in 1968. In 1970 the church property was valued at $1,875,000, and the membership was 2,644.

Trinity Church was formed in 1887 by the union of Bethel and Second M. E. Churches. Its edifice depicts its history and its name, for it is three buildings in one. The first, which houses Great Hall, Youth Center, the offices and some of the classrooms, was completed in 1893. The second, which contains the sanctuary, more classrooms, and the heating plant, was dedicated in 1911. The third, housing most of the classrooms, the church parlor, the fellowship hall, and the kitchen, was erected in 1957.

Two of Trinity's ministers were chosen to head Nebraska Wesleyan University—D. W. C. Huntington in 1891. and Vance Rogers in 1957. The church provides a large share of the support of a missionary, and within the last six years has given seven of its young people to full-time Christian service.

With a membership of 2,384 in 1970, situated near the Nebraska state capitol building and in the heart of the older residential section of the city, Trinity ministers to statesmen, business leaders, and people from all walks of life.

LINCOLN CONFERENCE. (See CENTRAL WEST and SOUTHWEST CONFERENCES.)

LINDSEY WILSON COLLEGE, Columbia, Kentucky, was founded by the LOUISVILLE CONFERENCE in 1904 as a secondary and normal school. Junior college work was added in 1923, and secondary and normal offerings were discontinued in 1932.

The school carries the name of Lindsey Wilson, the deceased nephew and stepson of the late Mrs. Catherine Wilson of Louisville, Kentucky, who contributed $6,000 toward the erection of the administration building, the central building of the campus. Through the years the college has served youth from the Cumberland plateau section of Kentucky. The governing board has twenty-four members elected by the KENTUCKY and Louisville Annual Conferences.

JOHN O. GROSS

LINEBERRY, FRANK WATSON (1883-1949), American Methodist Protestant minister, was born at Plymouth, Ind. Aug. 7, 1883. He graduated from ADRIAN COLLEGE in 1908. In 1910 he married Mable Fordyce and the same year was admitted on trial in the Indiana M. P. Conference. He served as Conference President from 1929 to 1939, when Methodist Union was consummated. He was a member of the Commission on Union. He died at Port Angeles, Wash., Jan. 9, 1949.

HAROLD THRASIER

LINKS, JACOB (? -1825), first South African Wesleyan minister and martyr, was a Namaqua Hottentot, who had some schooling at Klamiesberg mission station. He learned from both Dutch and English and became a schoolteacher and interpreter for the missionaries. In 1818 he was accepted as the first African minister. He worked with another Namaqua, Johannes Jaager, and the English Wesleyan missionary, WILLIAM THRELFALL, among the bushmen. In 1825 all three crossed the Orange River to pioneer among the bushmen; but during that autumn, all were murdered at the instigation of their guide.

LINTHICUM HEIGHTS, MARYLAND, U.S.A. Holly Run Chapel, constructed in 1828, was the first building ever erected by members of the nascent METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH. These included the Lintnithums, Shipleys and Hammonds who had left Patapsco M. E. Church during the MUTUAL RIGHTS controversy. The 27 x 33 foot structure of British ship ballast brick stood until 1966 at Annapolis and Camp Meade Roads, south of BALTIMORE. Then it was painstakingly reassembled brick by brick adjacent to the present third edifice of the congregation now called the Linthicum Heights United Methodist Church. By the time of its rededication, May 19, 1968, some original furnishings of the long disused structure had been reacquired and installed.

EDWIN SCHELL

LINZELL, LEWIS EDWIN (1868-1927), was a M.E. missionary in INDIA from 1899 to the time of his death in 1927. He was born in LONDON, England, but migrated to CANADA in his teens and then to the United States. He attended OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY and in 1896 obtained a bachelor's degree. He married a fellow student, Phila Keen, daughter of Methodist minister and author, Samuel A. Keen. Linzell joined the CINCINNATI CONFERENCE, served several Ohio churches, and then in 1899 went to India as a missionary. After a fruitful pastorate at Bowen Church in BOMBAY, and a term as superintendent of the Bombay District, he became a charter member of the GUJARAT ANNUAL CONFERENCE, and principal of the Florence B. Nicholson School of Theology.

In 1912, and again in 1924, Linzell represented Gujarat Conference in the GENERAL CONFERENCE. As a speaker on India and Methodist missions, he proved to be unusually popular. A writer of the day described him as "a vivacious, virile, vivid and veracious reporter and advocate of Missions." He died in Ohio.

J. WASKOM PICKETT

LIPPITT, CHRISTOPHER (1744-1824), officer in the American Revolution, pioneer manufacturer, and Methodist layman, was born in Cranston, R. I., the son of Christopher and Catherine (Holden) Lippitt and the great-grandson of John Lippitt of England who settled in RHODE ISLAND in 1638.

After holding several public positions he was commissioned Lieutenant-Colonel on Jan. 18, 1776, joined the continental army and served in the battles of White Plains, Trenton and Princeton. Brevetted a Brigadier General by Washington, he commanded the state forces in the Battle of Rhode Island, Aug. 29, 1778. During the Revolution his brother in New York made him aware of the spirituality and enthusiasm of the Methodists. Thereafter, Christopher Lippitt's home in Cranston became, as frequent visitor FRANCIS ASBURY said, "an open house for Methodists." In 1791 JESSE LEE preached there; a class was formed in 1794 with the General, his wife and daughter as members. Largely at his own expense Lippitt erected a chapel near his home in 1800 in which, two years later, ASBURY and WHATCOAT ordained preachers. The General often conducted services, frequently reading a Wesley sermon. He was a member of the Providence Peace Society. As a businessman he built the third cotton mill in Rhode Island.

General Lippitt was married to Waite Harris on March 23, 1777. They had twelve children. On June 17, 1824, he died in Cranston, where his house still stands.

ERNEST R. CASE

LIPSCOMB, WILLIAM CORRIE (1792-1879), American advocate of reform and modification in M. E. church government, and a prominent leader in the establishment of the M. P. Church, was born Sept. 13, 1792, in King William County, Va., and grew up in Georgetown, D. C. He joined the M. E. Church and took an active role in church work. He attended the Convention of Methodist Reformers from Maryland and the District of Columbia in BALTIMORE in November 1826, and came to be an outstanding member of the General Convention of reformers which met on Nov. 12, 1828, also in Baltimore. It was Lipscomb who offered the resolution calling for the appointment of a committee to prepare a "Constitution and Discipline" to be submitted to the General Convention in Baltimore in November 1830. Because he attended the convention, he was stripped of all his official positions in the M. E. Church. In June 1829, he was licensed to exhort in the M. P. Church; he was licensed to preach in October 1829, and was ordained a deacon in 1832. He was one of the founders in 1832 of the Ninth Street M. P. Church in Washington, then a station in the MARYLAND CONFERENCE. At the request of the quarterly conference, he was placed "in charge of the society" until a pastor was appointed in 1833. He was secretary of the Convention of 1830 and of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1834, and was a member of the General Conferences of 1838, 1842, 1850 and served as President of the General Conference that met in May 1858, at Lynchburg, Va. Despite President Lipscomb's efforts to prevent a split at this conference, the M. P. conferences divided bitterly over the issue of slavery. He was a member and served as temporary chairman of the convention which met in Montgomery, Ala., on May 7, 1867. He served as a lay delegate to the Maryland Conference in 1840, 1844, 1845, 1850, 1853, 1859, 1861 and 1865 and was Chairman of the Electoral College which met in Philadelphia in April 1858. He was often a contributor to The Methodist Protestant, the official church periodical, where he exhibited "a strong, logical intellect and uncompromising adherence to his convictions." "As a preacher he was clear, forcible, and tender, though his close attention to secular pursuits made his ministrations in later life uninfrequent." One of his sons, A. A. Lipscomb, D.D., LL.D. (1816-1890), taught for many years at VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY and served as an unstationed minister to the M. P. Church in Montgomery, Ala.

William Corrie Lipscomb died on Dec. 6, 1879, and was buried in Oak Hill Cemetery in Washington, D. C.

LITERATURE, BRITISH METHODISM IN. A short entry on this theme cannot attempt to be exhaustive nor to distinguish finally between enduring literature and mere mention in print. Not even all the works of JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY would qualify for this former category, but certainly John Wesley's Journal and a number of the hymns by John and Charles and a few of their followers should be included. The hymns have their own reference; the Journal is an unequalled picture of the eighteenth century and of the birth and growth of a movement during fifty years of heroic missionary travel. With these should certainly be mentioned Robert Southey's Life of Wesley (1820), the first of the biographies to win a place in literature, though some of the Lives of Early Methodist Preachers (collected edition, 1837-38) have their own claims to remembrance.

Apart from these, Methodism made its first appearance in English literature through numerous satirical and unflattering references in the works of novelists and dramatists. GEORGE WHITEFIELD was much more target of caricature than the Wesleys at this stage, notably in Fielding's Tom Jones (1749) and in Samuel Foote's play, The Minor (1769). More general accounts of Methodist conversions are given in Richard Graves' Spiritual Quixote (1773) and Smollett's Humphrey Clinker (1771). Horace Walpole's Letters contain a brief description of Wesley as a preacher ("wondrous clean . . . as evidently an actor as Garrick"), and Boswell's Life of Johnson includes the doctor's famous complaint that John Wesley could talk well on many subjects but was never at leisure. George Crabbe in The Borough describes a Methodist sermon.

In the novels of the nineteenth century it is not always easy to distinguish whether Methodism is referred to or some other evangelical Dissenting body. Those which cannot be identified are therefore omitted. The Dissenting pastors of both Dickens and Thackeray, for instance, are caricatures of anonymous denomination who have had a long progeny in the English novel, through H. C. Wells and J. B. Priestley right into our own time. But among more definite references, Jane Austen makes Mary Crawford in Mansfield Park (1815) assign the clergyman hero slightly to "some great company of Methodists," and Disraeli mentions Methodism not unsympathetically in Sybil (1845). With the Brontës, however, we are on firmer ground; the references are those of familiarity. C. Elsie Harrison has pointed out that Emily's picture in Wuthering Heights (1847) of the Rev. Jabez Branderham is certainly inspired by the celebrated JABEZ BUNTING; and the revival at Briarmains Chapel represents, from the outside, something that was well-known or remembered in the West Riding. Charlotte Brontë makes unmistakable and unflattering comments about Methodism in both Shirley (1849) and Villette (1853), and the former novel has the unforgettable saga of the clash between the church and chapel Sunday school processions. Mrs. Gaskell, as befits the wife of a Dissenting minister, is gentler, both in her vivid account of Wesley's friend, Parson Grimshaw of Haworth (Life of Charlotte Brontë, 1857), and in her amusing account of a Methodist proposal of marriage in Ruth (1853).

But the most important presentation of Methodism in nineteenth-century literature is undoubtedly that of George Eliot in Adam Bede (1859). Here for the first time in fiction Methodists are fully and sympathetically shown; both Seth Bede and DINAH MORRIS are drawn from life, and Dinah's preaching on the green and mission to the condemned girl are based on actual happenings in the life of George Eliot's remarkable Methodist aunt, ELIZABETH T. EVANS.

Toward the end of the nineteenth century the references in novels become more numerous, including many of little literary value, now forgotten. Among the more memorable are those in Arnold Bennett's novels of the Five Towns (e.g., The Old Wives' Tale, 1908); these are based on a close and critical acquaintance with respectable Victorian chapel going in the industrial towns. After this the task of distinguishing between ephemeral and enduring literature becomes difficult, and only a few pointers can be given. Among others, references of varying length and interest can be found in the works of Quiller-Couch (Hetty Wesley), John Buchan (Midwinter), Sheila Kaye-Smith, Howard Spring (Fame is the Spur, And Another Thing), Joyce Cary, Robert Graves, etc. In biography, the unhappy reminiscences of Peter Fletcher (The Long Sunday, 1958) may be added to M. K. Ashby's picture of a nearly vanished village Methodism in Joseph Ashby of Tysoe (1961) and Herbert Palmer's account of a manse childhood in The Mistletoe Child (1935). Early Methodism's lack of educational privilege is reflected throughout this summary, in the dearth of specific dramatic or poetic references, if we exclude, as before, the possible evangelical references in poems by Browning and Masefield. Perhaps the most famous certain reference in drama is W. S. Gilbert's to the King of Barataria, who influenced the whole plot of The Gondoliers (1889) by becoming "a Wesleyan Methodist of the most bigoted and persecuting type."

LITTLE, CHARLES JOSEPH (1840-1911), American clergyman and college professor, was born at Philadelphia, Pa., Sept. 9, 1840. The University of Pennsylvania awarded him the A.B. in 1861 and the A.M. in 1864. After beginning his ministry in the M. E. Church as a member of the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE, he spent the academic year 1870-1871 in study at the University of Berlin. During this period of study he met Anna Marina Schultze, whom he married Dec. 3, 1872. To this union four children, a son and three daughters, were born.

After continued service in the Methodist ministry following his study abroad, he became professor of mathematics in Dickinson Seminary. After two years of teaching, he returned to the pastorate, but before a year had passed he was back at DICKINSON COLLEGE as professor of philosophy and history. After eleven years (1874-1885) in this position, he became professor of logic and history at SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY and continued there until 1891.

With this somewhat unusual background, Charles Joseph Little became professor of historical theology at GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE in 1891. Four years later he was made president of the school though this election, fortunately for several generations of students, did not mean that he ceased to teach. He continued this dual role of teacher and administrator until his death in 1911.

Technically, Little was not a trained theologian but he was in a very real way a comprehensive scholar and this masterful ability served him in good stead in those turbulent days when faculties and church conferences were often involved in bitter controversy over the issues of science, especially evolution and the higher criticism in biblical studies. If he did not enjoy a good fight, he did not shrink from controversy. He once said to the writer, "I do not know much Hebrew" (as a linguist, he did know Greek, Latin, Italian, German and French), but he added defiantly, "I do know enough Hebrew so that these experts cannot bamboozle me." An intimate colleague said this about him: "He appeared to be an inexhaustible fountain of information, giving the impression of encyclopedic knowledge available at a moments notice."

Delegates to the several M. E. GENERAL CONFERENCES to which he was elected promptly recognized him as one who could state the reason for the faith that was in him promptly and vigorously. His leadership in American Methodism at home was recognized by British Methodism in an invitation to give the celebrated FERNLEY LECTURE in 1900. In addition to the published Fernley Lecture, we have Christianity and the Nineteenth Century, The Angel and the Flame, a volume of sermons, and Biographical and Literary Studies. The contents of this last volume represent the wide range of his scholarship. There are essays entitled: The Apostle Paul, Hildebrand, Dante, Savonarola, Galileo, Ibsen, The Place of Christ in Modern Thought, etc. Eight of his addresses are printed in the memorial volume edited by his successor, CHARLES MACAULEY STUART. His address on Lincoln at the centennial of that man's birth deserves perpetuation as a model of character analysis and oratory at its best.

Little served the church in the PHILADELPHIA and ROCK RIVER CONFERENCES. He died March 11, 1911.

HORACE GREELEY SMITH

LITTLE ROCK, ARKANSAS, U.S.A., is the capital of and is situated in the center of the state on the Arkansas River. In 1970 the city had a population of 128,880. The city has registered a rapid growth in industry and new business in recent years. Although predominantly agricultural, the city is also the seat of a large number of home offices for insurance companies and other firms. Its cultural and educational growth is reflected in Little Rock University, the Arkansas Arts Center, and various historical museums and sites.

There are 17,939 members of The United Methodist Church in Little Rock. The A.M.E. CHURCH and the C.M.E. CHURCH also have representative bodies.

The office of the Bishop of the Arkansas Area and Area Headquarters are located here. The Arkansas Methodist Children's Home is situated in the western part of the city. PHILANDER SMITH COLLEGE, a Methodist institution, is near the heart of the downtown area. Camp Aldersgate, operated by the Board of Missions of The United Methodist Church, lies just outside the city.

First Church, "The Cathedral of Arkansas Methodism," is the mid-city church of Little Rock and houses the office of the Bishop of the Arkansas Area. The church was organized in 1831, five years before Arkansas was admitted as a state into the Union. It has occupied three buildings in its 135-year history: the first was a small brick chapel built in 1836. The ground on which the present church stands was purchased in 1879 and a stately brick structure then erected. This building was destroyed by fire in 1895. A new red brick building (seating 1,000) was erected in 1899 and is still in use. In 1951 a $500,000 educational building was completed. Usually general sessions of the Arkansas Area of The Methodist Church are held in First Church. During the Civil War the pastor, Richard Colburn Butler, was deposed by Federal authorities and a minister of the M. E. Church placed in charge for a brief period.

In 1958 all property on the block was purchased for future expansion, together with a large parking lot across the street. An activities building contains a gymnasium, recreation rooms, Boy Scout room, craft department, and other facilities for serving all ages in a weekday downtown program.

Three former pastors of First Church have been elected to the office of bishop: H. BASCOM WATTS, WILLIAM C. MARTIN, and AUBREY G. WALTON, the latter being elected in 1960 when serving as pastor. With a staff of thirteen persons, including three ordained ministers, and a membership of 2,646, First Church continues as a vital force in the city of Little Rock, and in its laity furnishes some of the prominent leaders in civic and business affairs in the state and city. Three governors of the state have been members of the congregation. The church also serves parishioners residing in every section of Little Rock, North Little Rock, and many in Pulaski County.

The church has assisted in the organization of a large number of new Methodist congregations in the city, and has supported them financially and by supplying members.

Miles Chapel was organized under the leadership of her first pastor, John Peyton, before the C. M. E. Church was born (1870).

MILES CHAPEL C.M.E., LITTLE ROCK, ARKANSAS

In the church's infancy it was denominationally independent. Bishop W. H. MILES took the congregation into the C. M. E. Church in July 1873, and named it Miles Chapel.

Miles Chapel was host to the C. M. E. General Conference of 1890. It is the oldest C. M. E. Church west of the Mississippi. Miles Chapel has always housed the members in a brick church. It has had three locations: 3rd and Ferry; 5th and Rector; and 5th and Bender, the present site.

Pulaski Heights Church is the largest Methodist church in membership in the state of Arkansas. Needing a church in the rolling hills section of western Little Rock, Pulaski Heights was organized in 1912. The church grew rapidly and as early as 1923 it became apparent that additional facilities would be needed. The depression and World War II prevented the congregation from carrying out plans for a new building, but in 1948 plans were put out for bids for a beautiful Gothic church. The bids far exceeded all expectations and the Board gloomily faced the prospect of further delay in achieving the dream of this congregation; then the voice of one woman stood out as she said, "A church is not built with dollars and cents, a church is built with faith! . . . I move we begin construction immediately." Today the church stands just three blocks from the original building, ministering to the children, youth and adults in this section of the city. To the sanctuary have been added an educational building and a youth building. Church school classes meet during the week as well as on Sunday. Family night programs; a Mothers' Day Out each week, where young children are cared for in the church as mother has a day out; a choir program for all ages; a community service program called "opportunities for action," and many other weekday as well as Sunday programs make this church a vital part of Methodism.

Full or part time support is given to missionaries serving HONG KONG and OKINAWA. The T. J. and Inez Raney lectures given each May in the church bring distinguished ministers to the city of Little Rock to enrich and revitalize the spiritual and cultural life of the community. Many young men have gone from this church to serve as ministers and today are giving outstanding leadership to The United Methodist Church.

Pulaski Heights Church has had a great past and looks to the future with an effective approach to programming related to our world today. Its 1970 membership was 3,957.

LITTLE ROCK CONFERENCE was created in 1866 by changing the name of the Ouachita Conference. No mergers, divisions, or rearrangement of conference boundaries were involved. The Little Rock Conference covers the south half of the state of Arkansas. (See ARKANSAS for history of early Methodism in state.)

It was said jokingly that the name of the Ouachita Conference was changed because the preachers did not know how to spell it, but the real reason was the decreasing influence of streams in the lives of the people and the rising importance of cities. The first three conferences in Arkansas—Arkansas, Ouachita, and White River—were named for rivers. By 1914 all of the river names had disappeared. Little Rock was not only the capital city, it was and still is the chief metropolis in the state. Many conferences were and still are named for the largest city within their boundaries, and most of the episcopal areas of the church today are identified by the names of the cities in which the bishops reside.

The church at Washington, ten miles west of Hope, is historically important. The Washington Male and Female Academy flourished in Washington for fifteen years before the Civil War, and the town itself served as the capital of Arkansas during the last two years of that conflict. Methodism was established in the vicinity of Washington in 1817 by WILLIAM STEVENSON, a local preacher from MISSOURI. Washington was the center from which Methodism first made its way into both TEXAS and OKLAHOMA. The Washington Church was organized in 1822, and its present building, a large well preserved colonial style edifice, was erected in 1860. The conference historical society has published a pamphlet on the church, and it has assisted the congregation with the renovation of the building and restoration of original fixtures. The church has been recommended for designation as a historical landmark or shrine in the denomination.

The Methodist Children's home in Little Rock is supported by both Arkansas Conferences. The Arkansas Methodist, long the official paper for Arkansas Methodism, is published in that city.

When created in 1866 the Little Rock Conference had about fifty-one appointments and approximately 7,000 church members. In 1970, the conference had 173 pastoral charges, 83,758 members, and its churches, parsonages, and other property were valued at more than $34,824,683.

LITTLEJOHN, JOHN (1756-1836), pioneer American preacher, was born in Penrith, Cumberland County, England, Dec. 7, 1756. Emigrating with his family to America about 1767, he was awakened under the ministry of JOHN KING in MARYLAND in 1774.

Entering the conference in 1777, he traveled two years and then married, returning to the local ranks. After location he settled in LEESBURG, Va., and remained there until 1819, when he moved to LOUISVILLE, Ky. Later Littlejohn went to Warren County and finally to Logan County, Ky. In 1831 he was readmitted to the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE, transferred to the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE, and was placed on the superannuate list, where he remained until his death.

As early as 1775 Littlejohn, while traveling from Annapolis to Montgomery County, Md., was taken before a magistrate for not having a pass. He was opposed to the oath required by VIRGINIA and Maryland during the Revolutionary War. The Maryland oath was obnoxious to both pro-British and pro-American persons. Later he escaped being tarred and feathered because a magistrate protected him.

Only a few American ministers were as able as Littlejohn in his day. During his brief itinerancy he was one of the most efficient and useful pastors. Noted for his intellectual ability, piety, and devotion to the church, thousands were converted under his eloquent preaching.

He earned a name for himself in the national annals when in the War of 1812, President James Madison—who had to flee Washington—committed to Littlejohn the original Declaration of Independence and other priceless documents for safekeeping.

Littlejohn died on May 13, 1836, during the GENERAL CONFERENCE.

LITTLETON FEMALE COLLEGE, Littleton, N. C., opened in January 1882, as Central Institute for Young Ladies. In the following month it was chartered by the General Assembly of NORTH CAROLINA when Littleton civic leaders formed a corporation to operate the school "for the intellectual, moral and religious development and training of young ladies." A number of substantial three-story frame buildings were erected on the grounds of the College. The charter was amended in 1888 to change the name of the institution to Littleton Female College. In 1912 the "Female" was dropped from the name, although only women continued to be admitted.

In 1889, JAMES MANLY RHODES, who, with the exception of two years, was President of the College during its entire history, purchased Littleton Female College from its stockholders and immediately began an extensive program of improvements. In the administration of the College, Rhodes was assisted by a faculty and staff noteworthy for their character, ability and scholarship. Littleton College offered a wide variety of courses. In addition to the Preparatory Department, there was a Training School for nurses, a Practice and Observation School for prospective teachers, and a Business School.

A natural result of Rhodes' affiliation with the M. E. Church, South, was a strong religious influence at Littleton College. Special emphasis was placed on religious training and on the formation and growth of character. Bible was a required course for every student. As a result of the religious atmosphere which characterized the academic program and due to the moderate tuition fees charged, many daughters of itinerant Methodist ministers attended Littleton College. The College was enthusiastically endorsed by resolutions passed at the annual conferences of the M. E. Church, South, and the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M. P. Church. News of College activities frequently appeared in The Raleigh Christian Advocate and The North Carolina Christian Advocate. The Charter provided that all bequests and donations were to become the property of the M. E. Church, South. A large number of alumnae became teachers in North Carolina's public schools and in various colleges. Many former students entered the foreign mission field. The editor of The Raleigh Christian Advocate once observed that from Littleton College were "going forth positive moral, mental and social influences which must play an important part in developing the Christian womanhood of the South."

The college enrollment was impressive with more than 200 students attending each session for many years. There were 274 students enrolled in 1907. Governor Charles B. Aycock, North Carolina's famous educational governor, was a trustee of Littleton Female College; it was the only educational institution except the University of North Carolina of which he served as trustee.

Fire destroyed the Littleton College buildings on the night of Jan. 22, 1919, with a loss estimated in excess of $50,000. Due to his advanced age and poor health, and the fact that the College was not endowed, President Rhodes decided not to replace the buildings and Littleton College closed.

The Littleton College Memorial Association was organized in 1927 by alumnae and friends of the former college who have met annually since then to keep alive the spirit and work of the college. At the annual meeting in July 1961, held at Pullen Park, Raleigh, N. C., President Thomas A. Collins of NORTH CAROLINA WESLEYAN COLLEGE, Rocky Mount, N. C., extended an invitation to the members of the Association to meet in the following July on the grounds of the new Methodist college which serves the same general area as that of Littleton College. "North Carolina Wesleyan College is in a very real sense a spiritual outgrowth of Littleton College," stated President Collins, and noted that the flame lighted by the earlier institution was still very much alive. He invited the alumnae of Littleton College to consider themselves the first "alumni organization" of the new college. Annual reunions since 1961 have been held at North Carolina Wesleyan College.

LITTLETON COLLEGE MEMORIAL COLLECTION, Rocky Mount, N. C., U.S.A., is an extensive collection of memorabilia of the former Littleton Female College. In 1960 the Littleton College Memorial Association (organized in 1927) voted to establish a Littleton College Memorial Collection of books to be presented to the library of the new NORTH CAROLINA WESLEYAN COLLEGE at Rocky Mount. In addition to these resource books, material consisting of catalogues, annuals, literary magazines, literary society pins, diplomas, numerous photographs and clippings and various other items specifically associated with the history of Littleton Female College was assembled. This collection was presented to the North Carolina Wesleyan College Library and duplicates were placed in the Southern Historical Collection in the library at the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill.

The Association has also established the Vara L. Her-ring Scholarship at SCARRITT COLLEGE and the Littleton College Memorial Loan Fund at North Carolina Wesleyan College.

The Littleton College Memorial Collection is a valuable assemblage of information for the researcher interested in the history and development of education in the late Victorian era and the early twentieth century.

LIVERMORE, MELVA A. (1869-1941), was a missionary in India appointed by the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. E. Church. She was born in Chanton County, Mo., April 9, 1869, and was educated in NORTH-WESTERN UNIVERSITY (B.A.) and Columbia University (M.A.).

Miss Livermore was outstanding as an educator, an evangelist, and a worker for the public welfare. She began her career as an educator in KANSAS at the age of sixteen, by teaching in a country school. She pursued her own education zealously, graduating and taking teacher's training. Going to India in 1916, she served as principal of a girls' boarding school in Meerut and of Ingraham Institute in Ghaziabad. She contributed much to the developments that have placed both of those institutions in the front ranks of church and mission schools. The former is now an intermediate college for girls, and the latter is one of India's best known and most successful vocational high schools and centers for extension education.

As an evangelist, she often spent weeks touring by ox cart in the villages without returning to her home. Her associations were with the poor, the oppressed, and the illiterate. She established and supervised many primary day schools and woman's societies, wrote a life of Christ in simple Hindustani for newly literate villagers, and entered into the life of those humble people as one who delighted to serve.

She won the admiration of all classes and was appointed a member of the municipal board of Ghaziabad. She retired in 1936, but was in demand as a speaker about missions and people in India until her death on July 31, 1941.

LIVERPOOL, England. Methodism was bound up with the rapid growth of southwest Lancashire in the nineteenth century, when the area changed from a county of few parishes and scattered population into one of the greatest manufacturing centers in the world. The city of Liverpool grew from almost nothing at the same swift rate, and most of the people who built Methodism there came from outside. JOHN WESLEY often used the port, and the old Lancashire North Circuit dated from 1766; a Liverpool Circuit first appears in 1771. The Liverpool North and Liverpool South Circuits were formed in 1826, though by that time Mount Pleasant Chapel had long been built (1789) and also Brunswick, the most famous of these early chapels. This was the scene of the Wesleyan Conference of 1820, at which the Liverpool Minutes were drawn up, to remain, with alterations made in 1885 and 1944, the standard description of the ideal Methodist minister.

The advance of Methodism was interrupted by the controversies of 1834-37. SAMUEL WARREN was warmly supported in the Liverpool South Circuit. It was in Liverpool that David Rowland, a class leader, was charged before his leaders' meeting with "assisting with the formation of a certain Association," and with taking part in public meetings to advocate its views. He and some others were expelled from Wesleyan Methodism for their part in this agitation, and it was actually at a meeting in Liverpool that the WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION was formed and its constitution adopted. When the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH was formed in 1907, there were four circuits in Liverpool; these were united into a single circuit in 1929, shortly before METHODIST UNION in 1932.

As for PRIMITIVE METHODISM in Liverpool, WILLIAM CLOWES preached in the city in 1813, but does not seem to have established any regular work. When John Ride, another Primitive Methodist itinerant, preached there in 1821, he was arrested by a civil officer and lodged in the prison; it is said that ADAM CLARKE, the Wesleyan Methodist preacher, intervened with the magistrates to obtain his release. The Tunstall Circuit was missioning Liverpool at this time; and through the preaching of James Bonser, who arrived in Liverpool in January 1822, enough progress was made for the establishment of a separate Liverpool circuit in 1823.

For some years vigorous Welsh Methodist churches (see WALES) were found on Merseyside, and a circuit seems to have existed as far back as 1803. There was large nineteenth-century immigration from WALES, and so a strong group of societies emerged, which were for a time grouped in the Liverpool District but later transferred to the First North Wales District. A number of men entered the Wesleyan Methodist ministry from these churches, including the grandfather of HUGH PRICE HUGHES. Little of this work now remains, however. The children and grandchildren of the early immigrants have lost the Welsh language; they attended English schools, married into English families, and have gradually been assimilated for the most part into the English religious world. The future would seem to hold little promise for this part of Methodist work.

The most striking figure in later Liverpool Methodism was the Wesleyan Methodist minister CHARLES GARRETT, a famous early leader of the Methodist teetotal movement. He became the first superintendent of the new Liverpool Central Mission, an offshoot of the FORWARD MOVEMENT, in 1882, the year in which he was also elected president of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference. He remained at Liverpool until his death in 1900, and made the mission the center of Methodist evangelism and social work in the city.

Liverpool Methodism suffered badly during the air raids made on Merseyside during the Second World War. Churches were damaged or destroyed; the dispersal of population affected the older churches, for many people never returned to their old homes and did not pick up the threads of their old religious lives. After the war an extensive building program had to be undertaken to restore damaged churches and to build new ones, and to put new churches on the large housing estates which were a feature of the reconstruction of the area. All the same, it may be said that Liverpool has suffered less than many other areas of the industrial North from the general religious decline of the past fifty years. Careful planning of the work and the redeployment of the ministry have helped to relate the church afresh to the town and surrounding country. A regular service has been set up to meet all immigrants entering the port. In 1954 one of the first Methodist INTERNATIONAL HOUSES was opened for overseas students; this has been enlarged and two other hostels have been added. A former missionary is presently employed among the large West Indian population in the city. Unlike many other districts, Liverpool has been able to report some increase of membership in the years since 1945.

LIVERPOOL MINUTES. At the British Wesleyan Methodist Liverpool Conference of 1820 a decrease in the membership of the connection was reported for the first time since annual returns of membership had been instituted. Moved by a sense of responsibility, the preachers passed a series of resolutions, pledging themselves to renewed devotion to their pastoral and preaching duties. These were known as the 'Liverpool Minutes,' and it was directed that they should be read in every May Synod and once a year in a meeting of the ministers in every circuit. In 1885 the 'Resolutions on Pastoral Work' were substituted, but the bulk of the earlier document was retained.

LIVES OF EARLY METHODIST PREACHERS. JOHN WESLEY required of his preachers that they set down an account of their "call to preach and present religious experience," a practice which survives in the public testimony of candidates for ordination. Many of these accounts were printed in the Arminian Magazine. As connexional editor, THOMAS JACKSON compiled a selection of thirty-seven of them under the title The Lives of Early Methodist Preachers (3 vols., 1837-38). In the third edition (6 vols., 1865-66), he added an introductory essay and four additional lives. A later connexional editor, JOHN TELFORD, published a two-volume annotated selection of thirteen of the lives under the title Wesley's Veterans (1909), to which subsequently (1912-14) he added five more volumes containing twenty-three additional lives. A table correlating Telford's seven-volume arrangement with Jackson's six is given in Proceedings of the Wesley Historical Society, xxii, 102-5.

LIVINGSTON, G. HERBERT (1916-), American FREE METHODIST and ordained elder of the Kentucky-Tennessee Conference of his church, was born at Russell, Iowa, and married Maria Saarloos, in 1937. He was educated at WESSINGTON SPRINGS COLLEGE, South Dakota (B.A.), Kletzing College, Oskaloosa, Iowa (A.B.), ASBURY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY (B.D.), and DREW UNIVERSITY (Ph.D.). He served as a pastor for fifteen years in Wisconsin, Iowa, New York and South Dakota, was dean of Wessington Springs College for two years and has been professor of Old Testament at Asbury Theological Seminary since 1953. He has participated in archaeological excavations in Israel and Jordan. Dr. Livingston holds membership in the Academy of Religion; Society of Biblical Literature; National Association of Professors of Hebrew; Evangelical Theological Society and Wesley Theological Society. He is the author of Genesis and Jeremiah, Aldersgate Biblical Series; Psalms 73-150 in Wesleyan Bible Commentary; Genesis, in Beacon Bible Commentary; and Jonah and Obadiah in Wycliffe Bible Commentary.

LIVING EPISTLE, THE, a holiness magazine, was first introduced to Evangelicals in January 1869, as an independent piece of journalism. REUBEN YEAKEL, later bishop, and Elisha Hoffman, a song writer, were co-editors. It was a twenty-four page monthly during its first year, which was increased to thirty-two pages in the second year. Supported by a group of ministers and laymen as a private venture to teach holiness in accordance with the Bible and the Evangelical Discipline, it was offered to and accepted by the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1871. Under the auspices of the Publishing House at least two-thirds of its pages were used for family and Sunday school purposes. By 1875, it had lost its primary purpose and was serving the Sunday schools of the church. By the end of 1907 its usefulness had disappeared, even as a Sunday school paper, and it was discontinued.

LYOYD, JOHN SELWYN BROOKE (1904-), British statesman and Methodist layman, was born on July 28, 1904. His father and grandfather were both called John Wesley Lloyd, and his great-grandfather was a Methodist minister. He was educated at Fettes School and at Magdalene College, Cambridge. In 1927 he was president of the Cambridge Union. His later career was divided between law, politics, and the army. A barrister of Gray's Inn, he joined the Northern Circuit in 1930, and in 1951 became a Master of the Bench, Gray's Inn. He served throughout the Second World War in the army, rising from second lieutenant to brigadier in 1944. He was also staff officer on H.Q. Second Army until the surrender of Germany. After the war he entered the House of Commons as M.P. for the Wirral Division of Cheshire; he was minister of state at the Foreign Office from 1951 to 1954, and then within a period of fifteen months he was successively minister of supply, minister of defence, and secretary of state for foreign affairs, all in Conservative cabinets. He was foreign secretary, 1955-60, a period including the Suez crisis, which led to the resignation of Anthony Eden as prime minister. After an unusually long period at the Foreign Office, Lloyd was chancellor of the exchequer, 1960-62, when he instituted his famous "wage pause" and set up the National Economic Development Council. When he left office in 1962, he was asked to prepare a report on the organization of the Conservative party. He returned to office in 1963 in Sir Alec Douglas-Home's government, as lord privy seal and leader of the House of Commons. He was made a privy councillor in 1951 and a companion of honour in 1962.

LOCAL PREACHERS IN AMERICA. (See MINISTRY IN AMERICAN METHODISM, THE.)

LOCAL PREACHERS. Early History. As early as 1738 JOHN WESLEY recognized the value of a layman who was prepared to witness publicly to his Christian experience, and to exhort others to a similar acceptance of saving faith. Such was JOSEPH HUMPHREYS when Wesley first sponsored him, though later he turned from "exhorting" to the authoritative exposition of scripture, and was ordained. Similarly Wesley accepted the services at BRISTOL in 1739 of JOHN CENNICK. He was also happy to use THOMAS MAXFIELD as an exhorter in LONDON, but was both distressed and angry when Maxfield stepped over the narrow line dividing exhorting from expounding—the latter (in Wesley's view) the prerogative of a DEACON who had been episcopally ordained to the ministry of the Word of God. By 1741, however, Wesley had accepted Maxfield as his first "son in the gospel," i.e. a layman commissioned to a full time preaching ministry. Others speedily followed, and the term "preacher" was soon applied equally to exhorters and expounders, the subtle distinction almost forgotten. The expounders or preachers, however, were the forerunners of the Methodist MINISTRY, and the exhorters of the order of Methodist Local Preachers.

Wesley continued to emphasize the difference in the years that followed, although this left little trace in the official Minutes of the Methodist conferences. Those lay preachers whom he recognized as possessing suitable gifts and graces he usually called to itinerate among the Methodist societies as his HELPERS, and with the development of defined CIRCUITS one of these helpers in each was designated to oversee the others as Wesley's ASSISTANT. After Wesley's death these achieved the title which he had resisted, that of "minister." Sometimes the itinerant or travelling preacher was prevented from fulfilling a preaching engagement, and on such occasions his place might be taken by a substitute—possibly a Methodist who had already gained some pastoral experience as a CLASS LEADER, possibly a recent convert who was urged to relate his Christian experience in place of a regular sermon.

In 1747 Wesley carefully examined the situation in Cornwall, an area of rapidly expanding societies and insufficient itinerants. He found that of eighteen "exhorters" (this term was used) five were unfitted or unworthy, three were "much blessed in the work," and the remaining ten "might be helpful when there was no preacher in their own or the neighboring societies." These latter were the type of men whom he came to recognize as "local preachers," or preachers in their own locality as opposed to the itinerant preachers who travelled around wherever they were sent by Wesley. The 1747 Conference listed twenty-three travelling preachers and thirty-eight men who "assist us only in one place." Of these thirty-eight eleven later served for at least an interval as itinerants. At the 1753 Conference sixteen local preachers were present, of whom four later became itinerants.

CHARLES WESLEY urged his brother John in 1751 to make the following specific regulations about the admission of local preachers to full time service:

"With regard to the preachers, we agree:

1. That none shall be permitted to preach in any of our societies, till he be examined both as to his grace and gifts, at least by the assistant, who sending word to us may by our answer admit him a local preacher.
2. That such preacher be not immediately taken from his trade, but be exhorted to follow it with all diligence.
3. That no person shall be received as a travelling preacher or be taken from his trade by either of us alone, but by both of us conjointly, giving him a note under both our hands.

Something of this kind may well have been agreed at the 1752 English conference (whose minutes have not survived), as in fact it was at the first Irish conference, held that year in Limerick. If so, these regulations were not incorporated into the "LARGE MINUTES," which contain only a casual reference to local preachers. In the DEED OF DECLARATION of 1784 they are not mentioned at all.

Although (unlike the itinerant lay preachers) the local lay preachers were the subject of very little legislation during Wesley's lifetime, they nevertheless remained an important part of the Methodist system. As early as the 1760's regular preaching plans were prepared in some circuits to organize their activities the most usefully, and the larger a circuit became the more need there was for local preachers to supply pulpits on Sundays. With a few exceptions the local preachers were regarded as temporary substitutes who must carefully be prevented from aggrandizing themselves at the expense of the travelling preachers, and Wesley occasionally advised his assistants to "clip their wings." At the same time the "locals" were seen as potential itinerants, whose home circuit was both their training ground for the itinerancy and the more limited field of ministry to which they could return if for one reason or another either they or Wesley felt it necessary for them to leave the full time itinerancy, as many did: of two hundred itinerant preachers, accepted between 1741 and 1765, only eighty-one actually died in the full time work or as "supernumeraries."

In 1780 JOHN CROOK, the founder of Methodism in the Isle of Man, and Wesley's assistant there, met forty-five local preachers serving in the island, and the "Local Preachers' Minute Book" recording their deliberations and decisions at Pell on that occasion remained in use until 1816. Their business was conducted by the method of question and answer, as in Wesley's annual conference for the travelling preachers. Wesley's Journal for Feb. 6, 1789 speaks about "the quarterly day for meeting the local preachers" as if it were a normal thing, in London at least. Not until 1796, however, were quarterly local preachers' meetings formally incorporated into the printed legislation as a universal feature of Methodist polity. The systematic training and organization of local preachers came much later still.

Later History. One of the causes of Methodist disunity in the early nineteenth century was the tension which developed between the local and itinerant preachers as the latter settled down into a normal ministry. This tension was largely resolved when laymen were admitted to the Wesleyan Methodist Conference in 1877. But even at METHODIST UNION in 1932 it was still necessary to allow for the possibility that in extraordinary circumstances laymen—who were in practice local preachers—should administer Holy Communion.

From an early date women also were allowed to preach. Even John Wesley himself occasionally used women preachers. PRIMITIVE METHODISM prided itself—from 1803—in having "no sex limitation in church work." The Wesleyans were much slower in recognizing that women lay preachers as well as men had a legitimate call and place in the life of the church, and did not officially acknowledge this until 1918. Since that date the number of women preachers in Methodism has steadily risen, and particularly since Union—this despite the shrinkage in total membership. In 1963 one out of every five local preachers in the active work was a woman.

The systematic training of local preachers has only become general in the present century. The first written examinations were in 1927, and these became general and obligatory only after Union (1936). The Local Preachers' Department—which is answerable to the Conference for all matters relating to local preachers, particularly their training and standards—came into being only in 1937, and the first ministerial secretary to be specially responsible for this work was appointed that year. Since then the department has steadily grown in size and scope, in its activities and its influence throughout Methodism. In other communions, where the value and distinctive contribution of lay preachers is becoming increasingly recognized, the Methodist organization with its Order of Local Preachers and its facilities for training them, is both coveted and emulated.

In Methodism in Great Britain there are now about 22,000 fully accredited local preachers, and about 4,000 at various stages of their preliminary training. Three out of every four Sunday services are taken by local preachers.

LOCAL PREACHERS OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF, grew out of an 1858 New York City convention of local preachers. There persons from twelve annual conferences largely in the northeast organized the "Local Preachers' Association of the M. E. Churches of the U. S.," with provision for auxiliary conference and district associations. In 1859 at BALTIMORE the name was changed to "National, etc." The group was able to secure listing of local preachers in the annual conference minutes, held an annual convention, and also promoted historical observances such as the 1866 Centennial, and the erection of the Embury monument at ASHGROVE, N. Y. Following incorporation in Baltimore, Md., Jan. 12, 1833 for "fraternal intercourse, brotherly cooperation, the advancement of education, etc.," the Association in 1890 gained control of Ft. Wayne College from the NORTH INDIANA CONFERENCE, renamed it Taylor University and elected its trustees until the Alumni Association of the school took control in 1922.

Despite its name, the organization enlisted few supporters outside the northeast. The last known officers were elected for 1917-18.

LOCAL PREACHERS MUTUAL AID ASSOCIATION was started in Britain as the General Wesleyan Methodist Local Preachers Mutual Aid Association in July, 1849. In 1839 Wesleyanism celebrated its Centenary by raising £300,000 in a special appeal. At this time, many Wesleyan Methodist LOCAL PREACHERS were receiving Poor Law Relief while others were living in workhouses and ending their days in a pauper's grave. The Wesleyan Methodist Conference was asked to allocate a small portion of the Centenary Fund to the relief of these local preachers. The Conference not only refused to allocate any of this money but also refused to give approval to the launching of a special appeal for this particular purpose. Two local preachers, Francis Pearson and Joseph H. Marsden, met in a Matlock village and decided to call a number of local preachers together for fellowship and to consider forming a society for the benefit of the poor and sick among their number. Many difficulties were placed in their way by official Wesleyanism; but a group of them met in Aldersgate Street in July 1849, and decided to launch the association at a meeting in BIRMINGHAM later that year.

Members paid an entrance fee of ten shillings and a subscription of twopence per week. At the end of twelve months 1,260 members had enrolled, and the contributions amounted to £1,276. In the first fifteen years the membership doubled, and the income rose to £30,000, of which £22,000 was distributed to the sick and poor. Progress continued; membership grew; the scope of benefits was widened; and in the 117 years of its existence the association has distributed almost £2,000,000 in relieving those local preachers, widows, and dependents "in necessitous circumstances." The help takes various forms: weekly allowances, sickness benefits to those very elderly members who were members before the National Insurance Act came into operation, lump-sum grants, and, during the last twenty years, the provision of five Eventide Homes at Westcliff on Sea, Woodhall Spa, Minehead, Grange over Sands, and Barleythorpe (Oakham). At the last named, nursing care is given to residents in need of more care and attention than can be provided in ordinary Eventide Homes. A sixth home at Rickmansworth (Hertfordshire) was opened at the end of 1966, and here again, nursing care is provided.

The association was established on a basis of mutual aid, but as the years passed many Methodist societies expressed a wish to make grants toward the association's work as a tribute to the services of local preachers. Today almost every Methodist church in Britain allocates the whole of one Sunday's collections, or a part of that one Sunday's collections, to the association as a thank-offering. As times and circumstances change, the association—honored by Royal Patronage since 1922—has adapted changes in its methods and its work. When METHODIST UNION came in 1932 the doors were opened to all Methodist local preachers, and thousands joined from the non-Wesleyan Methodist bodies. In 1962 the association agreed to make its benefits available to all Methodist local preachers even though they had not contributed to the association's funds. All this work—apart from a small staff at the head office—has been voluntary. Local Preachers' Mutual Aid workers never ask for or receive expenses; they give freely of their time, money, and ability to help their less fortunate brethren. The association has never taken sides in church or national controversies. It is a charitable organization, registered as such with the Registrar of Friendly Societies. There are 615 branches, divided into thirty-four districts. The district committee elects delegates to the annual aggregate meeting, which any member may attend, but the 350 delegates are given hospitality and take preaching appointments in the district where the aggregate is held. The honorary officers consist of a president, a treasurer, and two secretaries; and they, with the former presidents, the ten trustees, and seventy elected members, constitute the General Committee of the association, which meets in different parts of the country nine or ten times a year. At the end of 1965 the association had 18,329 members: it was making weekly allowances to 834 local preachers, widows, and dependents; and more than 120 elderly local preachers, their wives, and widows were resident in the five Eventide Homes. During the year collections from Methodist churches provided £34,377. The total expenditure on charitable gifts, administration, and the maintenance of the homes was £99,674. Legacies were always placed in reserve, and from these the association received £20,000 in interest and dividends in the course of the year. The association is completely autonomous, administered entirely by local preachers.

LOCATION is formal cessation from the traveling ministry of the Methodist connection by one who thereby is no longer under the appointment of a bishop, but who does not lose his status as a LOCAL PREACHER. Location may be granted by a formal vote of an Annual Conference when a member requests it; but an annual conference has a right to locate a man against his own volition if it feels it proper to so terminate his membership in its body. This sometimes comes about when a man proves to be unacceptable in the traveling ministry, or is so patently unfitted for it that a suitable appointment can no longer be found for him, and thus he is requested or forced to "locate."

Many otherwise acceptable and useful men find it necessary to locate for personal reasons—for instance, family conditions, such as the invalidism of a wife, sometimes by reason of a man's own health, or the like, and when he has not reached an age when he may ask for formal superannuation or retirement. After location, one takes his place in the ranks of the local preachers, and his membership goes into the local church where he continues to work under the direction of his pastor or the district superintendent in such ways as may be possible. When an ordained minister locates, he does not lose his ordination status (except as explained below).

Each annual conference looks to its Committee on Conference Relations to pass upon a request for location when such request comes from one of its members, or when a name is referred to the Committee by a district superintendent with his own recommendation that a man be located. The annual conference is sovereign in all matters of conference relationship, and while a man located against his will formerly had the right in the M. E. Church to appeal to a Judicial Conference (Discipline, 1908, P. 160), the unchallenged principle that every organized body shall be the judge of the qualifications of its own members holds in The United Methodist Church with reference to annual conference membership.

"When a member of an Annual Conference in good standing, shall demand a located relation, the Conference shall be obliged to grant it to him." (Journal, General Conference, 1840, ME.) "This is the only relation in the church which can be changed solely by the will of the person concerned," said Bishop McTYEIRE.

The Discipline (1968, P. 368) states that a man may be located when found "unacceptable, inefficient, or indifferent in the work of the ministry," and the conference may by count vote on recommendation of the Board of the Ministry locate such a man without his consent. In such instances "the authority to exercise the ministerial office shall be suspended" (P. 368). He has today no right of appeal. Disciplinary regulations outline the duties, obligations, and responsibilities of local preachers and indicate to what body they are amenable for character and conduct.

LOCKE, CHARLES EDWARD (1858-1940), American bishop, was born in Pittsburgh, Pa., Sept. 9, 1858. The son of William H. Locke, a chaplain in the Union Army, his ancestors were of historical colonial stock. He was educated at MOUNT UNION COLLEGE and ALLEGHENY COLLEGE. He married Mina J. Woods on Dec. 27, 1882, and they had a son and a number of daughters. He joined the EAST OHIO CONFERENCE in 1881.

After eight years in small town pastorates, Locke was appointed to the famous Smithfield Street Church in PITTSBURGH, Pa., and thereupon began a career as a pastor of notable churches. For thirty years he was in the most famous and influential pulpits of the denomination. These appointments included Smithfield Street, Pittsburgh, 1888-92; First Church, PORTLAND, Ore., 1892-97; Central, SAN FRANCISCO, 1897-99; Delaware Avenue, BUFFALO, N. Y., 1899-1904; Hanson Place, BROOKLYN, 1904-08, and First Church, LOS ANGELES, 1908-20. He conducted the funeral services of President WILLIAM McKINLEY and of IRA D. SANKEY, a Methodist evangelistic singer connected with Dwight L. Moody.

Elected bishop in 1920, he served in the PHILIPPINE ISLANDS, 1920-24; St. Paul, Minn., 1924-32, retiring in May 1932. He was a delegate to the NEW ZEALAND Methodist Centennial and also to AUSTRALIA in 1922. He was elected president of the CALIFORNIA Anti-Saloon League in 1933, and was active in it and other civic and reform movements.

Bishop Locke was the author of thirteen books, which were read by devout preachers with appreciation.

He died on March 4, 1940, in Santa Monica, Calif. and was buried in Forest Lawn, Glendale, Calif.

LOCKHART, RICHARD ARTHUR (1893-1963), Irish minister, was born in BELFAST and educated at the Methodist College there. He was ordained in 1922, appointed to Mfantsipim School, Gold Coast (now GHANA), and three years later became Principal. The early development of that school, and the important place it took in the community, is due more to him than to any other person. After fourteen years he returned to IRELAND for a short period of circuit work, but in 1943 by Government invitation he went to KENYA as Principal of Kagumo College for teacher-training. He spent twelve years there, living through the perils of the Mau Mau period.

His influence on African education made an unrivaled contribution to the development of Ghana and Kenya. With his wife he was invited by the Government of Ghana to the celebrations of independence, and he was again invited when autonomy was granted to Ghana Methodism. His last ministerial appointment was at Centenary Church, DUBLIN, and he died in retirement in his native Belfast.

LOCKWOOD, J. H. (1837-1916), American pioneer preacher in northwest KANSAS, serves as an example of the men who built Methodism in his time and area. Born in PHILADELPHIA, Pa., on March 10, 1837, he moved to ILLINOIS as a youth and attended MCKENDREE COLLEGE. He was licensed to preach in 1858 and, except for three years as CHAPLAIN of the 49th Illinois regiment, spent the first fourteen years of his ministry in the SOUTHERN ILLINOIS CONFERENCE.

In 1872 he came to Kansas, serving first in the KANSAS CONFERENCE and, after it was divided, in the NORTHWEST KANSAS CONFERENCE. His KANSAS years were spent largely at Salina and Beloit where he was presiding elder (for fifteen years) and pastor. He served as a presiding elder at the origin of the Northwest Kansas Conference and was its first delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE. There is a heavy listing in the conference journals of committees of which he was a member. In 1883 he was appointed to the Board of Trustees of BAKER UNIVERSITY at the same time that he became one of five ministers on a board of trustees to locate and charter what later became KANSAS WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY. In 1884 he was president of the conference board of church extension, as well as a member of the conference camp-meeting committee and of the conference boundaries committee. The conference was small and J. H. Lockwood had the pioneering spirit. For six years he served as district superintendent of the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY for Kansas, and for eight years was a member of the general missionary committee. He became supernumerary in 1904, and moved to California where he died on Feb. 6, 1916.

LODER, DWIGHT ELLSWORTH (1914-), American college president and bishop, was born in Waverly, Neb., on July 8, 1914, the son of William and Alice C. (Snyder) Loder. He graduated from the University of Nebraska with the A.B. degree in 1936. After a year of graduate work there in the College of Law, in which he obtained honors, he was diverted by a call to the ministry and transferred to BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, where he received the S.T.B. degree in 1939. He was awarded the D.D. degree from Hamline University, 1951, from Garrett Theological Seminary, 1955, and from Albion College, 1968. He received the L.H.D. from Willamette University, 1966, and the S.T.D. from Dickinson College, 1966. He married Mildred Ethyl Shay on Sept. 17, 1939, and to them were born Ruth (Mrs. James Burnecke), William and David.

Dwight E. Loder served as associate pastor of the First Congregational Church, Stoneham, Mass., 1937-39. He was ordained to the Methodist ministry in the CENTRAL NEW YORK CONFERENCE in 1939, and served two pastorates in PENNSYLVANIA—North Towanda, 1939-41; and Blossburg, 1941-47; and then joined the Hennepin Avenue (MINNEAPOLIS) Church staff in 1947. There he served as pastor from 1950 until 1955 when he was elected to the presidency of GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY where he served until 1964, becoming a member of the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE in 1957. He was elected to the episcopacy by the North Central Jurisdictional Conference in 1964, and put in charge of the MICHIGAN Area.

Bishop Loder was a delegate to the North American Faith and Order Study Conference of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in 1957, and participated in the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL Ministerial Exchange in 1959. His lectureships include: Eighth annual Ministers' Convocation of Southern California, 1956; Glide lecturer, Glide School of Evangelism, San Francisco, 1960; and Fondren lecturer, SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY, 1965. He attended the World Methodist Convocation on Theological Education, 1961; and was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCES of The Methodist Church, 1960 and 1964; and of the North Central Jurisdictional Conferences, 1960 and 1964. He was a member of the Methodist Commission on Ecumenical Consultation, of the Commission on Chaplaincy, the subcommittee on theological education, proposed E.U.B.-Methodist merger; a member of UNIVERSITY SENATE of The Methodist Church, 1963-65; and a member of the North Central Jurisdictional Commission on Higher Education. He has been president of the Association of Methodist Theological Schools, 1960, and of the Chicago Theological Faculties Union, 1961. He received a distinguished Alumni award from Boston University School of Theology in 1964. He has been a member of the Michigan Governor's Ethical and Moral Panel, since 1965; and a former member of the Board of Directors of Asbury Hospital, of HAMLINE UNIVERSITY, of the Minneapolis Young Men's Christian Association, and since 1964 has been a trustee of ALBION COLLEGE and of ADRIAN COLLEGE.

LOEPPERT, HENRY VERNE (1893-), American businessman and lay leader of the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE, was born in Sandwich, Ill., on Sept. 2, 1893, the son of Henry C. and Elizabeth J. (Dieterich) Loeppert. He was educated in Chicago, Ill. and Appleton, Wis., and did further work at the University of Chicago, NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, and in the graduate school at Harvard. On June 25, 1919, he married Ellen Sophia Waterman, and their children are H. Verne and Marilyn Elizabeth (Mrs. Bruce A. McLeod).

Mr. Loeppert entered business in 1922, and thereafter became prominent in various business interests and corporations in and about the CHICAGO area. For fifty years he was a member of the first German Methodist Church of Chicago and its successor, the Armitage Avenue Methodist Church. Since 1958, he has been a member of the First Methodist Church, EVANSTON, Ill. He was elected Rock River Conference Lay Leader, 1943-52.

His other church interests have been the Chicago Wesley Memorial Hospital, the Church Federation of Greater Chicago, the Board of Publications of The Methodist Church, of which he was a member for twelve years; director of the National Mutual Church Insurance Company of Chicago; and treasurer of the Executive Committee of the Board of Lay Activities of The Methodist Church, 1944-52. He has also been a trustee of the Methodist Ministers Pension Fund; KENDALL COLLEGE, EVANSTON; and president of the Conference Board of Missions, 1956-60. The United Churchmen of Chicago honored him as Layman of the Year on April 2, 1957, and a resolution in his honor was passed by the Board of Publication of The Methodist Church on Oct. 30, 1963. In 1961, he resigned from his business as president of the Boyd Wagner Company to accept, at the urging of Bishop BRASHARES, the Executive Directorship of the Methodist Old Peoples Home (Chicago, Ill.) of the Rock River Conference. He has been a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church in all of its sessions from 1940 to 1964, with the exception of the Conference of 1956, when he accepted status as a delegate to the JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE in deference to his wife who had been elected a delegate to the General Conference of that year, since she was president of the Conference WOMAN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE. He was elected a member of the General Conference Entertainment and Program Committee, 1964-68. He is presently engaged in promoting the Methodist Community of Services, an expansion of the Methodist Home on Foster Avenue, Chicago, and the planning of a new retirement complex on the South Side of Chicago in connection with property owned by St. Mark's Church. In 1966 he was nominated by the Methodist Old Peoples Home board and honored by the mayor of the City of Chicago for his contribution to Senior Citizens of Chicago.

LOFTHOUSE, WILLIAM FREDERICK (1871-1965), British minister, was born in South Norwood, LONDON, and educated at the City of London School and Trinity College, Oxford. He entered the Wesleyan Methodist ministry in 1896, training at Richmond College, London, where he also served as assistant tutor, 1896-98. He was appointed in 1899 assistant tutor at Handsworth College, BIRMINGHAM (see THEOLOGICAL COLLEGES); and there, apart from three years in circuit (1901-04), and three as a chaplain in the armed forces (1916-19), he spent the whole of his ministry until his retirement in 1940.

An Old Testament specialist, but widely read in other branches of theological study, he exercised a profound influence on his students. He lectured in the Old Testament from 1904 to 1916, and again from 1919 to 1925. From 1925 to 1940 he was principal of the college and tutor in systematic theology and philosophy of religion. He was elected president of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference in 1929, and in 1932 was chosen president of the Society for Old Testament Study.

His deep concern for social justice was seen in his work for the Methodist Union for Social Service. He was present at the COPEC conference on social Christianity in 1924, when he proposed the report on The Relation of the Sexes. On the same general subject he published Ethics and the Family (1912), Altar, Cross and Community (1921), Purity and Racial Health (1920), etc. His more strictly Old Testament writings included Jeremiah and the New Covenant (1926) and Israel after the Exile (1928). Keenly ecumenical, he played a part in the Faith and Order movement. His last published work was an essay on CHARLES WESLEY in A History of the Methodist Church in Great Britain (ed. Rupp and Davies, 1965). He died in Croydon on July 5, 1965.

JOHN NEWTON

LOGAN, JACOB TAYLOR (1854-1946), American minister and ordained elder of the Pittsburgh Conference of the FREE METHODIST CHURCH, was pastor and superintendent in Pennsylvania and Editor of The Free Methodist, 1907-1923; 1927-1931. He was an evangelistic pastor, an eloquent temperance lecturer, an attractive writer. He had tremendous vitality and carried on a heavy speaking schedule at the age of ninety. He died at Winona Lake, Ind.

BYRON S. LAMSON

LOMAS, JOHN (1798-1879), British minister, was born in Hull on Dec. 13, 1798, the son of Robert Lomas, a Wesleyan Methodist minister. He was educated at KINGSWOOD SCHOOL, of which he was headmaster from 1820 to 1823. In 1820 he was accepted for the ministry; and after leaving Kingswood he traveled in Bath, MANCHESTER, BRISTOL, HULL, and LONDON. In 1853 he was elected President of the Conference by an almost unanimous vote. He delivered the third FERNLEY LECTURE, Jesus Christ: The Propitiation for our Sins. From 1861 to 1867 he was the tutor in theology at Richmond College (see THEOLOGICAL COLLEGES), and held the same position at Headingley College from its opening in 1868 to 1872. He never married. As a preacher he was highly esteemed, especially by the more cultured of his hearers. He died on Aug. 20, 1879.

LONDON, England, the metropolis of Great Britain and the commanding city of the British Empire and now center of the British Commonwealth of Nations, has from the beginning been at the center of the Methodist movement. JOHN WESLEY was converted in London, established his headquarters there, and is buried there, as are his brother Charles and his mother Susanna. The organized work of The Methodist Church and Conference has always centered in London and most of its general offices are there now. Various historic shrines and places of Methodist work in the city are as follows:

Aldersgate Street runs north from St. Martins le Grand as far as Goswell Road. Number 28 on the east side is said to mark the probable site of the building where John Wesley felt his "heart strangely warmed" on May 24, 1738. The actual room may have been in the Hall House which was entered from Nettleton Court (now built up). It is doubtful if any part of the original building remains.

Bunhill Fields, City Road. The Dissenters Burial Ground opened in 1665. SUSANNA WESLEY was buried there on Aug. 1, 1742. Her son John preached the funeral sermon "to an immense multitude." Among others buried in Bunhill Fields are William Blake and his wife, John Bunyan, Daniel Defoe, and ISAAC WATTS. A memorial to Susanna Wesley erected in 1870 stands in Wesley's Chapel opposite.

Fetter Lane. Between Ludgate Circus and the Law Courts, Fetter Lane runs north from Fleet Street to Holborn. The first society met in the bookseller JAMES HUTTON's house at the sign of the Bible and Sun in Little Wild Street. About September, 1738, the meeting place was changed to a room in Fetter Lane where the society met until July 20, 1740.

THE FOUNDRY

The Foundry was situated near the northeast corner of Finsbury Square. A dilapidated iron foundry, Wesley leased it in 1739 and made it into the headquarters of the Methodist movement until 1778. Out of this "vast uncouth heap of ruins" he made a chapel which would accommodate fifteen hundred people, a smaller meeting room for about three hundred people, and a book room. Here were the first free dispensary in London (since the dissolution of the monasteries), a free school (with two masters and sixty children), an almshouse for widows. Here also were the private apartments of John Wesley's preachers, and here his mother died.

Kennington Common. GEORGE WHITEFIELD preached near the gallows on April 29, 1739, to a congregation estimated at thirty thousand. John and CHARLES WESLEY also preached there regularly in the open air in 1739 and 1740.

Little Britain is to the west of Aldersgate Street (near where it is joined by St. Martins le Grand). No. 12 is the site of the house of JOHN BRAY, the brazier. It was frequented by the Wesley brothers, and Charles Wesley was staying there at the time of his evangelical conversion.

Marylebone, Parish Church of. Wesley's parents were married in the old church on Nov. 12, 1688. The church was rebuilt in 1741 and demolished in 1949. Charles Wesley is buried in the graveyard near the site of the church in Marylebone High Street.

Moorfields. This was reclaimed low-lying marshland, laid out as a park in 1605 and later built upon. In the north of the district was the Foundery and nearby was Whitefield's first tabernacle, dating from 1741, giving the name to the present Tabernacle Street. Regular open-air services were held in Moorfields from 1739 to 1777. On March 2, 1777, John Wesley recorded: "There were thousands upon thousands; and all were still as night. Not only violence and rioting, but even scoffing at field-preachers is now over."

Snowfields. Here stood the third building John Wesley acquired for worship in London. He first preached there on Aug. 8, 1743. Thereafter services were regularly held for over twenty years. It was built by Madame Ginn, a lady of Unitarian leanings, in 1736.

Spitalfields. Originally this was "hospital-fields," the open space around St. Mary's Hospital on the north side of what is now Spital Square. Samuel Ammesley lived in a house in Spital Yard, and there his daughter Susanna was born on Jan. 20, 1669. This house still stands.

West Street Chapel dates from about 1680. It was built by French Protestant refugees, and first called La Tremblade. John Wesley obtained the lease of it in 1743. It appears on the London Plans of 1754 as "The Chapel" to distinguish it from the Foundery. The original building still stands and is at present used as a warehouse.

Wesley's Chapel (City Road). The Mother Church of World Methodism is in City Road, London, opposite Bunhill Fields. Built to replace the old Foundery, which stood on a nearby site, it was known as Mr. Wesley's Chapel, or the "New Chapel," or more often the City Road Chapel. The foundation stone was laid on April 21, 1777, and the chapel, built to Wesley's design, was opened by him on Nov. 1, 1778.

Architecturally it is, in Wesley's words, "perfectly neat but not fine." It stands foursquare, east-west. It held "far more people than the Foundery." Within, it is surrounded on three sides by a large gallery—the front of which is decorated with the repeated motif of Wesley's choice, the dove surrounded by a serpent. The gallery was for a hundred years supported by wooden pillars made from the masts of King George III's men-of-war. These pillars have been preserved in the vestibule. They have been replaced by pillars of French jasper, gifts of representative Methodist churches overseas. In 1800 the west end of the gallery was made oval in form. The original mahogany pulpit still stands in the central position. Behind it is the communion table and mahogany communion rail. The Adam ceiling—in gold and white—was, at the time, the largest centrally unsupported ceiling in any building in England.

The original windows have been replaced by a number of commemorative windows in stained glass, notably (in 1892) in the apse (above the reredos), "The Adoration of the Magi," presented by the WESLEYAN REFORM UNION; "The Apostolic Commission," presented by the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES; and "Solomon's Porch," presented by the PRIMITIVE METHODIST connection. In the gallery on the north side is "The Wesleys' Conversion" window. On the reredos, under the words "Holy Holy Holy," the Apostles' Creed and the two commandments of the Lord Jesus are inscribed on a gilt background.

WESLEY'S CHAPEL, CITY ROAD, LONDON, ENGLAND

The font belonged to JOHN FLETCHER's church at Madeley, Shropshire, and was placed in Wesley's Chapel in 1891. The chapel contains memorial tablets to many notable servants of the Church. The most famous are in the sanctuary, to John and Charles Wesley, John Fletcher, JOSEPH BENSON, THOMAS COKE, and ADAM CLARKE. In the vestibule is the bronze memorial to all the Methodists who gave their lives in the two world wars.

In the graveyard behind the chapel, John Wesley is buried. The funeral took place at 5 A.M. on March 9, 1791. The vault was subsequently opened for eight others; his sister, MARTHA HALL; his preachers, DUNCAN WRIGHT, Thomas Bradshaw, JOHN RICHARDSON, JOHN MURLIN, THOMAS OLIVERS, Walter Griffith; and his physician, Dr. JOHN WHITEHEAD. Also buried in this graveyard are PETER JACO, JABEZ BUNTING, Adam Clarke, and George Whitefield, and many other well-known early Methodist preachers. The burial register for the graveyard contains over five thousand names.

A small vestry adjoining the chapel has been set aside as a prayer room to commemorate the Foundry. Here is the pipe organ which belonged to Charles Wesley, also some forms from the original "Foundry"—the lectern from the band room, and the pewter communion plate which John Wesley used. In the forecourt of the chapel stands the statue (by Adams-Acton) of John Wesley, erected at the centenary of his death by the subscriptions of the children of Methodism. The portico in front of the chapel was erected in 1815.

Wesley's Chapel was severely damaged by fire on Dec. 6, 1879. The restoration was carried out in keeping with the original style of the building. Impressions were carefully taken of what remained of the ceiling, so that the present is a careful replica. The chapel stands in one of the most badly war-damaged areas of London. On the night of the greatest fire raid in 1940, buildings all round were gutted and the chapel was saved only by the wind changing. New buildings on the adjacent sites are now complete, and the surrounding district is being rebuilt.

Although the local membership is small, the chapel exercises a wide ministry. There are thousands of visitors annually from all parts of the world. Commemorative and memorial services are fittingly held here, and regular worship services are faithfully maintained. Recently, sound and television broadcasts have given a contemporary significance to this "Church of the World Parish."

Wesley's House, 47 City Road, stands on the south side of the forecourt of Wesley's Chapel. John Wesley took up residence there on Oct. 9, 1779, and it was his London home for the last twelve years of his life. He died in this house on March 2, 1791. The house was opened as a museum on November 10, 1898. It has been extensively repaired, the most recent restoration being the entire building of the west wall in 1963.

The house contains a large and valuable collection of John Wesley's personal possessions and other early Methodist mementos. In the study on the first floor are his writing desk, bookcase, and study chair (which had belonged to a cock-fighting bookmaker who was converted through Wesley's preaching). Also his long-case clock (made in 1693 by Claudius de Chesne), his traveling robe and three-cornered hat, his shoes and buckles. A recent addition is the large umbrella which he left behind at Guisborough. His conference chair also stands in this room. The portrait of Wesley painted by FRANK O. SALISBURY hangs in the study. The rear room on the first floor was Wesley's bedroom, which contains some of the original furniture. Leading out of it is the small prayer room where, it is said, he spent an hour between 4 A.M. and 5 A.M. each morning. There are his kneeling stool and his Greek New Testament. The second floor is largely set out as a museum of Wesleyana. Here can be seen many of his personal possessions. Notable among them are his traveling writing desk and the bronze lantern from his carriage; also the famous teapot given to him by JOSIAH WEDGWOOD. The most remarkable exhibit is his electrical machine, which he designed and found so effective in the treatment of "melancholia."

FEATURING CENTRAL HALL, LONDON

Westminster Central Hall, the administrative headquarters of British Methodism, housing, as well as a vast worship area, the offices of the Secretary of Conference, the HOME MISSION DEPARTMENT, the CHRISTIAN CITIZENSHIP DEPARTMENT, the Finance Board, the LOCAL PREACHERS Department and the Methodist Homes for the Aged. It was built on the site of the old Aquarium, directly opposite Westminster Abbey. The architect was A. B. Richards, and the building is said to have consumed over 10,000 tons of Portland stone, 5,000 tons of cement and over 1,000 tons of steel. The poet and architectural critic, John Betjeman, has described it as "by far the best example in London of Viennese baroque conceived by an Edwardian architect."

The idea of a Methodist equivalent of the Anglican Church House (also in the vicinity of Westminster Abbey), was the dream of Sir ROBERT PERKS towards the end of the nineteenth century, though it is true that he conceived it as the headquarters of Wesleyan Methodism, rather than of Methodism as a whole. He was able to convert his dream into bricks and mortar by means of a grant of £250,000 from the "Million Guineas Fund," a project launched by the Wesleyan Methodist Church to mark the advent of the twentieth century, and a scheme in which Robert Perks was deeply involved. The Subscribers' Roll is displayed in the vestibule of the Hall, and every name represents a "thank-offering of one guinea, neither more nor less." The Hall was officially opened on Oct. 3, 1912, in the presence of representatives of world Methodism and civic heads of many London and provincial boroughs. A service of dedication was conducted by MARSHALL HARTLEY, Simpson Johnson and John Hornabrook. After a civic luncheon, the President of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference, LUKE WISEMAN, led divine worship and preached. At a great evening meeting, presided over by Sir Robert Perks, the speakers were Bishop NUELSEN of American Methodism and WILLIAM L. WATKINSON, one of the most famous Wesleyan preachers of his day. As a place of worship, Westminster Central Hall has been the pastorate of a distinguished series of ministers: John E. Wakeley (1911-1914), Dinsdale T. Young (1914-1938), F. Luke Wiseman (1938-1939), W. EDWIN SANGSTER (1939-1955), Derrick Greeves (1955-1964), and Maurice Barnett from 1964. As a church, it has suffered from the social decay of central London and from the decline in popularity of preaching as such. After the Second World War, in 1946, the Central Hall was chosen to be the venue of the first meeting of the General Assembly of the United Nations organization. A plaque was fixed to the south wall in commemoration of this historic occasion; it was unveiled by the Prime Minister of the day, Clement Atlee, later Lord Atlee. The Hall continues to serve Methodism both as preaching center and administrative center: a new department is a Pastoral Care and Counselling unit, begun under the direction of the Rev. William Kyle.

LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW, THE (See MAGAZINES AND NEWSPAPERS, Br.).

LONG, ALBERT LIMERICK (1832-1901), was a distinguished American scholar and missionary representing Methodism in the territory of the Eastern Orthodox Church. He was born at Washington, Pa., on Dec. 4, 1832, the son of Warner Long of the Pittsburgh Conference. He graduated from ALLEGHENY COLLEGE in 1852, and that institution later conferred upon him the D.D. degree. In 1853 while principal of Green Academy, Carmichaels, Pa., he married Mary E. Rice of Meadville, Pa. His bride lived only a few weeks. In the shadows of his bereavement he heard and heeded the call to the Christian ministry and enrolled in the Theological Seminary at Concord, N. H. Upon graduating he was admitted to the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE in 1857, and at that session was appointed a missionary to BULGARIA. Before sailing he married Mrs. Persis S. Loveland of Concord, N. H., who became the mother of their three children.

Methodist work was just beginning in Bulgaria when Albert Long arrived in 1857. In 1863 he was appointed Superintendent of the entire Mission to the Orthodox people and moved to Constantinople. He translated the Bible into the Bulgarian language, during which work he returned to America for a couple of years. Returning to Constantinople he established and edited a family religious paper in Bulgarian, and translated hymns and books, including Pilgrim's Progress, into that language in his efforts to provide a Christian literature for the Bulgarian people.

In July, 1872, he was invited to take the professorship of Natural Science in Robert's College in Constantinople, and after the step was approved by The Missionary Society, he accepted. For nearly thirty years he taught and witnessed for his Lord in that influential institution in which he was loved and his scholarship was widely respected. Being in failing health, in 1901, he was granted a year's leave of absence by the College and started for America on July 8th. Reaching Liverpool, England on July 27th he was too weak to continue. Taken to the Royal Infirmary, he died on July 28, 1901 and was buried in St. James cemetery. Albert Long's name was on the rolls of The Pittsburgh Conference of the M. E. Church from 1857 to 1901 and his distinguished labors in a difficult mission field make him one of the most eminent contributions of that great Conference to world Methodism.

W. GUY SMELTZER

LONG, CHARLES ALEXANDER (1881-), American preacher and missionary to BRAZIL, was born near Alto, Texas on Aug. 22, 1881. He graduated in 1905 from the University of Oklahoma, joined the OKLAHOMA CONFERENCE in 1906, and was ordained deacon in 1908. After some years in Oklahoma, he graduated from VANDERBILT with a B.D. degree. While there, he married, on July 8, 1911, Lucy York, then a student at SCARRITT COLLEGE. They sailed for Brazil, arriving in RIO DE JANEIRO on August 6. He was ordained elder by the Brazil Annual Conference then in session and at once appointed pastor and superintendent of the Instituto Central do Povo, then located on Rua Acre.

During his years in Brazil, Long served as pastor, district superintendent, professor of theology, and dean (reitor) of the INSTITUTO GRANBERYENSE, Director of the Seamen's Mission in Rio, Secretary of the Board of Social Action of the Methodist Church of Brazil; representative of the Church on the COMMISSION OF COOPERATION in LATIN AMERICA, and as builder of churches and parsonages. In JUIZ DE FORA, he built one of the handsomest Protestant churches in Brazil.

He also pioneered in the far interior of the State of Goiás, where the church owned one small lot. Long left five houses of worship, four residences, and several lots. In all his work, his wife was a consecrated, efficient helper, especially in connection with the ANNA CONZAGA HOME, near Rio de Janeiro.

The Longs retired to the United States after forty years of service, in February 1952, settling in Ardmore, Okla. There they continued active service in church work. Mrs. Long died in March 1970.

EULA K. LONG

LONG, EULA LEE KENNEDY (1891-), was born of pioneer American Methodist missionaries, in Taubaté, State of São Paulo, on Sept. 25, 1891. She studied at mission schools in BRAZIL and at Mackenzie College, São Paulo, after which she graduated from RANDOLPH-MACON WOMAN'S COLLEGE in the U.S.A. Returning to Brazil, she met on shipboard FRANK M. LONG, a missionary and Y.M.C.A. secretary. They fell in love, were married on Oct. 13, 1914, and of this union, five children were born.

In Brazil, between 1913 and 1934, Mrs. Long served actively, becoming secretary and president of the Methodist Women's Societies in the Rio Grande do Sul Conference and one of the founders of the Methodist women's official magazine, the Voz Missionaria. She was a charter member and organizer of the Liga Pro-Abstinencia (Woman's Christian Temperance Union) in Porto Alegre, and taught a course in scientific temperance to a group of city teachers.

For helping her husband introduce Mothers' Day to Brazil in 1918, she received special honors (1954) from her native city, Taubaté, at which time the City Council named a street "Kennedy," honoring both her and her father, J. L. KENNEDY. Her most influential work was in the literary field—writing a Sunday column for a state newspaper, and writing also a number of influential books including her father's biography and Corações Felizes (Happy Hearts), which went into ten editions and was also translated into Spanish in Mexico. In recognition, Eula Long was named corresponding member of three academies of letters in Brazil.

Returning to the United States with her family in 1934, she lectured and taught courses on South America, and published articles in nationally known magazines. In 1945, she received a second national award in poetry from the Edwin Markham Memorial Association; in 1959 a citation from Randolph-Macon Woman's College for outstanding religious leadership; an honorary life membership in the Woman's Society of Christian Service; and was named VIRGINIA Mother of the Year. She is editor for Brazil and the Brazilian articles and personalities in this Encyclopedia of World Methodism. Mrs. Long lives in Roanoke, Va.

JAMES A. LONG

LONG, FRANK MILLARD (1883-1958), American layman, secretary of the International Committee of the Y.M.C.A. in BRAZIL, was born in Comiskey, Kan., on Nov. 18, 1883. He early moved to OKLAHOMA and graduated from the State University (B.A. 1908; M.A. 1909).

An opening for mission work came with a call to INSTITUTO GRANBERY in JUIZ DE FORA, Brazil, and by a mutual agreement between the Methodist Church and the International Y.M.C.A., he was sent to organize "Y" work and to teach Bible, English, and athletics. He sailed in July, 1913. On the ship, he met EULA LEE KENNEDY who was returning to Brazil after graduation from RANDOLPH-MACON WOMAN'S COLLEGE. They fell in love and were married on Oct. 13, 1914.

After two years at Granbery, Long was called to serve the Y.M.C.A. in Recife (Pernambuco) during an emergency; from then on he continued in this organization. He was in RIO DE JANEIRO one year, and then sixteen years in PORTO ALEGRE (Rio Grande). In this last, according to Dr. Kenneth Latourette, the success of the Y.M.C.A. work was "phenomenal," and Long's record "striking." Among other things he trained athletes for the continental Olympics, some of whom won first places, and for this he was named "Father of Athletics" in Rio Grande do Sul.

He served on the board of trustees of the College, now Instituto Porto Alegre; and initiated the first death-benefit plan for Methodist preachers in that state. In May 1918, with Mrs. Long's help, he introduced Mothers' Day to Brazil, possibly a first in all South America. The day was later officialized by government decree. In a posthumous celebration in 1961, the city council of Porto Alegre named a public square the "Praça Frank M. Long," and in 1968 held special commemorations and issued a stamp folio in his honor.

Recalled to the United States in 1934, because of the depression, Long served in the Memphis and Roanoke Y.M.C.A.'s until 1942; then in Y-USO's in Dublin and Hampton, Va. Upon retirement in 1952, Frank Long and his wife spent three years in Norman, Okla., where they enrolled in university classes. He died in Roanoke, Va., on May 31, 1958, of congestive heart failure. Survivors included his wife and four children—James, a geophysicist; Lewis, a psychologist; Eulalee Anderson; Edith Schisler, who married a second generation missionary to Brazil; and fourteen grandchildren. A son, Frank Millard, Jr., was killed in the Second World War.

J. EARL MORELAND

LONG, JOHN WILLIAM (1882-1956), American preacher and educator, was born in Sussex County, Del., Nov. 3, 1882. The son of Richard Wilson Long, public school teacher and Methodist preacher, he attended the public schools of Wicomico County, Del., graduating from the Delmar High School. He was graduated from Wesley Junior College, Dover, Del., in 1904, and DICKINSON COLLEGE in 1907.

Following a series of pastorates in the CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE, the last at St. Paul's Church, State College, Pa., he was elected president of Williamsport Dickinson Seminary, Williamsport, Pa., in 1921. Under his leadership the institution became a Junior College in 1929, and a four-year degree granting college, LYCOMING COLLEGE, in 1947.

Lycoming College is his living memorial. It reflects the devotion of his spirit and the dedication of his life. His service to education and to the church was recognized by a D.D. degree conferred by Dickinson College, and a LL.D. from WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE. Wesley Junior College made him the recipient of its Wesley Award in recognition of a half century of service.

He was married to Mildred Lee Lewis and they became the parents of four sons and four daughters. He retired in 1955 from the institution which he served as president for thirty-four years, and died within the year on May 5, 1956.

Journal, Central Pennsylvania Conference, 1956.

D. FREDERICK WERTZ

LONG, JOSEPH (1800-1869), American Evangelical preacher and bishop, was born Oct. 2, 1800 in Berks County, Pa. In 1818 he was converted in Ohio where his family had moved. He entered the ministry of the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION at the conference session held in New Berlin, Pa., in June 1822. On Jan. 10, 1826, he was married to Catherine Hoy, but his salary was very small, so he had to locate to earn a living for his family, his parents and the family of a helpless brother.

In 1841 he returned to the itinerancy. At the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1843, held in Greensburg, Ohio, he was elected bishop and served in this office until his death in Forreton, Ill., June 23, 1869.

Bishop Long was an outstanding preacher in his day. Many men declared they never heard his equal. He was witty and sometimes sarcastic. Bishop S. P. SRENG writes that "he was profound and overwhelmingly powerful . . . a son of thunder." Lacking the best of education himself, Long fostered educational institutions within the church, even applying part of his estate to the maintenance of Greensburg Seminary at Greensburg, Ohio.

He was a strict disciplinarian, understanding both the doctrine and the law of the Church. Yet he was progressive, quietly adapting himself to changing conditions and ideals. He was kind and helpful in his relations with young ministers of the church. In him the Church had a wise counsellor, far-seeing and prudent, and a staunch defender of the fundamental doctrines of the Evangelical Church.

ISAAC LONG BARN

LONG BARN, ISAAC, located near Neffsville in the Landis Valley of Lancaster County, Pa., is the site of the meeting between MARTIN BOEHM and PHILIP WILLIAM OTTERBEIN on Pentecost Sunday 1767, from which evolved the former CHURCH of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST.

As was the custom in those days, a crowd of German residents of central and eastern PENNSYLVANIA had gathered together for a "Great Meeting." The preacher for the occasion was Martin Boehm, a Mennonite minister from the southern part of Lancaster County. In his audience was a German Reformed pastor who had once served a congregation in Lancaster, but who was now located at York, Pa., Philip William Otterbein.

Otterbein was so moved by the fervor of the sermon he heard that he rushed forward and embraced the preacher with the greeting Wir sind Bruder, "We are brethren."

Although other meetings of a similar nature were conducted in this sturdy stone and wood barn and the woods adjacent to it, none has been as significant in the history of the E.U.B. Church as was this meeting in 1767. On June 16, 1960, the Pennsylvania Historical and Museum Commission erected one of its historical markers near the Isaac Long Barn in recognition of its importance in the religious history of the state.

Although it has been enlarged, the original building with its wooden pegs holding the timbers in place still stands. The land surrounding it was farmed in 1968 by the Jacob B. Landis family, direct descendant Mennonites from Isaac Long, who have been most cooperative with the historical agencies of the church and have always welcomed visitors to their premises.

On May 14, 1967, the 200th Anniversary of the meeting of Boehm and Otterbein at the Isaac Long Barn was commemorated with a service that had to be conducted due to inclement weather in the auditorium of the Manheim Township High School before an audience of 1,100.

BRUCE C. SOUDERS

LONG BEACH, CALIFORNIA, U.S.A., with a population of 346,975 (1970), is situated on the Pacific Ocean and noted for its port and naval activities, its oil and varied industries, its international beauty pageants and year-round mild climate. Long Beach is also an important center for Methodism. "The Methodist Resort Association" was formed in 1884, sponsoring tent meetings and tabernacle assemblies. Out of this came First Methodist Church of Long Beach, and later the Long Beach District Union to aid church extension. First Church was organized in 1884 before the city was incorporated or chartered. It was destined to be the "mother church" of Methodism locally, and the host for numerous Annual Conference sessions across the years.

From its founding Long Beach has looked to Methodist clergy and laity for significant leadership, the latter especially having been prominent in the economic, political, social, cultural, and educational life of a fast growing city. Early Methodist names in Long Beach in 1884 were Bishop CYRUS D. FOSS; Presiding Elder R. W. C. Farnsworth; and C. W. Elwood, first pastor. Prominent names of laity near the turn of the century were Charles J. Walker, E. Vance Hill, Fell Lightburn, Dr. D. W. Cuthbert, M. H. LaFetra, E. E. Buffum, R. J. Craig, S. A. Stone, E. M. Lyman, F. D. Bishop, S. Townsend, F. W. Stearns, J. W. Hand and C. F. Van de Water.

While there have been several mergers and relocations of local churches to better serve residential needs, Long Beach Methodism now has thirteen local churches with a combined membership of 9,884. The three largest churches are Los Altos, California Heights, and Grace. The Los Altos church was organized in 1954 and grew to 2,569 members by 1970. The former First M. E. Church, South is now known as Moore Memorial. The organizational chronology of Long Beach churches follows: First, 1884; Moore Memorial, 1901 (formerly First M. E. S. and Centenary M. E. S.); Grace, 1911 (formerly Alamitos Park, 1903); Atlantic, 1925 (merger of Central, 1905 and Trinity, 1913); East, 1922 (formerly Zaferia, 1913); Belmont Heights, 1914; North, 1930 (formerly Virginia City, 1923 and Spaulding, 1929); California Heights, 1930; Silverado, 1944; Los Altos, 1954; Latin American, 1956; Dominguez, 1959. Methodism is also represented in long Beach by a former E.U.B.; A.M.E.; C.M.E.; and Free Methodist churches.

The Long Beach District of the SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA-ARIZONA CONFERENCE has fifty-one local churches with 26,546 members (1970 Journal).

DONALD R. O'CONNOR

LONGACRE, JAMES BARTON (1794-1869), American layman, who became a world famous engraver, was born in Delaware County, Pa., on Aug. 11, 1794. He was apprenticed to an engraver in PHILADELPHIA and obtained early notice by an engraving he did of President Andrew Jackson. In 1831 he was employed in the illustration of the money which was then reproduced in certain American works being published. At first in conjunction with James Herring, of New York, and later independently, he planned and published the National Portrait Gallery of Distinguished Americans (1834-9). Among the engravings in this group were some sketches done by himself. The Portrait Gallery yet is of interest and he held in high esteem.

Descended from Swedish ancestors, he was early trained in religious life, and when young became a member of old ST. GEORGE'S CHURCH at Philadelphia, filling the offices of class-leader, steward, and trustee for many years. He left St. George's with others to form the Central Church, Philadelphia, and served it also in the same positions until his death. He was one of the first trustees of DICKINSON COLLEGE, one of the first managers of the Philadelphia Conference Tract Society and Publishing House, and for thirty years was a vice-president of the American Sunday-School Union.

In 1844, Longacre was appointed engraver to the United States mint, and from that time until his death designed all new coins. He was also called upon to remodel the coinage of CHILE—which he did.

He died in Philadelphia, Pa., on Jan. 1, 1869.

LONGACRE, LINDSAY BARTHOLOMEW (1870-1952), American educator and hymnist, was born on Jan. 26, 1870, in Pottsville, Pa. He was educated at Columbia University, at DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, and at the University of Jena in Germany, 1905-10. He received the Ph.D. degree from New York University in 1908. For a time he served in the NEW YORK CONFERENCE, but then went to the ILIFF SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY in 1910, where he was destined to spend most of his life. Considered an authority on liturgy and church music, he wrote the Riverdale Hymn Book, published by Revell in 1912, and was the composer of songs, hymns, and tunes. He served on the Commission on Ritual and Orders of Worship of The Methodist Church, 1940-44, which Commission created the first Book of Worship of The Methodist Church, and in this Longacre wrote the entire section of daily devotions. After his retirement from Iliff, Longacre returned to New York where for a time he served in a pastoral way as an assistant to RALPH W. SOCKMAN at Christ Church. He died on Sept. 18, 1952.

LONGSTREET, AUGUSTUS BALDWIN (1790-1870), American jurist, author, educator, and minister, was born at Augusta, Ga., Sept. 22, 1790. He graduated from Yale University in 1813 and followed the example of his friend, John C. Calhoun, by studying law at Litchfield, Conn. In 1815 he was admitted to the bar at Augusta, Ga., and located at Greensboro, Ga., where he married Eliza Parke and became judge of the circuit court. Judge Longstreet was elected to the GEORGIA legislature in 1821. He was a religious skeptic, but the death of his eldest child so affected him that after a long struggle, he joined the M. E. Church in 1827. He returned to Augusta and resumed his law practice. There he edited The States Rights Sentinel, which gave him a national reputation when HARPER AND BROTHERS published the sketches in book form in 1840.

In 1836 Longstreet became a member of the first board of trustees of WESLEYAN COLLEGE at MACON, Ga. In 1838 at the age of forty-eight he entered the Methodist ministry. Two years later he was elected president of Emory College at Oxford, Ga. One of the students, L. Q. C. LAMAR, married Longstreet's daughter. In 1841 Yale conferred upon him the LL.D. degree.

At the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1844, Longstreet delivered the Declaration of the Southern Delegates which stated that the vote against Bishop ANDREW had made it impossible for the General Conference to continue to legislate for the Methodist Church in the slaveholding states. He played a prominent role in the LOUISVILLE CONVENTION of 1845, where because of his legal experience, he was called upon to help draft the rules for the proceedings of the Convention. He was also elected to the first General Conference of the M. E. Church, South, in 1846.

During 1849 Longstreet was president of CENTENARY COLLEGE which was then operated by the Methodist Conferences of MISSISSIPPI and LOUISIANA. From 1849 to 1856 he was president of the University of Mississippi, but his political writings against the "Know-Nothing" movement aroused such controversy that he retired from public life. In 1857, however, he accepted his fourth college presidency at the University of South Carolina. In 1865 Longstreet settled again in Mississippi and wrote extensively to justify the lost cause of the South. His greatest companion in his old age was his (by then famous) son-in-law, Senator and Justice Lucius Quintus Cincinnatus Lamar. Longstreet died in Oxford, Miss., on July 9, 1870.

LONGVIEW, TEXAS, U.S.A., First Church is a three-million dollar church plant located in Longview's business district, with a graceful church tower joining with tall office buildings to make the city's skyline.

First Church had its beginning about 1840 in a log meeting house, which the congregation made available for use by other early Protestant denominations of the community. The evangelistic membership steadily grew, progressing from the log house to a one-room frame structure by 1860, a brick church in 1875, and a much larger brick building in 1900, with the addition of the church's first educational building in 1909. The cornerstone for the present-day church was laid in 1951 by Bishop A. FRANK SMITH.

Today's modern plant is of modified Romanesque architecture and situated on a landscaped square. The churchly sanctuary, seating 724, has stained glass windows designed to give a complete, connected story of the earthly ministry of our Lord Jesus Christ. Equipment includes a 3-manual, 32-rank pipe organ. A prayer room, near the main street entrance, is open at all times.

Complete facilities provide for the educational and social life of the church. The three-story Children and Youth Building is widely recognized throughout the Southwest as a model of efficiency and beauty. Functional, attractive adult classrooms, a well-stocked library, chapel and parlor, large banquet hall, fully equipped kitchen, modern staff offices, and an adjoining, hard-surfaced parking lot are features of this building.

A distinctive music program characterizes First Methodist. There are eight choirs with more than 200 members. The Chancel Choir sings each Sunday morning, and presents special programs with symphonic accompaniment during the year.

The School for Little Children is a highly successful week-day school for three- to five-year olds. Enrollment is presently limited to 150.

Present church membership exceeds 2,200, and church school attendance averages about 700. First Methodist is mission-minded, and gives approximately $10,000 in World Service and Conference benevolences from its annual budget of $190,000. Two worship services are held each Sunday morning and one on Sunday night. Wednesday night meetings frequently follow a general membership supper. The church staff is headed by its first minister, an associate minister, a director of Christian education, day school director, two choir directors, an organist, and five secretaries. First Methodist calls itself, "The Church at the Heart of the City with the City at Heart."

LON MORRIS COLLEGE, Jacksonville, Texas, was founded in 1873 at Kilgore, Texas, as Alexander Institute. Two years later it became the property of the EAST TEXAS CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South. It moved to its present location in 1894, became a junior college in 1912, and assumed its present name in 1924. The great growth and development occurred during the administration of Cecil E. Peeples, who has been president since 1935. The governing board consists of forty-one members elected by the TEXAS CONFERENCE.

LOOFBOUROW, LEONIDAS LATIMER (1877-1969), American minister and historian, started life at Atlantic, Iowa, Dec. 5, 1877, but was destined to roam widely in the service of Methodism. He was admitted on trial in the CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in 1903. His California pastorates included Eighth Avenue, Oakland (1906-11); First, Burlingame (1919-25); and Co-op Parish, Richmond (1949-59); but he also was stationed at First, Honolulu (1915-19); and Union, Balboa, in the Canal Zone, Panama (1937-41). From 1925 to 1931 he served as superintendent of the Redwood-Shasta District, and was a member of various boards and commissions of the M. E. Church.

Loofbourow was an outdoorsman in his youth and combined poetry with nature study while in the high Sierras, as did his contemporary and fellow Californian, John Muir. He won Phi Beta Kappa honors and a B.A. degree at Stanford, a B.D. degree at BOSTON UNIVERSITY, and an honorary D.D. at the UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC. His publications, mostly in church history, include In Search of God's Gold (1950) and Steeple Among the Sage, A Centennial Story of Nevada's Churches (1964). He also wrote a two volume account, Cross in the Sunset.

"He lived his history as he wrote it" stated the Together news edition for the San Francisco Area (UMC) as it announced his death on May 13, 1969. "In 1952 at age 75 he rode horseback nearly one hundred miles around the southern arm of San Francisco Bay . . . telling the deeds of this Conference and its people." He and Mrs. Loofbourow (Anna Hart Robertson) celebrated their golden wedding anniversary with 1,600 guests several years before her passing at age 93.

Loofbourow was a helpful contributor to this Encyclopedia covering much California history for it.

LOPES, JOSÉ LEONEL (1868-1920), Brazilian preacher, was born in Santa Barbara do Mato Dentro, state of Minas Gerais, on Sept. 18, 1868, the only child of staunch, traditionally Roman Catholic parents. As a youth in Ouro Preto, Minas Gerais, he heard for the first time the Gospel preached by JOÃO E. TAVARES. He began to inquire, then was convinced, converted and gave himself utterly to Christ.

He was one of the first students of GRANBERY COLLEGE, now Instituto. In 1897, he married Jovita de Araujo, and they had eight children.

Lopes served many churches in the state of Minas Gerais, SÃO PAULO, RIO DE JANEIRO, and Rio Grande do Sul. He was always a hard worker, courageous, and compelling evangelist. It was said that when the bishop needed a man for a difficult or remote station, the unanimous recommendation always was, "Get Leonel Lopes."

Stricken with diabetes, he was taken to the Hospital Samaritano in São Paulo. Relatives and friends wanted to secure a private room for his greater comfort, but Leonel refused, commenting, "In a ward, I can speak of Christ to many others." And this he did. Though both legs had to be amputated, Leonel never faltered in faith or courage. He died on Sept. 19, 1920.

LORD, JOHN WESLEY (1902-), American bishop, was born in Paterson, N. J., on Aug. 23, 1902, the son of John James and Catherine (Carmichael) Lord.

He graduated from the Montclair State Normal School, Montclair, N. J., in 1922. He was a teacher and principal in the NEW JERSEY schools from 1922 until 1924. He received the B.A. degree from DICKINSON COLLEGE in 1927, and the B.D. from DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in 1930. He matriculated for his Ph.D. at the University of Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1930 and 1931, and did graduate work at Rutgers University in the field of education. He received a D.D. from Dickinson College in 1943 and LL.D. in 1949; and S.T.D. from BOSTON UNIVERSITY in 1949.

On April 29, 1931, he was united in marriage to Margaret Farrington Ratcliffe. They have one daughter, Jean Phillips Lord (Mrs. Arnold C. Cooper).

He was admitted on trial and ordained DEACON at the NEWARK CONFERENCE in April, 1929; admitted to full connection and ELDER in 1931. From 1927 until 1930 he was an assistant pastor of the Emory Methodist Church in Jersey City, N. J.; then pastor of the Union Community Church in Union, N. J., while it was under construction with volunteer labor, 1931-34. Subsequently he held pastorates at the First Church in Arlington, N. J., 1935-38; and at the First Church in Westfield, N. J. 1938-48.

At the Northeastern JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE in session at Albany, N. Y., on June 18, 1948, he was elected bishop and was consecrated on June 20 in Trinity Church, Albany, N. Y. He was assigned to residence in the BOSTON Area and served as presiding bishop there until June 1960, when he was assigned to the Washington Area. This embraces the District of Columbia, DELAWARE, most of MARYLAND, and a small part of WEST VIRGINIA.

In 1950-56 he was president of the New England Deaconess Hospital; and in 1953-55 of the Massachusetts Council of Churches. He was a member of the Board of Lay Activities, Northeastern Jurisdiction.

Bishop Lord is a Trustee of CLAFLIN COLLEGE; NEW England Deaconess Hospital, Boston; AMERICAN UNIVERSITY; Sibley Memorial Hospital, Washington, D. C.; Wesley College, Dover, Del.; WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE; Dickinson College; Morgan Christian Center, MORGAN STATE COLLEGE, Baltimore. He is Chairman of the Board of Governors, WESLEY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY; President of The Methodist Corporation, Washington, D. C.; President of the General Board of PENSIONS, and Chairman of the Interreligious Committee on Race, Washington, D. C. He is a member of the Commission on Ecumenical Affairs and General Board of CHRISTIAN SOCIAL CONCERNS of The United Methodist Church; General Board of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES of Christ in the U.S.A.; National Council for a Responsible Firearms Policy; U.S. Interreligious Committee on Peace; Clergy and Laymen Concerned About Vietnam; and Honorary Chairman of The Committee of Responsibility (to save war-burned and war-injured Vietnamese children).

LORD'S SUPPER. (See COMMUNION, THE HOLY.)

LORE, DALLAS D. (1815-1875), American missionary and editor, born in New Jersey in 1815, who joined the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in 1837. In 1840 he was nominated as a missionary to Africa, but circumstances prevented his entering upon the work. He subsequently served as a pastor in Lancaster, Pa., but in 1847 he went as a missionary to BUENOS AIRES, where he remained seven years. During that time he successfully supported the work of the mission in Buenos Aires. Upon his return from Buenos Aires, he was sent upon a tour of observation in NEW MEXICO with a view to the establishment of a mission in that territory. His letters back to the Board of Missions from Sante Fe in 1855 were not encouraging, and while he was able to organize a class of nine persons at Socorro, and one of fourteen members at Peralto, and a circuit of four appointments, he did not feel that the work should be continued. After receiving his report, the Board decided to discontinue the mission.

Lore then was elected editor of the Northern Christian Advocate by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1864, and re-elected in '68 and '72. He was active in calling the New York Methodist State Convention which met at SYRACUSE in 1870, and which determined upon the establishment of SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY. Dallas Lore died near Auburn, N. Y., on June 20, 1875.

LORENZ, EDMUND SIMON (1854-1942), American United Brethren hymn writer, composer, and publisher of religious music, was born at North Lawrence, Ohio, in the home of a United Brethren minister, July 13, 1854. After graduating from high school in Toledo he taught German in the public schools of that city (1870-74). In 1874 Lorenz went to work for the United Brethren Printing Establishment in DAYTON, Ohio, where he edited Hymns for the Sanctuary (1874). For several years he alternated between his college education and serving churches, having joined the Miami Conference, United Brethren in Christ, in 1877.

On Oct. 1, 1878 he married Florence Kumler. He graduated from OTTERBEIN UNIVERSITY (1880) and Yale Divinity School (1883). Following study at Leipzig and Berlin, Germany, he served as pastor in Dayton until 1887, when he was called to be president of LEBANON VALLEY COLLEGE (1887-89).

Ill health forced him to leave the college, and he then turned to the work for which he became famous. In 1890, he founded the Lorenz Publishing Company in Dayton, Ohio, which became widely renowned for the publishing of church music. As editor and head of the company, he not only wrote hymns and composed music but served many denominations by providing music publications used by countless local churches and Sunday schools. In his later activities he functioned primarily as a lay businessman, but his contributions were always church oriented. His many publications of religious music included the editing of the Otterbein Hymnal (1890) and the Church Hymnal (1935) for the United Brethren in Christ. He died July 10, 1942, in Dayton, Ohio.

LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA, U.S.A., a city of 2,781,829, now ranks third city in the nation in population. The Pueblo de Nuestra Señora la Reina de los Angeles was founded in 1781 and given its name by the Spanish governor of CALIFORNIA. The Pueblo soon discarded most of its name and became known as the "City of the Angels" because of the beauty of its situation and excellent climate.

Los Angeles was incorporated in 1850. At that time its twenty-eight square miles held a population of 1,610. In 1853 Bishop EDWARD R. AMES, presiding at the CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE in SAN FRANCISCO, appointed Adam Bland a "missionary" to Los Angeles. Bland's first move was to lease El Dorado, a saloon located on Main Street, near the town's Plaza, and transform it into a chapel where he held services and where his wife conducted a school for girls.

The "City of Angels" was anything but that in those early days. The backwash of the gold rush brought unsavory characters to town and launched a period of general lawlessness. Conditions were made worse by the divided loyalties of the Civil War period. For a time, the representatives of all Protestant denominations abandoned their work in this area. Bland left Los Angeles and became the presiding elder of the Santa Clara District in northern California.

In 1866, after the Civil War was over, Adam Bland came back to reorganize the work he had left earlier. It was not until 1867 that Columbus Gillet was appointed pastor and thirty people attended a Quarterly Conference and Love Feast in Los Angeles. This was the beginning of an unbroken appointment of ministers to the Fort Street, later known as the First Methodist Church.

In 1868 the Fort Street Church was built. It was a brick building on the west side of what is now called Broadway, between Third and Fourth Streets. When it became too small for its growing congregation, a larger frame structure was erected next door. In 1876 the Fort Street Church established a school for young people and called it "The Los Angeles Academy." This was the forerunner of the University of Southern California. MARION M. BOVARD became pastor of the Fort Street Church in 1878, and two years later resigned to become the first president of the University of Southern California, which opened its doors in 1880 with fifty-three students enrolled.

The Southern Pacific ran its tracks into the city in 1876, joining Los Angeles to the rest of the continent. When the Santa Fe extended its tracks into the city in 1885, there resulted a rate war for patronage marked by a large influx of newcomers. Los Angeles, which had 1,610 people in 1850, had 8,453 in 1875. The population of Los Angeles County during that same period rose from 3,530 to 24,344. In September of 1876, with Bishop WILLIAM L. HARRIS presiding, the Southern California Conference (M.E.) was organized with thirteen buildings, nine parsonages, 1,257 members, twenty-seven ministers in full relationship, and three men on trial.

In 1891 the Fort Street Church paid $37,500 for lots at Sixth and Hill Streets. On Easter Sunday, 1900, the new First Church was dedicated. It cost more than $73,000. The report that year showed 984 members and forty-four probationers.

From 1902 until 1963 the ministers of First Church were drawn directly from different parts of the country. ROBERT C. MCINTYRE, widely known for his eloquence, having served distinguished pastorates in CHICAGO and DENVER, came in 1902. He was elected bishop in 1908. CHARLES EDWARD LOCKE, who served pastorates from OREGON to NEW YORK and had the distinction of conducting the funeral service for President WILLIAM MCKINLEY, came in 1908. During his pastorate, in 1913, the present location of 8th and Hope Streets was purchased. In 1920 he was elected bishop. That same year Elmer E. Helms came from Calvary Church, PHILADELPHIA. He was the leader in the building of the present $1,500,000 church edifice at 8th and Hope, which was dedicated free of debt on July 8, 1923. ROY L. SMITH, for twelve years pastor of Simpson Methodist Church, MINNEAPOLIS, served from 1932 to 1940 when he was appointed editor of the Christian Advocate. DONALD H. TIPPETT came from the Bexley Church, COLUMBUS, Ohio, and served from 1940 to 1948, when he was elected bishop. Richard Sneed came from the Court Street Church of Rockford, Ill., in 1948 and served until 1963, carrying on a modernization program designed to meet a changing environment and a changing constituency. JOHN A. ZIMMER (1963-64) and DON R. BOYD (1964-) were the first ministers in more than half a century who served other churches in the Conference before becoming pastors of First Church, Los Angeles.

Today both First and Trinity face problems arising from financial supporters who pass away or move to more desirable residential areas and take their church letters with them. In 1940 Trinity had 4,944 members and First Church, 4,934. In 1970 Trinity had 437 members and First Church 619. With every decrease in church membership there has been an increase, per member, in the cost of property maintenance. A plan for merger of these two churches, set forth by a Committee representing both, failed to be approved by Trinity. The hope and expectation is that both of these downtown churches, perhaps working together, will find avenues of service and financial support comparable to earlier days.

In 1887 the Fort Street Church organized a Chinese Mission which operated as a Sunday school. Six years later seventy-five Chinese were enrolled with an average attendance of forty-five. The Church licensed the first Chinese local preacher in the United States. Chan Kin Lung later became the pastor of the local Chinese Church.

In 1880 the Committee on Missions of the Fort Street Church rented a small building for eight dollars a month, and started a chapel for Spanish-speaking people. This was the forerunner of the Spanish American Institute, the Plaza Community Center, and the Frances DePauw Home and School for Mexican girls, the latter sponsored by the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

On March 31, 1904, the Los Angeles City Missionary Society was organized. Most of the Methodist churches in Los Angeles area have received help, at one time or another, from what is now called the Los Angeles Missionary and Church Extension Society.

One section of Los Angeles which formerly had been a choice residential area became the home of thousands of foreign-born people. Properties were run-down and rents were low. Immorality was widespread and juvenile delinquency was at a high level. Only one small church, the Newman Methodist Church, remained to minister to the people. It was here, in 1917, while serving as pastor of Newman Church, that G. BROMLEY OXNAM got the vision that resulted in the All Nations Foundation. In 1936 Oxnam was elected a bishop, the only bishop who spent his entire parish ministry in the Southern California Conference.

First A.M.E. Church in Los Angeles holds the distinction of being the first Negro church in the city. African Episcopal Methodists were in Los Angeles as early as 1870. In 1872 the church was organized with twelve members in the home of a Mrs. Biddie Mason. The first edifice was built on a lot costing $700 at Fourth and Grand Avenue. The earliest pastor of First A.M.E. was Jesse Hamilton. In 1887, under the leadership of Jordan Allen, the church removed to a second site on Agua Street where it remained for about a dozen years. The present structure was completed in 1903 on the corner of Eighth and Towne. Bishop Frederick D. Jordan, who was pastor of First A.M.E. from 1940 to 1949, was elected bishop in 1952.

Holman Church is the church with the highest rate of growth in the SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA-ARIZONA CONFERENCE over the past twenty years. The church was organized in 1945. Seven persons met in the first regular meeting. At the first Quarterly Conference, forty-three persons were listed as charter members. Membership in 1970 stood at 2,688.

In the early days of Holman, before a church home was purchased, services were held in a dance hall called Music Town; in a Seventh Day Adventist Church; and in a Japanese Methodist Church. A Jewish Synagogue was the first church home purchased, and Lanneau L. White was appointed minister in 1947. He is now the senior of a ministerial staff of three, and around him the growth of Holman has evolved. The ministerial staff is integrated. The predominantly Negro congregation has provided the example for all to see, as the two Negro and one Caucasian ministers guide the in-depth program of the church and provide leadership in the community.

White is in charge of preaching and church administration; Edward S. Williams is the associate minister whose emphasis is on membership and evangelism; Victor Hand was later appointed associate minister, and is officially the minister of education and community affairs.

In 1958 a new sanctuary was dedicated, for which Holman received an award for excellence from the Architectural Guild of America. Educational facilities are now under construction.

Holman Methodist Church is nationally known for its relevant preaching, beautiful music, inspiring worship, and its warm friendliness and outreach of service to others. It has many firsts to its credit, and is noted for its creative approach to the problems of the present day church and the inner city.

The Church leadership—both ministerial and lay—insures for Holman many years of effective Christian witness in the immediate community, in the Conference and over the nation.

Pacific Homes is a non-profit corporation of The United Methodist Church (U.S.A.), operating seven retirement homes in Southern CALIFORNIA, ARIZONA and HAWAII, also six convalescent hospitals. With a background of over fifty years of operation, it is the largest as well as one of the most experienced organizations in the retirement field. Admission is without discrimination as to race, color or creed.

The first of the Pacific Homes, Kingsley Manor, was built "in the country" between Los Angeles and Hollywood and opened in January 1912, on a site formerly used for Methodist CAMP MEETINGS. For many years it was known as "Pacific Home." Construction of the home was aided by a Mrs. Margaret Ammann's bequest to the GERMAN METHODIST CONFERENCE. Following the merging of the German Methodist and M. E. Churches a new corporation was formed which ultimately became the present Pacific Homes Corporation. Through the years additional homes have been built or acquired in Claremont, Pacific Beach, La Jolla, and Chula Vista in California; in Phoenix, Arizona, and in suburban Honolulu in Hawaii. These represent a variety of locations—the seashore, the desert, a small college town close to the mountains, an Island of the Pacific, and well known Hollywood.

Today these seven retirement facilities provide a total capacity of 2,200, or approximately twelve percent of the total accommodations included in the seven score and more Methodist Homes in the United States. The convalescent hospital facilities include 500 beds and several of the units also serve patients from the community at large. The Sparr Convalescent Hospital in Los Angeles serves mainly community patients.

The concept of full life care has gained wide acceptance and Pacific Homes plan of organization has served as the pattern for many homes throughout the nation. A unique feature is the fact that fees are never increased during the tenure of a resident in the home. Fifty years operating experience makes it possible for costs to be projected quite accurately. Retirement home funds are subject to constant scrutiny under California laws.

While prepaid life care is the general requirement, the financial arrangements are sufficiently flexible to meet the needs of those who can only partially prepay; and for those who have mainly monthly income from Social Security, or from pension, or annuities, full monthly payments are approved.

Pacific Homes is also concerned that members of The United Methodist Church in the SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA-ARIZONA CONFERENCE who do not have adequate funds to permit them to be residents of Pacific Homes, shall receive some assistance from the earnings of the Endowment Fund. Approximately 150 accommodations have been reserved for these Methodists with limited means.

Methodist ministers and laymen compose the Corporation, the Board of Directors, and the individual home Boards of Management. They give of their talents and many hours of their time to Pacific Homes. Dr. Edward P. O'Rear, General Manager since 1953, with a staff and more than 700 employees, is responsible for the management of Pacific Homes.

WESTWOOD CHURCH, LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA

Westwood Community Church is the Methodist church most nearly related to the University of California at Los Angeles with its 25,000 students. The church and the University have grown together. When in 1926 the University began to make plans to move to the Westwood hills, G. BROMLEY OXNAM, then the secretary of the Los Angeles Missionary and Church Extension Society, later a distinguished bishop of the church, arranged with Conference Church Extension support, to buy the present property on Wilshire Boulevard.

By 1928 the first unit was begun with funds raised by the First Methodist Church of Los Angeles under the leadership of Elmer Ellsworth Helms. The fifteen charter members were enrolled by certificate of transfer from First and other Methodist churches. By 1940 the educational wing, containing classrooms, parlor and a social hall, was added. In 1948 the administration unit was constructed. The beautiful Memorial Sanctuary, with its Glory Window, was completed by 1951. The parking area was increased so that the property now extends 535 feet along the boulevard.

With the burning of the mortgage, July 1961, the church became free of debt, with property valued at over two million dollars and an annual budget of more than a quarter of a million. Plans are on the drawing boards for a million dollar replacement and refurbishing program. The staff includes four ministers, four lay directors, and a total of thirty persons. Membership is reported in 1970 as 2,306.

F. HAROLD ESSERT

LOSEE, WILLIAM (1757-1832), Canadian preacher, was the first regular itinerant to be sent from the M. E. Church to CANADA in 1790. He was born June 30, 1757, in Dutchess County, N. Y. He was a Loyalist and served in an unofficial regiment known as the Westchester Loyalists. After his conversion he was received on trial by the NEW YORK CONFERENCE in May 1789. Immediately after the conference sessions he was sent to the Lake Champlain circuit—a most difficult appointment because the settlements were widely scattered and the people were indifferent to religion. He applied for permission from his presiding elder to minister to Methodists living on the north bank of the St. Lawrence River, and FREEBORN GARRETTSON permitted Losee to proceed with this missionary journey.

During the winter of 1790 he crossed the St. Lawrence River, probably at St. Regis, and proceeded westward toward Kingston, visiting and preaching at Matilda, Augusta, Elizabethtown, Kingston, and finally Adolphustown, where he remained for the rest of the winter, renewing acquaintances and holding services. As a result, petitions asking for an ordained itinerant were prepared and sent with Losee to the annual meeting of the New York Conference, held in New York in October. The conference agreed that he should form a circuit in Canada.

Returning to Upper Canada in the winter of 1791, he organized a circuit in the Kingston district. The first regular classes were established in February and March of that year at HAY BAY, and in Ernestown and Fredericksburgh respectively. Within a year plans were drawn for the erection of the first Methodist chapel in Upper Canada. This building still stands on land provided by Paul Huff, a member of Losee's original class. Hay Bay Church is one of the few shrines of Canadian Methodism.

At the New York Conference in 1792 Losee reported the reception of 165 members. The conference appointed him to the Oswegatchie circuit, east of Kingston, but in 1793 he was located because of ill health. Never again does his name appear in the Minutes of Conference. His creative, spirited, and fruitful ministry covered only four years.

Losee was tall, active, and excitable. Although he suffered from a withered arm, he was a fearless horseman, who covered great distances and yet seemed to have sufficient physical strength to preach with fire and power. He could be classified as the exhorting type—fluent, passionate, and prophetic in his bold denunciation of evil.

There are a few random references to his subsequent life. After his recovery from a mental breakdown, usually attributed to the marriage of his beloved to his colleague, DARIUS DUNHAM, he entered business in New York, frequently serving as a lay preacher. He returned at least once to visit his friends in Adolphustown, and S. Stewart tells of hearing William Losee preach at the New York Conference held in Troy in 1821.

Losee died on Oct. 16, 1832, and was buried in the cemetery of the M. E. Church, Hempstead, New York. On Jan. 30, 1834, his wife Mary died, at the age of eighty, and was buried beside him. In 1914 this cemetery was covered with soil, after the grave markers had been laid flat, in order to constitute a lawn for the church.

In 1969, as the result of the city of Hempstead taking a strip of land from the church yard in order to widen the street, it became necessary to remove the graves of some of those buried in this area. The graves of William and Mary Losee were among the five requiring removal. The Hempstead church gave the Losee grave stones to the Bay of Quinte Conference, The United Church of Canada, and they were removed to Old Hay Bay Church. There a cairn, in which the stones were embedded, was erected at the church which Losee built in 1792.

LOTHI, MEYI, son of Marashane's chief Induna in the Lulu Mountains of the Northern Transvaal, was converted in the Cape through the London Missionary Society. He returned in 1880, preached, taught, erected a church building and appealed to the Wesleyan METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY to take over his Society. The Chairman of the District visited the area in 1885, baptized forty-nine adults, forty-eight children and solemnized forty marriages. Lothi was blind in one eye.

LOTT, CLIFFORD BARNETT (1919-), American minister and son of Jesse Jackson and Savannah (Collins) Lott, was born in Groveton, Texas, Jan. 26, 1919. He obtained degrees from the following schools: B.S., North Texas State University, 1941; B.D., GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, 1944; and D.D., IOWA WESLEYAN COLLEGE, 1964. On Dec. 27, 1941, he was married to Betty Louise Corson, and they are the parents of three children.

Mr. Lott was ordained deacon by the SOUTH IOWA CONFERENCE in 1945 and elder in 1947. For four years he served an Iowa pastorate, then was director of the WESLEY FOUNDATION, Texas A. and I. for a year before becoming Instructor in Bible, SIMPSON COLLEGE, 1949-54. For the next ten years he was associate pastor, Grace Church, DES MOINES, Iowa. From 1964-66, he was DISTRICT SUPERINTENDENT, Burlington District. He became Administrative Assistant, Board of LAY ACTIVITIES, 1966, and with the formation of The United Methodist Church, he was elected Associate General Secretary, Division of Stewardship and Finance, General Board of Laity.

He has been trustee of Halcyon House, Hillcrest Children's Services, and Iowa Wesleyan College. He served as Dean of the Iowa Pastor's School and a number of conference responsibilities.

LOUISBURG COLLEGE, Louisburg, North Carolina, began in 1787 as Franklin Academy for men. Its first principal was Matthew Dickenson, graduate of Yale, who was the maternal uncle of Cyrus W. Field. Louisburg Female Academy was added in 1813, to be reorganized as Louisburg Female College in 1857. Operated as a Methodist institution since 1907, it became a junior college for women in 1915 and a coeducational junior college in 1931. The governing board consists of thirty-six members elected by the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE.

LOUISIANA, sometimes called the "Pelican State," is in the south central part of the United States. It is bounded on the north by ARKANSAS, on the east by MISSISSIPPI, on the south by the Gulf of Mexico, and on the west by TEXAS. It averages about 100 feet above sea level, and its climate is semi-tropical. Originally settled by the French, Louisiana was ceded to Spain in a secret treaty in 1762, but in 1800 it was returned to France, and Napoleon sold it to the United States as a part of the Louisiana Purchase. In 1804 Congress designated the area below the thirty-third parallel as Orleans Territory, and on April 30, 1812, the territory was admitted to the Union as Louisiana.

Industries in Louisiana include farming, minerals, petroleum, natural gas, salt, sand, gravel, and sulphur. In addition, the forests of the state produce some of the finest lumber, and there are extensive coastal fisheries. With an area of 48,523 square miles, the state has a population of 3,564,310 in 1970.

Eccentric evangelist LORENZO DOW may have been the first Methodist to preach in Louisiana. LEARNER BLACKMAN, presiding elder at NATCHEZ, 1805-07, was the first regular itinerant to visit Louisiana. In 1805 Elisha W. Bowman was appointed as "missionary to Louisiana" with instructions to begin at NEW ORLEANS. Unsuccessful in that city, he pushed on to other communities. In 1806 he established the first Methodist circuit in Louisiana, and organized a congregation at Opelousas. In 1808 JAMES AXLEY who endured persecution on the Catahouchee and Wichita Circuits, erected with his own hands the first Methodist church building in Louisiana. It was called Axley Chapel.

At first the Louisiana work was a part of the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE. In 1836 the part of the state west of the Mississippi River was included in the newly created ARKANSAS CONFERENCE. In 1840 all of Louisiana was again in the Mississippi Conference.

The LOUISIANA CONFERENCE (MES) was created by the 1846 GENERAL CONFERENCE. The first session of the conference was held at Opelousas in January 1847. The conference included the part of Louisiana west of the Mississippi River and the cities of New Orleans and BATON ROUGE on the east side. The remainder of Louisiana east of the river continued in the Mississippi Conference until 1894. Thereafter the Louisiana Conference covered the entire state.

In 1869 the M. E. Church formed a Louisiana Conference by dividing the Mississippi Mission Conference. This conference included both white and Negro ministers and churches. In 1893 the conference was divided along racial lines and the white work, along with that in east Texas, became the Gulf Mission. In 1897 it became the Gulf Mission Conference, and in 1904 the Gulf Conference. When it became a full conference it also included the white work of the M. E. Church in Mississippi. In 1926 the Gulf Conference was absorbed by the SOUTHERN CONFERENCE which until two years before had been the Southern German Conference covering Texas and Louisiana. The merger enlarged the boundaries of the Southern Conference to include the white work in Mississippi.

Methodist work among German immigrants in New Orleans began in the 1840's. In 1860 the Louisiana Conference (MES) had four German missions in that city and one in Franklin. The Germans chose to align their churches with the Louisiana Conference (ME) when it was organized in 1869. They were placed in the Southern German Conference (ME) when it was formed in 1874. Never strong in Louisiana, the German work consisted of only two churches in New Orleans when the Southern German Conference was absorbed in 1924.

At unification in 1939, the Louisiana part of the Southern Conference (ME) brought eighteen preachers, fourteen pastoral charges, and 3,278 members into The Methodist Church. The Louisiana Conference (ME) continued in the Central Jurisdiction of The Methodist Church and temporarily in the South Central Jurisdiction of The United Methodist Church.

The Methodist Protestants organized a Louisiana Conference in 1846 which merged in 1870 to form the Arkansas and Louisiana Conference. In 1884 the work was strong enough to justify setting off another Louisiana Conference which continued until unification in 1939 when it brought forty-eight preachers, thirty pastoral charges, and 3,529 members into The Methodist Church.

The three large Negro Methodist denominations—A.M.E., A.M.E. Zion, and C.M.E.—have relatively strong conferences in Louisiana. The C.M.E. Church reports about 40,000 members and the A.M.E. Church about 11,000 members in the state.

The Louisiana Conference (SCJ) supports CENTENARY COLLEGE at Shreveport, Glenwood Hospital at West Monroe, Methodist Hospital in New Orleans, and the Louisiana Methodist Children's Home at Rustin. The Louisiana Methodist is published for the conference in Little Rock in conjunction with the Arkansas Methodist. The conference maintains WESLEY FOUNDATIONS at eight state and private colleges and universities.

In 1970 the two Louisiana Conferences reported a total of 489 ministers, 137,521 members, and 603 churches valued at $75,797,535.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE (A) was created by the 1846 GENERAL CONFERENCE by dividing the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE. The new body was organized at Opelousas, Jan. 6-13, 1847. John Powell, the only presiding elder present, acted as president of the conference until the arrival of Bishop JOSHUA SOULE. The boundaries of the conference included NEW ORLEANS and BATON ROUGE and all of the state of Louisiana west of the Mississippi River. The east part of LOUISIANA continued in the Mississippi Conference until 1894.

When organized the Louisiana Conference had five districts, fifty effective elders, forty-three pastoral charges, and 8,101 members, 3,329 of them colored. (See LOUISIANA CONFERENCE (ME).)

ANA for early Methodist history in the state.) At its seventh session in Baton Rouge in 1853, the Louisiana Conference made history by adopting a resolution favoring lay representation in the conferences. It was one of the first steps made in that direction in Southern Methodism.

During its history the Louisiana Conference supported educational projects such as Mansfield Female College, Homer College, Pierce and Paine College, and other schools, some of which were stillborn or lived at most only a few years. The only permanent Methodist institution of higher learning established in Louisiana is CENTENARY COLLEGE at Shreveport. As early as 1825 an academy was started at Jackson, La. By 1845 it had failed, and the Mississippi Conference, of which Louisiana was then a part, bought the property. Meantime, in 1841 the Mississippi Conference had inaugurated Centenary College at Brandon Springs, Miss. Regarding Jackson, La., as a better location for a college, the conference proceeded to move Centenary into the academy property it had bought. During the Civil War Centenary College was closed and its buildings were used as a hospital for Confederate soldiers; later in the conflict it was occupied by Federal troops. The college reopened in 1865. In 1908 Centenary was moved to Shreveport where it continues as one of the strong Methodist colleges in America.

The New Orleans Christian Advocate was established in 1850 and continued publication until 1946. The paper was launched by a joint committee of the ALABAMA and Louisiana Conferences, and the Mississippi Conference soon joined in its support. In 1883 the Alabama Conference withdrew in order to establish its own paper. The first editor of the New Orleans paper was HOLLAND N. McTYRE, later bishop and able church historian. Four other editors of the publication also became bishops—JOHN C. KEENER, LINUS PARKER, CHARLES B. GALLOWAY, and J. LLOYD DECELL. In its day the New Orleans Christian Advocate was a strong and influential church paper. It failed in 1946 because Mississippi Methodism withdrew support in order to establish its own paper. Since 1949 the Louisiana Methodist, issued in Little Rock in conjunction with the Arkansas Methodist, has served Louisiana Methodism.

The Louisiana Conference operates the Louisiana Methodist Children's Home at Ruston; the Methodist Home Hospital in New Orleans, an institution for unmarried mothers and for the adoption of their children; St. Mark's Community Center in New Orleans; the Dulac Indian Mission at Houma; and the Sager-Brown Institute at Baldwin. The conference supports the Methodist Hospital in New Orleans and the Glenwood Hospital at West Monroe. Wesley Foundations are maintained at eight private and state colleges and universities in Louisiana.

At unification in 1939, the Louisiana Conference (MECS) brought 189 ministers, 171 pastoral charges, and 70,787 members into The Methodist Church. In 1970 the conference reported 398 ministers, 279 pastoral charges, 121,302 members, and 456 churches valued at $69,775,590.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE (B) traces its lineage to the Louisiana Conference (ME) which was organized Jan.

18, 1869 at Wesley Chapel, New Orleans, with Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON presiding. Composed of Negro and white ministers and churches at the outset, it was formed by dividing the Mississippi Mission Conference. (See LOUISIANA for early history of Methodism in the state.) At its organization in 1869 the conference had three districts which were increased to five by the end of the session, twenty-seven churches, forty-three charges, and 10,662 members. In 1893 the conference was divided along racial lines, the white work becoming a part of the Gulf Mission.

At unification in 1939, the Louisiana Conference became a part of the Central Jurisdiction. With the abolition of that Jurisdiction in 1968, the conference, pending merger, was placed in the South Central Jurisdiction of The United Methodist Church.

In 1968 the conference was sponsoring a newspaper, the Christian Explorer which centered on Christian education. The conference had an interest in Gulfside Assembly, Waveland, Miss. (badly hurt by the great hurricane of 1969), the People's Community Center in New Orleans, and the Lafon Protestant Home in the same city. It supported a deaconess at the Sager Brown Home in Baldwin.

In 1970 the Louisiana Conference (B) reported 91 ministers, 89 charges, 16,219 members, and 147 churches valued at $6,021,945.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE (MP) was organized in 1846. Its territory included LOUISIANA and TEXAS when it began. George W. Johnson who had moved to Louisiana from OHIO two years before, took the lead in organizing the conference; later he served as its president.

Because Methodist Protestantism in Louisiana and ARKANSAS was weakened by the Civil War and its aftermath, the work in south Arkansas was linked with Louisiana about 1870 to form the Arkansas and Louisiana Conference. It was divided in 1884 to form separate Arkansas and Louisiana Conferences, except that a small portion of northern Louisiana continued as a part of the Arkansas Conference until unification in 1939.

The Louisiana Conference (MP) brought forty-eight preachers, thirty pastoral charges, forty-four churches, and 3,529 members into The Methodist Church in 1939.

LOUISVILLE CONFERENCE (MES) was created by the 1846 GENERAL CONFERENCE. It was organized at Hopkinsville, Ky., Oct. 14, 1846 with Bishop JAMES O. ANDREW presiding. Its territory is western Kentucky, except the part west of the Tennessee River which is in the MEMPHIS CONFERENCE. The eastern boundary of the Louisville Conference is a line running south and east from LOUISVILLE to the Tennessee River. When it began the conference had fifty-six preachers, and 14,495 white and 2,225 colored members.

The Louisville Conference came to unification in 1939 with seven districts, 173 charges, 524 societies, 73,618 members, and churches and parsonages valued at $4,831,188. At that time it was merged with the Louisville District of the M. E. Church and three charges of the M. P.

Church to form the Louisville Conference of The Methodist Church, The M. E. Church brought 28 charges and 9,996 members to the merger.

During its history the Louisville Conference has contributed leaders to the larger church. Edward Stevenson was the first secretary of the Missionary Society (MES). DAVID MORTON organized the Board of Church Extension (MES) and served as its corresponding secretary for sixteen years. Four Book Editors of the Southern Church were members of the Louisville Conference: A. H. REDFORD, JOHN J. TIGERT, GROSS ALEXANDER, and FRANK M. THOMAS. While serving as secretary of the Board of Missions, H. C. MORRISON was elected bishop in 1898. ROY H. SHORT served as editor of The Upper Room and was elected bishop in 1948. Though not a member of the Louisville Conference, Bishop JOHN M. MOORE, the architect of Methodist union, was born at Morganton within the bounds of the conference.

The Louisville Conference supports jointly with the Kentucky Conference, KENTUCKY WESLEYAN COLLEGE at Owensboro, UNION COLLEGE at Barbourville, LINDSEY WILSON JUNIOR COLLEGE at Columbia, and the Methodist Home, Inc. (for children) at Versailles. The conference is related to the Methodist Hospital at Henderson and the Methodist Evangelical Hospital in Louisville. It has two retirement homes, Wesley Manor at Louisville and Lewis Memorial Home in Franklin.

In 1968 when the Tennessee-Kentucky Conference (CJ) was merged with the overlying conferences of the Southeastern Jurisdiction, the Louisville Conference received some of the ministers and churches from that conference.

The Louisville Conference in 1970 reported six districts, 290 pastoral charges, 321 ministers, 103,400 members, property valued at $45,178,925, and $4,283,547 raised for all purposes during the year.

LOUISVILLE CONVENTION, THE, was the meeting in 1845 in Louisville, Ky., of the delegations from the Southern Conferences, who there agreed to form the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. Their assembly was in response to the PLAN OF SEPARATION adopted the previous year by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, which had met in NEW YORK and provided for a division of the M. E. Church should the Southern Conferences so desire. The delegations of the various Southern Conferences met before they left New York just after adjournment of the General Conference and agreed to present to their own Annual Conferences the question as to whether or not they should have a conference, or convention, the next year in Louisville, to discuss and arrive at a final conclusion regarding their separation from the M. E. Church.

Pursuant to this, the several Annual Conferences including KENTUCKY, MISSOURI, HOLSTON, TENNESSEE, NORTH CAROLINA, MEMPHIS, ARKANSAS, VIRGINIA, MISSISSIPPI, TEXAS, ALABAMA, GEORGIA, and SOUTH CAROLINA agreed to meet in such a convention, and provided funds to support the expenses of their delegations in traveling to Louisville.

The annual conferences in the "slave holding states," as they frankly called themselves, proved to be one-minded regarding the holding of the convention in Louisville in May 1845, and the meeting there was clearly and completely representative of the conferences above mentioned. In addition to the conferences above named, the FLORIDA CONFERENCE sent two men, and the INDIAN MISSION CONFERENCE two. The leaders of Southern Methodism were almost all present in the meeting which convened on the first day of May 1845, in the old Fourth Street Church in the city of LOUISVILLE.

Bishop JAMES O. ANDREW was present and Bishop JOSUA SOULE likewise was there, but Bishop THOMAS A. MORRIS, who was also present, declined to preside over the convention itself, engaging only in what the Minutes called "religious exercises." The Convention adopted a resolution declaring that they, "acting under the provisional plan of separation adopted by the General Conference of 1844, do solemnly declare the jurisdiction hitherto exercised over said Annual Conferences, by the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, entirely dissolved; and that said Annual Conferences shall be, and they hereby are constituted, a separate ecclesiastical connexion, under the provisional plan of separation aforesaid, and based upon the Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church, comprehending the doctrines and the entire moral, ecclesiastical, and economical rules and regulations of said Discipline, except only, in so far as verbal alterations may be necessary to a distinct organization, and to be known by the style and title of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South." (History of American Methodism, Vol. 2, p. 118.)

The Louisville Convention was not, properly speaking, a General Conference, but a convention—which however, did make provision for a General Conference to be held the next year in Petersburg, Va. It also made provisions for mission work and publishing interests, looked toward the formal organization planned for the next year and adjourned on May 19, 1845.

LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, U.S.A. The first Methodist Society in Louisville was formed in 1806. It met first in a private home, then in a log schoolhouse. In 1809 a building was erected on Market Street between Seventh and Eighth Streets. FRANCIS ASBURY records in his Journal on Oct. 22, 1812, "I preached in Louisville, Kentucky, at eleven o'clock, in our neat brick church 30 x 48 ft. I had a sickly congregation. This is a growing town, a handsome place."

In 1816, a new church was built on Fourth Street near Jefferson. It was a large brick church with a wide gallery on each side. Louisville at that time was a part of the OHIO CONFERENCE and the conference session of that year was held in this church. Bishop MCKENDREE dedicated the building before the conference convened. The Louisville church became a station in 1818 and HENRY B. BASCOM, later bishop, became its pastor. One hundred and twenty white members and thirty-seven colored were reported. In 1835 two other congregations were formed from the membership of the Fourth Street Church on Brook Street and on Eighth Street.

After the division of American Methodism at the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1844, the Constitutional Convention which formed the M. E. Church, South, met in the Fourth Street Church. As the city expanded, churches were organized on Shelby Street and Twelfth Street, and in 1852, the Fourth Street Church was moved to Fifth and Walnut Streets, and the Eighth Street Church to Chestnut near Eighth. The M. E. Church organized Trinity Church at Third and Guthrie Streets in 1865; and the German Methodists, under the leadership of Jacob Shumaker, organized a congregation on Jackson Street in 1844. In 1907 the Walnut Street and the Chestnut Street churches united to form the Methodist Temple at Sixth and Broadway, and following unification the Methodist Temple and Trinity Church merged to form Trinity Temple on the site of the later institution.

The A.M.E., the A.M.E. Zion and the C.M.E. denominations have built a strong constituency among the Negro population and seven congregations of the former Central Jurisdiction of The Methodist Church are also to be counted here. These however have been merged into the LOUISVILLE CONFERENCE in connection with the dissolution of the Central Jurisdiction.

With the growth of the city, Methodism has attempted to serve the expanding population. It now has seventy congregations and approximately 35,000 members within the metropolitan area.

Through the years these churches have been served by some of the outstanding ministers of Methodism, and Louisville Methodism has given to the larger circles of the Church many strong leaders, both lay and clerical.

HARRY R. SHORT

Fourth Avenue Church. Methodism was the first of all organized religions in the city and the first Methodist Society, dating from 1806, and has enacted its fascinating history in six different homes, under five distinct names.

The first building in 1812 was a primitive sanctuary only 34 by 38 feet on Market Street, where Bishop Asbury once preached. Though he called the group a "sickly congregation," it grew rapidly; in 1816 a larger, better house was erected nearer the town center. Here for thirty-six years the Fourth Street Church was blessed with a gifted array of highly talented pastors, many of whom became widely known throughout the connection. Among them were three destined to be elected bishops: Henry B. Bascom, 1818-20; Thomas A. Morris, 1828-30; and HUBBARD H. KAVANAUGH, 1835-36.

Other early pastors of note: William Burke, later Cincinnati's first postmaster; Charles Holliday, Marcus Lindsey, William Adams, Edward Stevenson, Edmund W. Sehon, and John H. Linn.

In 1845 the church was host to delegates from all the southern conferences to the historic LOUISVILLE CONVENTION, gathered to plan the establishment of the M. E. Church, South, as a separate denomination.

After 1852 the congregation spent fifty-five notable years in a new home called the Walnut Street Church, again served by some of Methodism's finest preachers—men like Charles B. Parsons, Thomas Bottomley, H. C. Settle, SAMUEL A. STEEL, FRANK M. THOMAS, and the fourth pastor to become a bishop, HENRY C. MORRISON.

A great gathering of Methodist leaders from all over the land, north and south, came to the Church in 1876 for the first churchwide meeting held in connection with the CAPE MAY COMMISSION plans for the restoration of fraternal relations between the two major divisions of the original M. E. Church.

Unique and massive was the congregation's next home, occupied in 1907 at Sixth and Broadway. It was built by the Jews in 1857, but constructed in the traditional shape of a Christian cross! Taking back a branch which had left in 1835, First Church remodelled the old temple and took the legal name, Union M. E. Church, South, but was popularly called "The Methodist Temple." For thirty-three years "The Temple" continued faithful through increasing vicissitudes; yet in this period alone 2,126 new members were received. Outstanding evangelistic pastors were U. G. Foote, J. W. Weldon, and H. H. Jones.

In 1940 the congregation merged with the Trinity M. E. Church, organized in 1865 near the site where the First Church began. The merged congregations, now called Trinity Temple Church, moved into this forty-year-old edifice and enjoyed a great ministry.

In order to provide a stronger evangelistic program for the city and a surer financial base for itself, Trinity-Temple's 600-strong membership gave up its home, and in 1962 erected on a downtown corner an imposing structure of eighteen floors, providing apartments for elderly in addition to handsome church quarters on the first three floors, with a roof garden and "Chapel in the Sky" at the top.

ELBERT B. STONE

Parkview Church is the oldest continuous Methodist congregation in Louisville. One must go back to 1780 and the early days of the Falls of the Ohio River to discover that the area was crowded with flatboats of those who had drifted down to KENTUCKY from the settlements of Pennsylvania Dutch. A number of these people did not stop in Louisville but pushed on to the banks of Mill Creek and the wilderness trail to the Salt Licks. Among these families we would have found Christian and Jacob Shively, who purchased from the governor of VIRGINIA a thousand-acre tract of land at the junction of Mill Creek and Man's Lick Trail. Here they built a mill and did a thriving business with the settlers.

It is not known when Methodism was first brought into this section of Kentucky. About 1811, however, the Jefferson Circuit was established and in 1816 ANDREW MONROE was appointed preacher over the Jefferson Circuit. It was under his ministry that the Mill Creek Church was built. In the Jefferson County records one can find that Christian Shively gave one acre of ground on which the church was built. The deed is dated June 17, 1816, and is made out to Isaac Miller, Hugh Logan, Phillip Shively, Alexander Smoot, James W. Thomsberry and Matthew Love, who were trustees for the church to be erected and known by the name of Mill Creek Church.

JOHN LITTLEJOHN, a pioneer Methodist preacher in Louisville and vicinity, whose journal is preserved in the archives of the Louisville Conference Historical Society, records on Jan. 20, 1822: "I drove from Louisville in a sleigh to Shively's Stone Meeting House and preached to a large and inspiring crowd."

For a time the church was used by all denominations but about the time of the Civil War it was restored as a Methodist building and it has continued with a regular pastor and congregation until the present time.

A change in the residents of the community reduced the membership and attendance about the middle of the eighties, but a small and faithful few continued having regular services until a turn of the tide of residents brought new members and interest in the church.

In 1920 this church was the first appointment of Roy H. Short (later bishop), then in his teens. When he appeared for his first service, the Sunday school superintendent inquired if he might show him to the youth class. The reply was: "I'm your new minister."

The church was moved in 1945 to a location on Stowers Lane, and it was moved again in 1965, due to construction of a highway, to its present location at 2020 Garris Lane. The church which has been known as Parkview since 1945 is a thriving suburban church that is growing in the service of Christ, through its work in the community of Shively.

JOHN C. BRINSON

Quinn Chapel A.M.E. Church. In 1833 Bishop MORRIS BROWN transferred WILLIAM PAUL QUINN to the Ohio Annual Conference of the A.M.E. Church and assigned him to the Pittsburgh Circuit as a missionary. In the course of his travels he organized a congregation of African Methodists at Louisville about 1838. Between 1838 and 1844 another A.M.E. itinerant, George Johnson, "put up a little frame building on the lot they bought in the city." Quinn refers to this in the famous missionary report that he made to the General Conference of 1844:

Also the church erected in the city of Louisville, Kentucky is in a flourishing condition. I am fully persuaded (that) this mission, if faithfully conducted, will at no distant period, accomplish wonders for our people settled in these western states in their moral and religious elevation.

Including its founder, Quinn, for whom it was later named, this church has had as its pastors five men who eventually became bishops: William P. Quinn (1844), REVERDY C. RANSOM (1924), NOAH W. WILLIAMS (1932), FRANK M. REID (1940) and ERNEST L. HICKMAN (1956).

GRANT S. SHOCKLEY

St. Paul Church, Bardstown Road at Douglass Boulevard, began its life as an outpost Sunday school early in 1915. This was a missionary enterprise of the Highland Methodist Church, and Professor Henry A. Smith was assigned to lead this endeavor. He became its first Sunday school superintendent and held that office until his death, forty-three years later.

In 1921, the present church lot on the corner of Bardstown Road and Douglass Boulevard was bought. M. L. Dyer was then pastor of the church. The building was moved from Woodbourne Avenue and placed over a basement, on the present lot, in 1923. The name was changed from Woodbourne Avenue to St. Paul. This structure was used until the present sanctuary was built in 1931, during the pastorate of J. C. Rawlings.

In 1941, Roy H. Short (now bishop) came to be the pastor of St. Paul Church, from which pulpit he went to the editorship of The Upper Room in 1944. Howard W. Whitaker, of the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE, was appointed pastor of St. Paul in 1944. Under his ministry the church school plant, including the chapel, was erected in 1949.

In July, 1949, Bishop WILLIAM T. WATKINS appointed Ted Hightower as minister of St. Paul, effective September 1. He was installed as the executive minister on Sept. 3, 1949 and remained in the position until June 1, 1966.

St. Paul Church has had a steady and highly useful history. Following the consolidation of its own position and buildings in 1949, St. Paul launched its first missionary offensive. In 1950 funds were raised for the building of St. Paul in CAMAGUEY CUBA, on the campus of PINSON COLLEGE. In 1951, the Rev. and Mrs. Victor L. Rankin went to this church as missionary pastor and completed its building. The Rankins were supported by St. Paul.

From this beginning, several other churches were established in Cuba, parsonages were built, school buildings were erected, and our largest missionary endeavors were centered there until the Castro Revolution necessitated the withdrawal of our missionaries.

The Woman's Society supports Dr. Mildred Shepherd in INDIA. A medical jeep has been purchased for work in the PHILIPPINES. Both interest and money have gone to PAKISTAN, the CONGO, SCARTRIT COLLEGE, American Indian work, and many other causes, as well. "St. Paul In India," located at Bidar, has now been completed and paid for and is one of the largest Methodist churches in that section of India.

At home, St. Paul Church has been a sponsoring church, establishing four suburban churches, some of which are now, after twelve years, almost as large as the parent church. They are Christ Church, Buechel, St. Mark and Walker Memorial, all in Louisville.

In 1962, the church purchased property at 2006 Douglass Boulevard, adjoining the original church property. This is a three-story apartment building which has been renovated as "Fellowship House" and put into service for the young people and multiple uses of the church. The Deaf-Oral School meets in this building.

In 1963 a generous gift of $100,000 made possible the installation of stained glass windows in the sanctuary, and twenty-two outside windows of St. Paul church. This remarkable fenestration carries a continuous iconography of biblical and church history, beginning with the Creation at one end of the sanctuary and closing with the building of the Church Center for The United Nations in New York, at the other end. It also has the headstone for a large renovation program which is now being completed with the installation of a new pipe organ at a cost of more than $75,000. This organ is being dedicated in honor of Ted Hightower.

LOVE, EDGAR AMOS (1891-), American bishop, was born in Harrisonburg, Va., Sept. 10, 1891, the son of Julius C. and Susie Carr Love. His early educational training was received in the public schools of VIRGINIA and MARYLAND. In 1909 he was graduated from the Academy of MORGAN COLLEGE and in 1913 he received the B.A. degree, Cum Laude, from Howard University.

The B.D. degree was awarded him by Howard University School of Religion in 1916, and the S.T.B. from BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY in 1918. For two sessions he did graduate work at the University of Chicago. He was awarded the D.D. by Morgan College in 1935; by GAMMON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in 1946, and by Boston University in 1956.

His marriage to Virginia Louise Ross, of Staunton, Va., took place on June 16, 1923. They have one son, Jon Edgar Love.

Admitted on trial in the WASHINGTON CONFERENCE (ME) in 1916, he received full connection as elder in 1918. His pastorates include: Grace Church, Fairmount Heights, Md., 1916; John Wesley Church, Washington, Pa., 1921-25; Asbury Church, Annapolis, Md., 1925-28; Simpson Church, Wheeling, W. Va., 1928-31; and John Wesley Church, Baltimore, Md., 1931-33.

His pastoral work was interrupted in 1917 when he began his service as CHAPLAIN in the United States Army, with the 368th Infantry and the 809th Pioneer Infantry, serving a total of two years and three months, fourteen months of which was overseas. After his Army service he became a member of the American Legion and attended, as a delegate from the State of MARYLAND, the first American Legion Convention, MINNEAPOLIS, Minn. in 1919. Years after when he had become a bishop, he and Bishop WUNDERLICH of Germany discovered that they had been in the directly opposing armies of one of the late battles of the World War. The daily papers where the COUNCIL of BISHOPS was meeting photographed Bishops Wunderlich and Love standing together and featured this story.

From 1919-21 he was an instructor at Morgan College.

He became superintendent of the Washington District in 1933 and served in this capacity until 1940, when he became the Superintendent of Negro work, BOARD of MISSIONS and Church Extension, of The Methodist Church, New York City, a position in which he served until 1952, when he was elected bishop and assigned to the Baltimore Area, Central Jurisdiction, of The Methodist Church.

He served as Secretary of the College of Bishops and President respectively, Central Jurisdiction, and at various times served in other important capacities. After 1940 he was a member of the Board of Temperance and the Board of Missions of The Methodist Church. During his active service he held membership in the following: the Methodist Commission on Chaplains; the General Commission on Chaplains; the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST in the U.S.A.; the Y.M.C.A. (Baltimore, Md.); The International Frontiers Club of America—Baltimore Chapter; the National Association for Advancement of Colored People, Baltimore Branch; 33° Mason, Southern Jurisdiction; METHODIST FEDERATION FOR SOCIAL ACTION; the Southern Conference Educational Fund.

He has served as trustee of the following: Morgan College Corporation, Baltimore, Md.; BENNETT COLLEGE; and of Gulfside Assembly, Waveland, Miss. He was president of the Fraternal Council of Churches, Inc., and in October and November, 1954, visited Methodist work in MALAYA on invitation of the Malayan Board of Evangelism. By appointment of Governor Ritchie, he served at one time as a member of the Maryland Interracial Commission. He was appointed by Mayor McKeldin of Baltimore, to the Police Advisory Committee, and by Governor J. Millard Tawes of the Committee to Study the Penal Institutions of the State of Maryland.

One of the outstanding sermons of his career was delivered in 1959 in connection with the 175th Anniversary of Methodism. In it he made a stirring appeal to an audience of young ministers—all of whom were under thirty-five—not to conform to the status quo, but to have the courage to push forward to new horizons of their own. He reminded them that the founders of Methodism were, like themselves, young men. Following retirement at the Jurisdictional Conference of the Central Jurisdiction in 1964, he continues to reside in Baltimore.

MARY FRENCH CALDWELL

LOVE FEAST or AGAPE. The oldest known document on the orders of the church is the Didache and it is here that the primitive Christians spelled out the first regulations for the Agape. Several things seem to be established from examination of this document: (1) The Agape was not the Eucharist, or Communion, though it did prescribe prayers of thanksgiving before and after the celebration of The Lord's Supper; (2) It was conducted in the absence of a settled ministry by the laymen who belonged to the little bands of gathered Christians; it obviously was the Christian carryover of the Jewish customs observed by families when a blessing was said before the meal, and a thanksgiving following the meal.

The Eastern Orthodox Church and the Coptic Christians are credited by most scholars for continuing the practice of the Love Feast during the remaining centuries until the German pietists revived the custom in Europe in the late 1600's. JOHN WESLEY met the Agape for the first time in 1737 when he was in Savannah, Ga., and attended a Moravian Love Feast. (Wesley's Journal, Aug. 8, 1737). FRANK BAKER indicates in Methodism and the Love Feast that shortly after Wesley's heartwarming at ALDERGATE in 1738, the FETTER LANE Religious Society, to which he then belonged, listed among its rules the fixing of regular times for observance of the Love Feast. At this point the feasts began at 7 o'clock and ended at 10:00—but one record shows a Fetter Lane Love Feast starting at 9:00 p.m. and ending at 3:00 a.m.! Wesley records in his Journal for Dec. 31, 1738 that he, his brother CHARLES, WHITEFIELD, and others attended such a feast at Fetter Lane and that "about three in the morning . . . the power of God came mightily upon us."

As Methodism grew in America and established itself as a church in 1784, the Love Feast was an integral part of its pattern. The Love Feast and the Lord's Supper were immediately identified as the proper places to receive offerings for the poor. By 1789 the Discipline not only listed as a required duty for the preachers the regular watch night services, the prayer services, but also the Love Feast. To strengthen the evidence of the role of the Love Feast, the clear directions of Wesley contained in his A Plain Account of Christian Perfection were included in the Disciplines of 1792, 1794, 1796, and 1797. They also ruled, "Suffer no Love Feast to last above one hour and a half."

The Discipline of 1852 shows a liberalizing trend in the matter of who could attend the Love Feast. In Section III of that Discipline, question 5 reads, "How often shall we permit strangers to be present at our Love Feasts?" The answer, "Let them be admitted with utmost caution; and the same person on no account above twice or thrice, unless he become a member."

Patterned on the agape of New Testament and apostolic times, the Love Feast became an important devotion among Methodists in the days of John Wesley, and has been observed on occasions by Methodists ever since.

When possible, worshippers were to be seated in a circle or around a table. Bread was broken into small portions, or a common loaf passed from hand to hand. Traditionally a loving cup with two handles was provided for water. The usual order for a modern observance might run:

A Prelude
A Hymn of Praise
The Scripture, St. John 6:26-35
Voluntary Prayers and the Lord's Prayer
An Address
A Hymn of Christian Fellowship
The Passing of Bread with Blessing
The Passing of the Cup with Blessing
A Thanksgiving in union
An offering for the poor Testimonies
A Hymn of Thanksgiving
A Blessing
A Postlude

In both British and American Methodism there have been attempts to revive interest in observance of the Love Feast. American Methodists have included the form for observance in their official Book of Worship and many Annual Conferences set a time in their programs for a Conference Love Feast. The Discipline has continued all through the years to list as a duty of the pastor, "To hold or appoint prayer meetings, love feasts, and watch-night meetings, wherever advisable." (Discipline 1964, Par. 352.8) In honesty it must be reported that more often than not, Twentieth Century Methodists are probably unaware of the Love Feast, but there is a great value in this tradition that many churchmen seek to revive. (See also WORSHIP.)

LOVELY LANE CHAPEL, Baltimore, Maryland, U.S.A. The historic building in which the M. E. Church in America was organized in 1784, was the second Methodist Church built in BALTIMORE, but FRANCIS ASBURY loved it, and had a great hand in its building. It was built in 1774 with two of Asbury's converts, William Moore and Philip Rogers, playing a key part in erecting it. When Francis Asbury laid the foundation for the building he wrote in his Journal, "Who could have expected that two men, once among the chief of sinners, would ever have thus engaged in so great an undertaking for the cause of the blessed Jesus?" Further mention of the building is seen in Asbury's Journal earlier in the year. Asbury himself proved anxious to be sent to Baltimore that he might be pastor of Lovely Lane, where the people were eager that he might come and serve with them. THOMAS RANKIN, however, then Wesley's superintendent, insisted on sending him to PHILADELPHIA. Finally, however, late in February, 1775, Rankin agreed that Asbury might go and become pastor in Baltimore, and especially at Lovely Lane.

When the epochal meeting took place between COKE and Asbury late in 1784, and they decided to call a conference of the preachers to consider Wesley's instructing Coke that he come to America and ordain Asbury (and the furnishing of the American Methodists with a Sunday Service), it is not strange that Asbury wanted Lovely Lane in Baltimore to be the meeting place.

The chapel was down by the harbor (inner harbor now) of old Baltimore town, and was a small rectangular brick building. For many years, and even today, the site upon which Lovely Lane stood was occupied by the Merchants Club (206 East Redwood Street), upon which a bronze tablet reads, "Upon this site stood from 1774 to 1786, the Lovely Lane Meeting House, in which was organized December, 1784, the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States of America." In Lovely Lane, of course, Coke was taken as bishop, and Asbury consecrated as one, and the Church organized. The successor to Lovely Lane in Baltimore was the first Light Street Church at Light Street and Wine Alley, begun in August, 1785, and dedicated by Asbury on May 21, 1786.

Within recent years the First Methodist Church in Baltimore, as it was long known, standing at the corner of St. Paul Avenue and 22nd Street, decided to adopt the name "Lovely Lane," and henceforth will be known under that title. This Church today carries on a full-time, aggressive ministry, as befits a large and influential city church. In connection with the present Lovely Lane is the Methodist Museum, and offices of the Methodist Historical Society of Maryland.

LOVERN, JAMES CHESS (1909-), American minister, was born in Morgan County, Ga., Aug. 21, 1909. He received the B.A. and B.D. degrees from SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY, and the D.D. from SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY. Admitted on trial in the SOUTHWEST TEXAS CONFERENCE in 1935, he served pastorates in San Angelo, La Feria, Edinburg, and Harlingen before going to Laurel Heights Church, SAN ANTONIO, 1949-54. Transferring to the NORTHWEST TEXAS CONFERENCE, he served the 5,000-member First Church, LUBBOCK, 1954-64, and then succeeded Bishop W. McFERRIN STOWE at St. Luke's Church, OKLAHOMA CITY, Okla. He has been a member of the General Board of Missions since 1964, and has been elected to and served five times in the GENERAL and JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCES.

LOVETT, WILLIAM (1800-1877), British Methodist, was born in Newlyn, Cornwall. He was one of the leaders of the CHARTIST Movement in 1838, became secretary of the convention, which it was hoped might prepare the way for Parliamentary reform, and edited a newspaper Chartism, a New Organ of the People. He suffered imprisonment for criticizing police action against demonstrators, but he had no sympathy with O'Connor and Stephens, the "Physical Force Chartists." Lovett's moderate policy estranged him from other Chartists, and he was not involved in the fiasco of the monster petition of 1848. In 1846 he transferred his allegiance to the anti-slavery movement, retired from active politics, and spent his last years in teaching.

JOHN KENT

LOWE, THOMAS G. (1815-1869), American minister, was born between the towns of Halifax and Enfield, N. C., near the historic Hayward's Chapel Methodist Church, on Aug. 10, 1815. He received his early education in the "old field schools" of the day, and became a local preacher for the M. E. Church before he was twenty-one years old. Although he never entered the annual conference, he preached and had stated appointments in many areas of eastern NORTH CAROLINA and VIRGINIA. He was frequently called upon "to deliver funeral discourses and Masonic addresses, in both of which he very greatly excelled." His sermons always attracted large audiences. In a eulogy to Lowe presented in 1882, Theodore B. Kingsbury observed that Lowe's name "should be added to that roll of illustrious American preachers who were eminent for a rich, glowing, and inspiring eloquence." Lowe never wrote out his sermons, made an outline, or used notes, feeling that he lost all inspiration and fervor when he resorted to a pen. His sermons, which usually lasted thirty to forty minutes, were mentally organized while he was working or fishing and he would memorize the language he wished to use. His "finest oratory," however, was usually heard when there had been no previous preparation and he spoke extemporaneously. He spoke with a clear, musical voice and always used pure, correct English. He had "a splendid imagination but under the control of reason and taste and allied to wisdom and discretion. He was a very sound piece of American timber." He "spoke fine poetry, although presented in the garb of prose." Once, he spoke at the JOHN STREET CHURCH in New York City and afterward was invited to preach there for the then unheard of salary of $12,000 a year. He chose, however, not to leave his home and labors in North Carolina.

Lowe married Maria J. Wade of New Bern, N. C., in August, 1842, and to this union two daughters were born. He died on Feb. 13, 1869.

LOWE, TITUS (1877-1959), American bishop, was born in Bilston, England, Dec. 17, 1877, and came to the United States at the age of fourteen. The Lowe family settled near PITTSBURGH, Pa., and Titus, the youngest of six children, worked in a steel mill as a boy.

He was educated at OHIO WESLEYAN (A.B., 1900; A.M., 1908) and Western Theological Seminary (B.D., 1902), and received honorary degrees from Ohio Wesleyan, NEBRASKA WESLEYAN, and the College of Puget Sound. He married Anna B. Creed on Oct. 18, 1901; she died April 4, 1911, and he married Edith E. Egloff on Jan. 6, 1913. She died after Bishop Lowe retired, and in 1957 he married Ellen Louise Stoy.

Titus Lowe joined the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE in 1900. His pastorates were: Fourth Street, Braddock, Pa., 1900-03; Thoburn Church, CALCUTTA, India, 1903-08; South Fork, Pa., 1908-09; First Church, Cedar Falls, Iowa, 1909-13; First Church, OMAHA, Neb., 1913-21; Y.M.C.A. Lecturer in France, 1917-18; and Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions of the M. E. Church in 1921.

He was elected bishop in 1924, and was assigned to SINGAPORE, 1924-28; PORTLAND, Ore., 1928-39; and to INDIANA, 1939-48. In 1942, Bishop Lowe organized the School of the Prophets while serving the Indiana Area.

TITUS LOWE

It was a week-long annual refresher training program for the state's 1,000 Methodist pastors and was still conducted at DePauw University when Bishop Lowe died.

A big athletic man, Bishop Lowe was a college football player in his youth and later an avid golfer. His greatest relaxation was found in playing the piano, and it was his familiarity with church music that caused his church to put him on the Hymnal Commission of 1930-34.

A week after retirement, Bishop Lowe was appointed director of METHODIST OVERSEAS RELIEF, and he served in this capacity, 1948-52.

He died at Indianapolis, Ind., on Nov. 27, 1959. His funeral was conducted on November 30 by Bishops RICHARD C. RAJNES and J. RALPH MAGEE. The remains were cremated.

LOWELL, LEROY M. (1894-), an ordained elder of the Southern Michigan Conference of the FREE METHODIST CHURCH, was born at Cortland, N. Y. He received the A.B. degree (Magna Cum Laude) at GREENVILLE COLLEGE, 1923, and the A.M. degree from the Winona Lake School of Theology, 1933; SEATTLE PACIFIC COLLEGE conferred the Litt.D. in 1943. He was pastor of Free Methodist churches in CALIFORNIA, KANSAS and MICHIGAN. Dr. Lowell served as president of SPRING ARBOR (Michigan) Junior College, 1935-44 and 1955-57. He was the first speaker of the denomination's Light and Life Hour broadcast. He is author of Building the House Beautiful. He was editor of denominational youth papers, 1941-56. Dr. and Mrs. Lowell live near Lakeland, Fla. since retiring.

BYRON S. LANISON

LOWES, MATTHEW (1721-1795), British Methodist, was born in Whitfield, Northumberland. As a young man he was deeply influenced by CHARLES WESLEY's sermon, "Awake, thou that sleepest!" published in 1742, and a visit of CHRISTOPHER HOPPER to his home about 1748 led to his conversion. JOHN WESLEY confirmed the urging of his friends that he should become an itinerant preacher, but he remained a LOCAL PREACHER until he could discharge his father's debts. His first appointment was to the LEEDS circuit in 1751. The arduous work of the itinerancy proved too much for his indifferent health, and after intervals of serving as a "half-itinerant" in 1771, Wesley regretfully accepted his resignation because of his "asthmatic complaint." He remained in Newcastle as a supernumerary, whence he made occasional preaching expeditions as his health permitted.

On his preaching rounds Matthew Lowes had sometimes sold a family remedy, "Lowes' Balsam." This method of supplementing his meager income to support a large family was stopped when the 1768 conference strongly urged itinerant preachers not to engage in trade, an exhortation followed up in 1779 by a specific prohibition. After his retirement, however, the position was different, and in November 1771, John Wesley wrote to Lowes: "Certainly there is no objection to your making balsam while you are not considered as a travelling preacher." Lowes' Balsam apparently provided sustenance for Lowes and his family until his wife's death in 1793 and his own on Feb. 8, 1795. The recipe has continued to serve the farming community since, passing into the hands of a Methodist chemist in Alston, George Thompson, who sold the preparation as "Lowes' Veterinary Oil." At a change of ownership on Thompson's death in 1890, it became "Laws' Oil," and is still manufactured by a firm of Carlisle chemists.

LOWRY, HIRAM HARRISON (1843-1924), American missionary, church builder and educator, was born in Zanesville, Ohio, May 29, 1843. He served in the 97th Ohio Infantry, 1862-63. In 1867 he graduated from OHIO WESLEYAN, married Parthenia Nicholson, and went to Foo-chow, China. He was the first Methodist missionary to cross the Pacific in a steamship.

In 1869, the Wheelers and Lowrys were sent to Peking to open a mission there. In 1873, when Wheeler had to return to the United States because of ill health, Lowry became superintendent of the mission, a position in which he continued until 1893. When Peking University was opened in 1894, he was named its president and continued until 1918, when it was reorganized to become a union institution and renamed Yenching University. He died in Peking on Jan. 13, 1924.

He was an able, broad-minded, unselfish and diligent administrator, and the North China Annual Conference often recognized its debt to this pioneer missionary.

LOWSTUTER, WILLIAM JACKSON (1871-1958), American minister, teacher and New Testament scholar, was born in Brownsville, Pa., on Oct. 19, 1871. His family inheritance was German and English. His early religious life was in the Protestant Episcopal Church of his mother. But Methodism early appealed to him and he turned toward her strong educational stress. He received a M.A. degree for public school teaching from California Normal School, California, Pa., in 1890. He received his A.B. degree from ALLEGHENY COLLEGE in 1898, and was received into the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE and fully ordained in 1902.

He served Methodist Churches in Vanderbilt, Pa., and Braddock, Pa., and then decided on further education and entered BOSTON UNIVERSITY.

He was married to Lida Vance Moore on Sept. 15, 1903. One son, William Robert Lowstuter, and three grandsons survive.

He received the S.T.B. degree from Boston University in 1908, the Ph.D. in 1911, and the D.D. from Allegheny in 1915. Elected the Jacob Sleeper Fellow from Boston University, he spent two years of study in Berlin and Marburg, Germany.

From 1911 to 1918 he taught at the LILLY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, and from 1918 until his retirement in 1941 at the BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY.

He died at St. Petersburg, Fla., in 1958. After Mrs. Lowstuter's death he married a friend of many years, Mrs. Anna Taylor, who died in 1965.

Lowstuter's love of the parish ministry never left him, and there is a Memorial Room in his honor in the United Church of Norfolk, Mass., where he served many years. He had a superb ability in the classroom to unite the study of the New Testament text to the living church. He was an able lecturer, but most of all he was a teacher of ministers! No man ever had a higher respect for his calling. "My students are my books," he would say, and this was his standard for faculty efficiency at the professional level. Few men, if any, ever trained more men for the schools and churches of American Methodism.

WALTER C. MUELDER

LOYNE, SOPHIA D. (1845-1917), was the wife of an American clergyman, and a pioneer in founding institutions to help the needy. She was born in Yorkshire, England, a daughter of James and Hannah Drinkwater, and came to the United States during the period of the Civil War. She married William A. Loyne in October 1870, while he was a local preacher in St. John's Church, Dover, N. H. She had five children, four of whom survived her.

After her husband went into the traveling ministry and during her residence in Portsmouth, N. H., Mrs. Loyne became interested in the poor of the city, the needy sailors, and the aged people. She then helped found a home for the aged, the first institution of its kind in that state. Also through her prayers and influence came into existence the Manchester (N.H.) Children's Home and Dispensary and the Mercy Home for the Care of Girls. During residence in Colebrook, N. H., her heart bled for the neglected lumbermen of the North Country, and from her small beginnings the work grew rapidly until it was a nation-wide service of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. At the head of this movement, first as State Superintendent of the Department of Lumbermen and then as National Superintendent of the Department of Lumbermen and Miners, Mrs. Loyne held both offices throughout the rest of her life.

This work embraced over four million men and many thousands of families, and was one of the largest departments of Christian activity to be found anywhere in the world in those days. While living in Woodsville, N. H., she felt moved to aid the woodmen and the railroad men, and through that interest the Woodsville Cottage Hospital was born, designed to alleviate the sufferings not only of woodsmen and railroad men but of a multitude that continue to this day to need its services. The city of Laconia, N. H., owes to Mrs. Loyne, as much as to any one else, the founding of Laconia's Home for Old People. At Mrs. Loyne's death on July 14, 1917, more than ordinary loss was felt.

LO YUN-YEN (R. Y. Lo) (1890-), writer and public official, was born in Kiukiang, Kiangsi province, CHINA. He was educated in William Nast College (see article on CARL F. KUPFER), BALDWIN-WALLACE COLLEGE and SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY, where he was awarded a Ph.D. for his thesis, The Social Teaching of Confucius. On his return to China he became editor of The Chinese Christian Advocate and The Young People's Friend. He was also active in public affairs and was for many years a member of the Legislative Yuan. He was a delegate to the Jerusalem Conference of the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL in 1928 and to the Methodist GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1928 and 1940.

Besides several books on the opium problem, he was author of: The Chinese Revolution from the Inside (1930); What is Democracy? (1924); and Christianity and New China (1922). As far as is presently known, he is still living in Communist China, but nothing has been heard from him since about 1950.

LUBBOCK, TEXAS, U.S.A. (1970 population 146,379). Methodism was first organized in Lubbock on March 3, 1892, by R. M. Morris, with worship on one Sunday a month. The first church building, a frame structure, was completed in 1905 and cost $1,500. Services were then held twice a month.

A modern nine-story hospital was opened in August 1954, near Texas Technological College. It was valued at $3,581,197 and was acquired by the NORTHWEST TEXAS CONFERENCE about six months later and named Methodist Hospital. Recent improvements include a $200,000 coronary care unit which is one of the largest and most completely equipped units of its type in existence. A school of nursing and a nurse's dormitory are an important adjunct to the hospital.

There are presently twelve United Methodist churches in Lubbock, including Mount Vernon (Negro) and La Trinidad (Spanish). Also, there is Bethel, a church of the A.M.E. Church, and one of the C.M.E. Church.

Lubbock's twelve United Methodist churches are valued at $7,637,444 and reported 14,538 members in 1970. First Church, described below, is the largest and oldest with 5,960 members. A disastrous tornado struck Lubbock on May 11, 1970, destroying Wesley Church, a frame building whose congregation numbered 120, blowing away the roof of St. John's, and damaging the windows of First Church.

First Church, sometimes called "The Cathedral of the West," is of contemporary Gothic design based on the English Gothic style of architecture. The buildings, including the educational building, have a present valuation of approximately $2,700,000.

FIRST CHURCH, LUBBOCK, TEXAS

The church was first organized on March 3, 1892, with services in the courthouse, and twelve charter members. At last reporting in 1970 the membership was 5,960 and the church school enrollment exceeded 3,000. The church claims the second largest church school average attendance in Methodism.

In 1900 a church and parsonage were built by volunteer labor. The church was destroyed by fire in February, 1917. The church built at Broadway and Avenue M (location of present building) was dedicated on Oct. 17, 1920. The present building was opened on March 6, 1955.

The impressive stained glass in the windows in the sanctuary was imported from England. The magnificent Rose Window is twenty-six and one-half feet in diameter, one of the four largest rose windows in the world. It depicts in part "The Creation." The windows at the lower level are of famous Methodist leaders of the early days, and leading Biblical characters. The window at the rear of the sanctuary adumbrates "Worship," with appropriate symbols. The art glass windows in the chapel were brought over from the old sanctuary. Of symbolic interest in the church is a wood sculpturing of "The Last Supper" (made of solid quartered white Appalachian oak)—an exact replica of Leonardo da Vinci's painting and set in the altar at the head of the chancel. There have been twenty-three pastors since the organization of the church.

The Avalanche Journal, Lubbock, Texas: March 6, 1955.

St. Luke's Church is said to be the fastest growing church in the Northwest Texas Conference. The church began on Aug. 7, 1955, with the Village Theatre as a meeting place. Only fifty-four people were present for the first worship service and charter membership was closed in November 1955, with 187 members. Leo K. Gee, just graduated from PERKINS SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, was the new pastor of this new church. The community was growing rapidly and the church was able to keep step with it. In 1970 St. Luke's reported 2,250 members and it continues its growth.

The completion of the first unit of building was on April 3, 1957. Since then there have been three additional building programs. St. Luke's rates among the highest of the churches paying into World Service. One of the most important aspects of the church is the Ministry to Children and Youth. The Church School is large and well staffed by dedicated laymen. There are presently a senior pastor and three associate ministers serving St. Luke's.

LUCCOCK, HALFORD EDWARD (1885-1960), American minister, author, and educator, was born in Pittsburgh, Pa., March 11, 1885, the son of NAPHTALI and Etta Anderson Luccock. Luccock's high school years in St. Louis Mo., included the one athletic feat of his life, a mile run in which he defeated T. S. Eliot—who later became the renowned poet.

On June 17, 1914, Luccock married Mary Louise Whitehead. They had two children, and their son Robert became professor of preaching at BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY. Luccock entered the old NEW YORK EAST CONFERENCE on trial in 1908, was ordained a DEACON in 1909, and was ordained an ELDER and taken into full connection in 1910. He served pastorates in New York and CONNECTICUT until 1913 when he became an instructor at Hartford School of Missions. From 1916 to 1918 he was registrar and instructor at DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY. He was editorial secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions from 1918 to 1924, and contributing editor of The Christian Advocate (New York) from 1924 to 1928.

In 1928 Luccock became professor of preaching at Yale Divinity School where he did his major work of teaching, preaching, and writing, and befriending generations of students until his retirement in 1953. He completed twenty-six books and a mountain of journalistic writing. His son estimated that his father spent the equivalent of eight years in the itinerant travels of preaching from coast to coast.

Luccock became famous for his dry humor. Until his death he contributed a column to The Christian Century called "Simeon Stylites."

It was said that Luccock broke every rule of preaching, but he had his own style and thrilled and inspired countless numbers of people. He was considered one of the great authorities on preaching. He was a warm human being, and wherever he traveled made an effort to contact his former pupils. He maintained an interest in the affairs of the New York East Conference, and in 1926 he collaborated with Paul Hutchinson in writing a popular history of American Methodism. In 1953 he delivered the famous Beecher Lectures at Yale.

Luccock received honorary degrees from SYRACUSE, WESLEYAN, Vermont, Yale and NORTHWESTERN universities, and a Litt.D. from ALLEGHENY COLLEGE. He died in his sleep of terminal cancer at Hamden, Conn., Nov. 5, 1960.

LUCCOCK, NAPHTALI (1853-1916), American bishop, was born at Kimbolton, Ohio, Sept. 28, 1853. He graduated from OHIO WESLEYAN (A.B., 1874; A.M., 1877) and the University of Pittsburgh (Ph.D., 1886). He was a life-long student, with a keen and discriminating appreciation of the best in literature, history and science.

Entering the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE in 1874, he gave several years to the pastorate and then became professor of Greek at ALLEGHENY COLLEGE, 1885-88. He was then pastor of First Church, Erie, Pa., 1888-93; Smithfield Street, PITTSBURGH, 1893-97; Union Church, St. Louis, Mo., 1897-1909; Hyde Park Church, KANSAS CITY, a new church which he organized, 1909-12. In 1910 he was fraternal delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South.

Elected bishop in 1912, Luccock was assigned to HELENA, Mont. With cheerful diligence and unswerving devotion, he took up the task but his health soon failed. Exposure because of a delayed train brought on pneumonia, the occasion of final collapse, and he died in LaCrosse, Wis., April 1, 1916, and was buried in Bellefontaine, St. Louis, Mo.

He had married Etta Anderson on Sept. 27, 1876. She and a son died before the bishop did. Two daughters and one son survived their father. The son, HALFORD E. LUCOCK, became a gifted preacher, a distinguished writer, and a noted professor of preaching at Yale for more than a quarter of a century.

Among the books written by Naphthali Luccock were, Christian Citizenship, Living Words from the Pulpit, and Sermons, Royalty of Jesus.

Bishop F. J. McCONNELL said, "Bishop Luccock, in his own way made a most helpful contribution to the inner workings of the Board of Bishops during the brief time that he lived after his election . . . He had the power to use an intellectual surgical needle, with humor for an anesthetic, so that the puncturing was all over before the patient knew what had happened."

LUCKNOW, India, has long been regarded as the capital city of that part of Indian Methodism which was founded by American Methodist missionary enterprise.

Lucknow had earlier been the capital of the Muslim kingdom of Oudh, and chief rival to Delhi as the center of Indian Islamic culture. The Urdu language, derived largely from Arabic and Persian, still spoken by Muslims in this part of India, was the official court language of the Moghala.

Two hundred miles southeast of Lucknow is the Hindu holy city of Varanasi (Benares), so that the area was both a Muslim and a Hindu stronghold. Those who founded a Methodist mission center in Lucknow in the mid-nineteenth century thus faced formidable opposition. Yet in planning the mission to India, the BOARD OF MISSIONS and WILLIAM BUTLER considered Lucknow the most strategic center.

The Butlers arrived in Lucknow on Nov. 29, 1856, a time of immense importance for both the political and the religious history of India. In that year, Oudh came under British rule. Many of the complex causes of the Indian Mutiny (now sometimes called the "first war of independence"), which broke out in May 1857, were already in fermentation both in Lucknow itself, and throughout North India. Lord Dalhousie's social reforms, which included the abolition of "suttee" or the suicide of widows, were exciting suspicion that the aim of British rule was to subvert Indian faiths and traditional religious customs.

Within a few months of the Butlers' arrival, North India was aflame, and Lucknow itself besieged. But before that the Butlers had been cordially received, and entertained in the Residency for a week. However, they were advised against establishing a mission in Lucknow at that time, and found themselves unable to buy or rent property there. They therefore established their first center at BAREILLY. Soon after the Mutiny, the Commissioner wrote to Butler advising the immediate opening in Lucknow of the proposed mission. Property was quickly found and purchased. The Commissioner and his friends contributed two thousand rupees for repairs and supervised the work. Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Pierce were the first missionaries to be appointed to Lucknow. Pierce and JOEL JANVIER began immediately an active program, including bazaar preaching, three primary schools, an English weekly service for British soldiers, and class meetings in English and Urdu. The following June Hossin Beg, his wife and their daughters were baptized as the first Methodist converts from a non-Christian religion in Lucknow.

Since 1936, Lucknow has been the official residence of a Methodist bishop.

British Methodist work in Lucknow began in 1864 when Daniel Pearson, a Wesleyan minister, visited the city. He was told that the American missionaries were prepared to hand over a congregation of two hundred Europeans, in order to concentrate on work among Indians. Joseph Broadbent was stationed in Lucknow from 1866 to 1873, for military and English work. In 1879, the Lucknow and Benares (later Varanasi and Lucknow) district was set up, with a total of only sixty-one full members, divided between congregations in Lucknow and Faizabad. By 1968 the district had thirty-two places of worship, 1,966 full members and a community of 4,819. It had three secondary schools with 2,398 students, and one teachers' training college with fifty-six students. (See also LUCKNOW ANNUAL CONFERENCE.)

Nur-Manzil Psychiatric Institute, located at Lal Bagh, Lucknow, was founded in 1955 by E. STANLEY JONES, a missionary of the Board of Missions of the Methodist Church. Jones began his missionary career in 1907 at Lucknow. His experience as an evangelist and counselor, combined with his Bible study, led him to regard psychiatry as a field of knowledge that could contribute substantially to the welfare of people. He was troubled by the signs of hostility between certain psychiatrists and churchmen, and sought to bring into a practical synthesis or working partnership the insights and therapies of psychiatry and Christian discipleship. Patients now treated come from a wide range of creedal and racial communities in India and other countries of Asia. The superintendent is now James Stringham.

LUCKNOW CHRISTIAN COLLEGE. In 1866, the centennial year of American Methodism, two members of the India Conference discussed until late at night the opening of a college by the conference as a worthy recognition of this special anniversary. The suggestion was approved, and by 1868 an endowment fund of 10,000 rupees had been received. The school was opened on Feb. 1, 1877, with HENRY MANSELL as principal, in a small house on the mission compound.

The following year, B. H. BADLEY became principal. Fifteen of the nineteen years of his service in India were given in Lucknow, largely in developing the Christian College. He saw the school become the Centennial High School in 1882, and then raised to college grade when affiliated, on July 2, 1888, with the Calcutta University under the name of the Lucknow Christian College. In response to appeals to the government, Badley secured a desirable triangular plot of land just across from the high school building, on which the new building was erected. The foundation stone was laid by Bishop JAMES M. THORBURN on Aug. 6, 1891, and it was formally opened on Oct. 31, 1892. Badley did not live to see the fulfillment of his dreams.

More than literary education was provided, for as early as 1892, the business department was opened and for two generations trained men in various commercial subjects. Then it had to be closed for financial reasons. In 1920-22, the complete reorganization of the institution was effected, involving the separation of the college, high school, and school of commerce. The organization of the Lucknow University by the government in 1920 reserved to that institution the right to confer the B.A. and B.Sc. degrees; leaving other institutions the "Intermediate College" level of only two years beyond high school. In 1946, degree classes were restored.

The College of Arts, Science, and Commerce is the largest and main unit of the institution. The most important service the college renders as a four-year institution is in science, with more than two-thirds of the students in this department. The Teacher Training College was opened in 1952, the first nongovernment training college in the state. This was a two-year course leading to the certificate of teaching, but when this was abolished by the government, the college was upgraded for the Licentiate Teaching Diploma. It is among the leading teacher-training colleges of the state. The College of Physical Education is recognized as a pioneering institution in its field. In 1955, a one-year course for graduates, leading to the Diploma in Physical Education, was added under the Lucknow University. This was the first university diploma in physical education to be given in the state.

The first Indian principal, appointed in 1921, was one of its own alumni, J. R. CHITAMBAR, who left the position in 1930 when he was elected a bishop of the M. E. Church. One of the buildings in the later years of an extensive building program is the Bishop Chitambar Memorial Chapel. The second Indian principal, C. M. THACORE, has been at the helm since 1949, and is responsible for much of the expansion of the present time.

LUCKNOW CONFERENCE, in India, whose area begins about 300 miles from CALCUTTA and extends on both sides of the Ganges River for over 300 miles. Methodist work was opened there in 1858. Portions of the conference have been included at various times in the NORTH INDIA, NORTHWEST INDIA, and BENGAL ANNUAL CONFERENCES. The Lucknow Conference was organized in February 1921, by Bishop FRANK W. WARNE. There are five districts in the conference. The Arrah-Buxar District has ten circuits. BUXAR is a town of 35,000 inhabitants where there is a church of 882 members, which is largely self-supporting. The Buxar Brides' School is also located there.

The Ballia District has a church in Ballia, and there are reported to be 3,917 members in the district. The Gonda District, where work began in 1865, has about 1,583 Methodists in eight circuits. These center in Gonda, a town of about 46,000, seventy-three miles east of Lucknow on the North-Eastern Railway. It is in the midst of an agricultural area. There is a partially self-supporting church in the town with a membership of 579, a considerable number of whom are students and teachers at the Chambers Memorial Girls' School there, which is largely supported by the Woman's Division of Christian Service.

The Kanpur District includes six civil districts. There are approximately 7,732 Methodists and thirteen circuits on this district.

Allahabad, where there is a church with almost 1,000 members, is largely self-supporting, and there is also a Methodist Primary School supported by the Woman's Division of Christian Service with an enrollment of 326 boys and 58 girls. The ALLAHABAD AGRICULTURAL INSTITUTE is across the Ganges River.

KANPUR, head of the district by that name, is a city of 895,106, situated on the right bank of the Ganges River, fifty miles southwest of Lucknow, and is the largest city in Uttar Pradesh. There are two self-supporting churches in Kanpur. There are several other centers where church groups are organized. Kanpur also has the Methodist High School supported by the Woman's Division of Christian Service, and the Hudson Memorial Girls' School, supported by this same division.

In the Lucknow District there are 2,951 members in six circuits. The Lucknow Conference in its five districts reports 23,211 members, including those of baptized children. The bishop of the Area lives in Lucknow.

LUCKNOW PUBLISHING HOUSE. In January, 1860, WILLIAM BUTLER faced a problem: orphan boys had been gathered together in BAREILLY, but he knew that not only food but employment was necessary. He felt there was no other means within reach but printing. And for this, J. W. WAUGH's experience as a practical printer seemed providential—the very help needed for the enterprise, and for the printing of hymns, tracts, and catechism. Funds were made available by seven missionaries who gave $100 each as loans for two years, and the press was set up in Bareilly. It was at first called the India Book Concern.

In 1866, the press was moved to Lucknow and set in a small room near the home of the superintendent. The staff consisted of six men, with only one hand-press. Christian literature was made available, however, and for more than a century the Lucknow Publishing House, as it came later to be known, has made its impact on Christian teaching through its publications. From its humble beginnings the publishing house now occupies its own building with rooms for all departments, as well as a large book-sales room. Modern facilities, including an offset press, have been added to the equipment in recent years and literature can be produced in all the languages of INDIA, but especially in English, Urdu, and Hindi.

From the beginning, the agents (managers) of the publishing house have been missionaries, only a few of whom had practical training for the work. WILLIAM W. BELL, with both technical and business ability, was appointed agent in 1954, and brought the publishing house to a state of production and financial stability not exceeded in all its previous years of service. In recent years, the BOARD OF MISSIONS has departed from its old practice of making no appropriation for publishing, and has given grants to help meet the need of making literature available, not only for the Christian community, but for others who ask for good literature.

JAMES THOBURN felt the need of some communication with the public and started The Witness with the help of JAMES MESSMORE. It was published first in May 1871, every two weeks, but the following year it became a weekly. It was aided at first by special subscription but very soon became self-supporting. In more recent years it has been subsidized by the publishing house. Now called The Indian Witness, it has a full-time editor, trained in Journalism. The Kaukab-i-Hind (Star of India), a bi-weekly in Roman Urdu, meets a need felt by many village pastors and leaders.

LUGG, THOMAS BRANSFORD (1889-1967), American church executive, was born in Salem, Wis., Dec. 11, 1889. His education was received at NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY and GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE. Joining the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE in 1915, he served pastoral charges until 1932. He was a chaplain in World War I. His administrative ability was recognized, and he became superintendent of the Quincy and Jacksonville districts of the conference. He served the Methodist Church as a whole in the position of Executive Secretary and Treasurer of the WORLD SERVICE and Finance Commission for sixteen years, from 1944-1960. As treasurer of The Methodist Church, he brought to bear in the councils of the church, a quiet sincere sagacity and administrative ability which had marked effect. A leader of the Southern section of the church said that one of the finest things about the unification of American Methodism in 1939 was "getting to know and work with Tom Lugg."

He died in Evanston, Ill., on Sept. 1, 1967.

LUKE, BENJAMIN R. (? -1918), an orphan boy from an upper-caste family, came to the orphanage run independently by Louisa H. Anstey, a former missionary of the London Missionary Society, at Kolar, in Mysore State. When Miss Anstey made over her mission to the M. E. Church in 1890, and it became an institution of the SOUTH INDIA CONFERENCE, Benjamin Luke and his wife joined the Methodist Church. He went to help C. B. Ward in pioneer work at Sironcha in the Central Provinces. In 1889, he was appointed preacher-in-charge. His circuit became larger in area than many annual conferences now are. The work prospered. In 1917, he became district superintendent. Under his leadership, church membership and local support gained rapidly. The failure of the rains the next year brought the threat of famine. Cholera broke out and was quickly followed by the arrival of the influenza epidemic that was then sweeping the world. It overtook Luke while he was on tour. He died Oct. 21, 1918, and his body was brought home and buried in Sironcha.

Mrs. Luke remained in Sironcha until 1930, actively working as an evangelist. Their only son, J. R. Luke, has served as pastor of large churches and as district superintendent. A daughter, Dr. Jaya Luke, has been in charge of medical work since 1925, mostly at Sironcha. Another daughter, Ada Luke became the first Indian principal of the co-educational Methodist High School of Bidar.

LUKE, CHARLES MANLEY (1857-1946), NEW ZEALAND Methodist layman, was born in St. Ives, Cornwall, England, and brought up in nearby Penzance. He came to New Zealand and soon won a place in the business life of Wellington. He possessed great gifts as a platform speaker and local preacher. He served for many years as chairman of the hospital board, and became mayor of the city. He was a member of the executive of two exhibitions and a member of the royal commission to consider the federation of New Zealand with the Australian states. He served for many years on the Legislative Council, where he was a strong advocate of temperance reform. Twice president of the PRIMITIVE METHODIST CONFERENCE, he was also vice-president of the Union Committee in 1913.

ARCHER O. HARRIS

LUKE, JOHN PEARCE (1858-1931), New Zealand layman, was the son of Samuel Luke, who emigrated with his family from Cornwall in 1874. Settling in Wellington, Samuel Luke founded Luke's Foundry, an engineering firm. His son John became a prominent citizen, serving on the City Council continuously from 1898 to 1921. For the last eight years of that period he was mayor. He was a member of Parliament from 1908 to 1911, and again from 1918 to 1928. He was knighted in 1921. He and his brother Charles were actively connected with the Trinity Methodist Church, Newtown, Wellington.

LUMB, MATTHEW (1761-1847), was a British missionary pioneer to the WEST INDIES. He was born near Halifax, Yorkshire, in October 1761, and was brought up as an Independent. But he became a Methodist LOCAL PREACHER in 1780 and an itinerant in 1783, being appointed to Barnard Castle. In 1788 he offered as a missionary and was stationed in ANTIGUA, then moved to St. Vincent in 1789. Here the law forbade unlicensed preaching, with fines rising from £18 for a first offense to death for a third. Lumb was imprisoned; and when Negroes rioted against the injustice, he preached through his cell window. THOMAS COKE brought his case to the Privy Council and gained repeal of the laws. On his release Lumb went to Barbados. He died, after later ministering in England for thirty-three years, on March 2, 1847.

LUMBER RIVER ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF THE HOLINESS METHODIST CHURCH was organized as the Lumber Mission Conference of the Holiness Methodist Church by several M. E. Church, South, ministers of NORTH CAROLINA who became interested in their local situation. They organized Oct. 26, 1900, at Union Chapel Church, Robeson County, N. C., with a special emphasis on home missions and scriptural holiness.

Doctrinally, the church is Wesleyan with an emphasis on the universality of the atonement, the witness of the spirit, and holiness. They retain the CLASS MEETING structure and require a probationary period of six months for prospective members.

A bishop presides over the six congregations and 1,000 members in their annual conference meeting. Ministers are not itinerant and, hence, have no time limit on the length of their pastorate. The Yearbook of American Churches of 1968 lists Bishop M. L. Lowry of Pembroke, N. C. as the bishop.

LUNDY, ROBERT FIELDEN (1920-). American missionary and bishop, is the son of Clyde E. and Elizabeth (Teilman) Lundy. He was born at Stilesboro, Ga., on March 29, 1920. He is a graduate of EMORY AND HENRY COLLEGE, and CANDLER SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, EMORY UNIVERSITY, and holds the honorary D.D. degree from Emory and Henry.

He married Elizabeth Hall of Pulaski, Va., on June 15, 1944, and they have three children.

From 1944 to 1948, Robert Lundy was pastor of First Church of Oak Ridge, Tenn., and during one year at Yale he was pastor of East Pearl Street Church in New Haven, Conn.

Going to MALAYSIA in 1950 as a missionary, he served in a variety of capacities. His pastorates included Klang, Kuala Lumpur, Kuantan, Ipoh, Barker Road and Wesley Churches in SINGAPORE. While pastor of the Kuantan Church he organized and served the Eastern Malaya District. For four years he was district superintendent of the Perak District. In addition to his other work, Lundy was editor of The Methodist Message, the official organ for Southeast Asia, and served as Methodist News Correspondent for Malaysia. He served for a term as President of the Council of Churches of Malaysia and Singapore.

He was elected bishop in 1964 to head the work in the Singapore area for a four year term. At that time the Singapore area of The Methodist Church had four annual conferences with diverse languages. After serving his terms as bishop, R. F. Lundy resumed his place in the autonomous church recently organized in Malaysia.

Going simultaneously to Southeast Asia with Bishop Lundy were his brother, John Thomas Lundy, later Field Treasurer for Singapore and a cousin, Dr. Gunnar Teilmann, a leading minister in Malaysia.

LUNN, HENRY SIMPSON (1859-1939), British, medical missionary and railway and shipping agent, was born on July 30, 1859, at Horncastle, Lincolnshire, and entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1881. After training as a minister, he qualified as a medical doctor with a view to service overseas; and in 1887 he went to INDIA, but returned the following year because of ill health. Service at the West London Mission was interrupted in 1890 by controversy with the Mission House over missionary methods in India, and this led to Lunn's resignation from the ministry in 1893 and the resumption of his business career. He became involved in Liberal politics and discussions of church unity, and was knighted in 1910. His publications include The Love of Jesus, The Secret of the Saints, and Reunion and Lambeth. He edited Review of the Churches from 1892-96, 1920-30. He died on Feb. 16, 1939.

LUTON INDUSTRIAL COLLEGE in England, was founded in 1957. Its charter laid down the following principles: to make the Christian faith relevant in the realms of industry and commerce; to give practical training in industrial mission; and to give training in leadership and corporate responsibility. The College was founded through the initiative of a Methodist minister, William Gowland, who left the Albert Hall, Manchester, in 1954, to make his headquarters in Luton, Bedfordshire, a car manufacturing town in the south of England. The Conference stationed him in charge of a church called Chapel Street, built to seat 2,000, and then on the point of closure. Gowland developed the premises as a community-center, the Luton Industrial Mission, and was soon acting as industrial chaplain in eight factories. He started the College itself in the Chapel in 1957, and during the first ten years 6,000 students attended short courses. The main aim was to train laymen but theological students also attended. In September 1959, the College became a division of the Methodist HOME MISSION DEPARTMENT. The British Methodist Church now has about two hundred ministers who serve as industrial CHAPLAINS; they all receive an induction course before they start, and are invited back every third year for retraining. An annual study conference for the chaplains is part of their three-tier training. The College is ecumenical in terms of staff and students. It was the first industrial college of its kind in the world. One important emphasis of industrial chaplaincy in British Methodism has been that chaplains should only be appointed where both management and trade unions are in agreement: no ecumenical work is possible within industry where the unions in particular oppose the coming of the chaplain. There has been a tendency in Britain for chaplains to be set up through management alone. A second emphasis has been on the need for continuity in the chaplain's work: men should not be sent and then taken away again within two or three years.

LYCETT, FRANCIS (1803-1880), British businessman and benefactor of the church, was born at Worcester, the son of a glovemaking, and was converted in his youth. In 1832, following a slump in his father's business, he became manager of a glove firm in LONDON and prospered. From 1866-67 he was sheriff of London and Middlesex, and was awarded a knighthood in 1867. He refused the honor of meeting Emperor Napoleon III because the meeting was to have been on a Sunday.

Lycett was generous in support of the Wesleyan Theological Institution, the Leys School, CAMBRIDGE, home and overseas missions, and the BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY. With GERVASE SMITH he was largely responsible for the Metropolitan Chapel Building Fund, launched in 1860, and personally promised £50,000 for the building of fifty chapels in twenty years, provided an equal sum was raised in the provinces. He died on Oct. 29, 1880.

LYCOMING COLLEGE, Williamsport, Pennsylvania, was established in 1812 as Williamsport Academy. It became Williamsport-Dickinson Seminary in 1848, Williamsport Dickinson Junior College in 1929, and Lycoming College in 1948. The college is the property of the Preachers' Aid Society of the CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE.

Lycoming is the Indian name for the region around Williamsport. The college offers the B.A. degree. The governing board has thirty members elected by the Preachers' Aid Society of the Central Pennsylvania Conference.

LYDIA PATTERSON INSTITUTE, El Paso, Texas, originally a school for Mexican boys, now coeducational, was made possible by a gift of $75,000 on Dec. 4, 1913, by an El Paso attorney, Millard Patterson, who was not a Methodist. Patterson stipulated that the money was "to be used under the auspices of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South for the education and religious training of boys and young men to preach the gospel in Mexico." The school was named Lydia Patterson in memory of Patterson's wife who was for many years a member of Trinity Church, El Paso. The original gift was used to erect a building to house the school. From the beginning the institute received support as a missionary project, and today it is related to the National Division of the General BOARD OF MISSIONS while at the same time it enjoys a special relationship to the SOUTH CENTRAL JURISDICTION whose annual conferences accepted quotas and raised some $750,000 for its building program in the 1960's. The institute has a special English department, an intermediate school, a high school, a preministerial department, and a night school for adults. Young men preparing for the ministry may live in the institute's dormitories while attending college in El Paso. The institute is closely affiliated with the RIO GRANDE CONFERENCE, many of whose ministers are among its alumni. Lydia Patterson Institute is accredited by the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools and by the University Senate. It is managed by a board of trustees elected by the South Central Jurisdictional Conference. In the main its support is derived from tuition, individual donations, and advance specials from the churches of the South Central Jurisdiction. In 1969 the institute reported 25 teachers, 582 regular students, a library of 10,200 volumes, a plant valued at $1,600,000, an annual budget of $262,000, and an endowment of $17,000.

LYNCH, JAMES (1775-1858), Irish preacher and missionary pioneer in CEYLON and INDIA, under the British Wesleyans, was born in Londonderry, in the north of IRELAND, and grew up as a Roman Catholic. He was converted under Methodist preaching 1802 and entered the ministry in 1808.

In 1812 he was one of the volunteers who joined THOMAS COKE's missionary venture to the East. When Coke died on this journey, James Lynch was one of those with qualities of leadership to take over the difficult situation that ensued. The strategic stations the little company of six young preachers established in Ceylon have remained important centers of witness through all the years since. Not being good at languages, Lynch himself ministered mainly to British civil and military personnel.

Once the work was firmly begun in Ceylon, the chance came to fulfill something of Coke's original plan. In 1817 James Lynch became a pioneer missionary to Madras, and was welcomed by a group of serious-minded people who met for Bible study in Royapettah. He built the first chapel there in 1817, and continued a ministry mainly amongst Europeans until a breakdown in health necessitated his return to Ireland in 1825.

In Ireland he threw himself again into circuit work, mainly in the north. Increasing physical weakness led to his retirement from active ministerial life in 1842. Most of his closing years as a supernumerary were spent in England, at LONDON and LEEDS, and he died March 21, 1858.

A junior colleague on one occasion was WILLIAM BUTLER whose missionary zeal was so kindled by James Lynch, that in later years he was the founder of American Methodism's missions in INDIA and MEXICO.

LYNCH, JAMES D. (1839-1872), American Negro minister and politician, was born on Jan. 8, 1839 in BALTIMORE, Md. His father was a free man who had purchased James' mother from slavery. After he graduated from the Kimball Union Academy in NEW HAMPSHIRE in 1857, Lynch became a Presbyterian minister until 1859 when he joined the A. M. E. Church. He served parishes in ILLINOIS and INDIANA before his transfer to the Baltimore Conference in 1860.

In May 1863, Lynch became a missionary to former slaves in SOUTH CAROLINA under the auspices of his church and the National Freedmen's Relief Association. Two years later he and four other preachers, with Bishop DANIEL A. PAYNE, formed the South Carolina Conference of the A.M.E. Church. Returning to PHILADELPHIA in February 1866, Lynch became editor of The Christian Recorder, the official A. M. E. paper. In June 1867, he resigned that post to join the M. E. Church, convinced that it was, he wrote, "God's chosen power to lift up my race from degradation." Immediately Lynch went to MISSISSIPPI where he helped to organize a new conference for the M. E. Church in 1869.

A popular orator and respected spokesman for black Mississippians, Lynch pleaded so effectively for racial harmony that he maintained the respect of his white ecclesiastical and political opponents. In 1868 and 1872 he was a delegate to the Republican National Convention. Educational work with the Freedmen's Bureau and election in 1870 as Secretary of State for Mississippi involved him further in politics. He continued, however, as a presiding elder in the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE and served as one of the first Negro delegates in a M. E. GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1868, and again in 1872. From 1868 until his death Lynch published the Colored Citizen's Monthly "to defend the interests of the Negro, the Republican Party and the M. E. Church." His death from pneumonia on Dec. 18, 1872 in Jackson, Miss., cut short a brilliant career of racial, political and ecclesiastical leadership.

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA, U.S.A., on the James River in the foothills of the Blue Ridge Mountains with a population of 53,134 is a shipping and trading center for a rich agricultural region. Founded by John Lynch in 1757, Lynchburg was incorporated as a town in 1805 and city in 1852. During the Civil War the Confederates held Lynchburg to the end as one of their vital supply bases. Lee surrendered at Appomattox Court House twenty miles east of the city.

Three schools are located here: RANDOLPH-MACON WOMAN'S COLLEGE, Lynchburg College, and Virginia Theological Seminary. Sweet Briar College is twelve miles away.

Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY frequently visited Lynchburg and held several conferences there. Both Bishops Asbury and WHATCOAT preached and celebrated holy communion in the city in 1805.

In 1811 Lynchburg was mentioned in the Minutes, with John Weaver as pastor who reported 207 members for the circuit. At the division of the M. E. Church in 1845, the society of course adhered to the M. E. Church, South. After the Civil War the M. E. Church organized a society of colored members before 1876. That year Lynchburg had three Southern Methodist Churches: Centenary with 402 members; Court Street, 388; City Mission, 108; and the M. E. Church (colored) had 617 members.

Memorial Church was organized in 1883 with eighty-nine charter members who transferred from Court Street, among whom were C. V. Winfree and John Bell Winfree, leaders of church and civic life.

RANDOLPH-MACON WOMAN'S COLLEGE, chartered in 1891, opened its doors in 1893 with William Waugh Smith as founder and first president.

In 1900 there were six M. E. Church, South, congregations: Court Street, Centenary, Memorial, Trinity, Cabell Street, and Southview.

The unification of Methodism in 1939 brought two former M. P. churches (First Church and Park View) into the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE (SEJ). Jackson Street Church, organized in 1866 as a Negro M. E. Church, became a part of the WASHINGTON CONFERENCE (CJ).

Chestnut Hill Church was organized in 1951 in a building purchased from the Congregational-Christian Church with a small group of the original members remaining as charter members.

In 1965, a group of dissenting Methodists, reacting against the position of The Methodist Church on civil rights, withdrew and organized the First Southern Methodist Church as a "segregated church without bishops."

Other Methodist bodies in Lynchburg in 1965 were: the C. M. E., organized in 1872 (membership, 160); and the Wesleyan Methodist Church, organized in 1929 (membership, 56).

Lynchburg has been the host to many history-making sessions of both the Virginia Conference and the Washington Conference.

In 1970 Lynchburg reported thirteen United Methodist Churches—Fort Hill with 1,454 members and Centenary with 1,114 members being the larger. Court Street had 910 and the Lynchburg District 23,529.

LYNCHBURG COLLEGE, Lynchburg, Virginia, U.S.A., also called "Lynchburg Military College," the first Methodist Protestant College in the American South, developed from the tense political situation of the mid-1850's and was destined to close soon after the outbreak of the War Between the States. Due to the slavery issue, the entire faculty at MADISON COLLEGE, Uniontown, Pa., resigned at the commencement of 1855 and announced that a new M. P. college would open that fall. Lynchburg was chosen as the site for this college not only because it was centrally located and in VIRGINIA but because of its healthy climate and easy accessibility. Lynchburg College opened on Oct. 1, 1855, with a faculty of five and eighty-one students. It was enthusiastically endorsed by local citizens who raised $20,000 toward its expenses. The college was incorporated by an Act of the Virginia Assembly passed on Dec. 17, 1855, and the forty trustees were empowered "to confer literary degrees and distinctions upon such persons as in their opinion shall merit the same." Among the trustees was WILLIAM HENRY WILLS of NORTH CAROLINA.

During the first term of the college there were 108 students and in March, 1857, there were 135 students from ALABAMA, TENNESSEE, North Carolina, MARYLAND and Virginia. Samuel K. Cox was president of Lynchburg College until 1858, when Robert L. Brockett accepted the office. In 1860 Robert Boyd Thomson became president. The college adopted a military system of training, at first conducted on a voluntary basis but, after 1860, compulsory for all students over the age of fourteen. Uniforms were worn by the cadets who drilled in regular military fashion.

The GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. P. Church which met in Lynchburg in 1858 focused denominational attention on the new school. Lynchburg College was forced to close in 1861 when most of the faculty and students enlisted in the Confederate Army. During the War Between the States the buildings were used as a hospital by the Confederate government and, after the war, as barracks by the Federal army. Due to the financial difficulties following the war, Lynchburg College was never reopened.

LYNCHBURG FEMALE COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE (1858-c. 1861), Lynchburg, Va., U.S.A., known also as "Lynchburg Female Seminary," was established and operated by the faculty of the Lynchburg Methodist Protestant College. The Institute was opened on Feb. 1, 1858, with Samuel K. Cox, President of Lynchburg College, as president. Both the College and the Institute were forced to close when their joint faculty resigned in 1861 to join the Army of the Confederate States of America. Neither school was ever reopened.

LYNN, MASSACHUSETTS, U.S.A., with a population (1970) of 87,817, located eleven miles northeast of Boston, was first settled in 1629. Primarily known as a shoe manufacturing center, the city's industry today includes two large General Electric plants. Here Virginia-born JESSE LEE, "Apostle of Methodism to New England," preached in December 1790, at the corner of present Market and Essex Streets in the home of Benjamin Johnson. On Feb. 20, 1791 with eight members, Lee organized the first Methodist Church in Massachusetts in the Johnson barn. The following June a building was erected; here BISHOP ASBURY conducted the first Methodist conference in New England, Aug. 3, 1792.

On March 3, 1968, the third structure built of red brick in 1879 at the original location on City Hall Square was vacated; the property was sold and the building demolished. The historic First Church congregation, now relocated and united with St. Paul's, claims to have established the first Methodist Sunday school in New England in 1816; organized the first Methodist Missionary Society in the United States, Feb. 21, 1819; released WILLIAM BUTLER, pastor in 1856, to become the first native New England Methodist missionary and the father of Methodist missions in INDIA and MEXICO. Four ministers of this church became bishops: SOULE, HEDDING, MALLALIEU, and GROSE. The Paul Revere bell from the tower of First Church, to which Longfellow referred in his poem, "Bells of Lynn," has been re-hung in St. Paul's Church.

At the present time besides the merged congregations of First Church-St. Paul's, there are eight other Methodist churches in Lynn, the first four of which are offshoots of "the church on the Common": Boston Street, South Street, Maple Street, Trinity, Broadway, Lakeshore Park, Lakeside and St. Luke's. All the Methodist churches in the city have an aggregate membership of 3,977 persons (1970). In order to meet the complex problems of the changing city of Lynn three churches in the west section—Boston Street, South Street, and Trinity—though retaining their original identity have pooled their resources in "a group ministry" for effective Christian action. More mergers will undoubtedly be consummated in the near future.

LYONS, ERNEST SAMUEL (1868-1948), American missionary to the PHILIPPINES and leader—in his later years —of the CALIFORNIA ORIENTAL MISSION, was born at Howell, Mich., on May 12, 1868. LYONS was educated at Puget Sound Business College and the GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE, from which he received the B.D. in 1899, and the D.D. in 1925. He obtained a law degree from Washington State College in 1893. In the Philippines itself he took the bar examination in 1913 so that he could take care of the increasing legal business having to do with Methodist properties in the Philippines at that time. He married Harriet Elenor Ewers on Dec. 4, 1900, and to them were born five children.

He was received into the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE in 1899 and ordained elder in 1901. After student pastorates in the United States, he went overseas as headmaster of the Anglo-Chinese School, SINGAPORE, in 1899. He was appointed Field Missionary to the Philippines in 1903; district superintendent of the Northern District

(Philippines) in 1905; superintendent, Manila District, 1912; and pastor of the Students' Church in MANILA in 1914. He left Manila with Mrs. Lyons on March 21, 1937, with an official tribute paid to them in these words, "These two veteran missionaries have had a remarkable service in the Philippines and have seen in their thirty-four years of residence here a most phenomenal growth of the evangelical Christian movement and especially of the Methodist Episcopal Church, whose missionaries they are."

After Lyons and his wife had come back to California, he was called back into active service to be superintendent of the California Oriental Mission. It was through his work that the mission became organized as a Provisional Conference in 1945, after which time he again retired. He was a member of the American Bar Association, a life member of the Royal Asiatic Society, Straits Branch. One of the most versatile men in his activities and one of great usefulness to the church, Ernest S. Lyons left an enduring memory with those who knew and worked with him in the Philippines and in California. He died in 1948.

Mrs. Harriet Elenor Lyons died in Los Angeles on Oct. 4, 1966.

McANALLY, DAVID RICE (1810-1895), American church editor, was born in Granger County, Tenn., Feb. 17, 1810, the son of Charles and Elizabeth (Moore) McAnally. He was twice married, first to Marie Thompson, and later to Julia Reeves.

Admitted on trial in the HOLSTON CONFERENCE in 1829, he served various charges in TENNESSEE, NORTH CAROLINA, and VIRGINIA during the next fourteen years. Taking the presidency of East Tennessee Female Institute at KNOXVILLE in 1843, he held that post until 1851 when he was elected editor of the St. Louis Christian Advocate. Except for brief periods, he continued in that position until his death in 1895.

McAnally was an effective editor. In presenting the news he sought to keep his readers informed on the march of events, and in his editorials he tried to ground them in sound doctrine. As the Civil War approached he was frankly pro-Southern, upholding states' rights and defending (without praising) the institution of slavery. In 1862 he was arrested, his paper was suppressed for treasonable and subversive statements, and for some weeks he was held in Myrtle Street Military Prison in St. Louis. Throughout his editorship he was recognized both in his own denomination and in the M. E. Church as a strong voice speaking in and for Missouri and Missouri Methodism.

In 1852 McAnally was chairman of the convention which founded CENTRAL METHODIST COLLEGE and he cooperated with other Missouri Methodist leaders in raising an endowment for it. While in Tennessee he was interested in the common school system and joined Horace Mann and others in an effort to improve it. He was a delegate to five GENERAL CONFERENCES of the M. E. Church, South, 1854, '58, '66, '70, and '82, leading his delegation to the last three.

McAnally wrote several books, including Life and Times of Rev. William Patton (1858), Life and Times of Rev. Samuel Patton (1859), Life and Labors of Bishop E. M. Marvin (1878), and History of Methodism in Missouri (1881). His primary interest was in the church, and most of what he wrote dealt with it, but some chapters in his works were devoted to an interpretation of the life and thought of the times.

McARTHUR, ALEXANDER (1814-1909), British Wesleyan Methodist industrialist and politician in AUSTRALIA and Britain, was born in IRELAND on March 10, 1814. In 1841 he went to Australia for his health. His brother, WILLIAM McARTHUR, encouraged him to set up as an export merchant, and during the gold rush the business prospered. He became a member of the Sydney Legislative Assembly and, later, of the Legislative Council. In 1863 he returned to England, and became M.P. for Leicester from 1874-92. In 1883, he gave £5,000 toward a new fund for building chapels in London. He died on Aug. 1, 1909.

H. MORLEY RATTENBURY

McARTHUR, WILLIAM (1809-1887), British Wesleyan Methodist, merchant, alderman, and politician, was born in County Donegal in IRELAND on July 6, 1809. He became manager of a woolen drapery business which prospered when his brother ALEXANDER McARTHUR went to AUSTRALIA. Already an alderman of Londonderry, in 1857 he moved to LONDON, and in 1867 became sheriff of London and Middlesex, in 1872 an alderman, and in 1880 lord mayor. From 1868-85 he was Liberal M.P. for Lambeth and was a leading advocate of the annexation of Fiji to the British crown. He was knighted in 1882. A Sunday school teacher for forty years, he supported the church in many ways, giving £10,000 in 1883 to a new fund for building fifty chapels in London and, with his brother, £3,000 toward the building of Wesley College, BELFAST, whose foundation stone he laid in 1865. In 1881, as lord mayor, he entertained the first ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE at a reception at the Mansion House, London. He died on Nov. 16, 1887, in London.

M'AUAY, ALEXANDER (1818-1890), British Wesleyan evangelist and missionary, was born in Glasgow on March 7, 1818, and, though his father had been baptized by JOHN WESLEY, had a Presbyterian upbringing. He and his brother Samuel were both converted at a mission prayer meeting in 1835, and both entered the Wesleyan ministry, Alexander in 1840. He became known as an anti-Socialist, but also as a leader of a forward movement and evangelist. As secretary of the Metropolitan Chapel Building Fund, he was responsible for the erection of several chapels, and in 1876 he succeeded CHARLES PREST as general secretary of the HOME MISSION DEPARTMENT. In 1867 he was elected to the LEGAL HUNDRED, and in 1876 became president of the Conference. After his retirement he fulfilled a lifelong ambition to preach the gospel overseas, traveling at his own expense to the WEST INDIES and Africa. He died on Jan. 1, 1890, at Somerset East, Cape of Good Hope.

McBRIER, EDWIN MERTON (1865-1956), American mercantile executive, churchman and philanthropist, was born July 16, 1865, on his father's farm near Russell, N. Y.

As a young man of twenty-two, he taught day school and at the same time taught a Sunday school teachers' Bible class in the local Methodist church. In 1887, he opened a variety store in Lockport, N. Y., over the door of which read "Woolworth & McBrier." The "Morning Watch" movement stimulated him to systematic Bible study and prayer, and in late 1889 he sold his business and went to CHINA as a missionary under the China Inland Mission, intending to spend his life in this calling. The fatal illness of his brother, with whom he had been in partnership, impelled him to return to the States, to save his business.

In 1894, McBrier opened a five and ten store for S. H. Knox and Company in DETROIT. During this period, he taught the Bible class in the Woodward Avenue Methodist Church. In January 1912, five chains of five and ten stores merged to form the F. W. Woolworth Company. Six of the principal executives, including E. M. McBrier, F. W. Woolworth, F. M. Woolworth and S. H. Knox, had one parent or the other who was a McBrier. E. M. McBrier continued to rise in responsibility, becoming buyer of merchandise for the merged stores, and retiring on Aug. 1, 1921.

In 1912, the McBrier family had moved to Montclair, N. J., and in 1914, McBrier was elected a member of the Executive Committee of the Board of Foreign Missions of the M. E. Church. In Montclair, he cultivated the intimate friendship of JOHN R. MOTT and other Y.W.C.A. leaders. He continued on the BOARD OF MISSIONS until 1949. In 1917, he became treasurer of the United Board of Christian Colleges in China, and continued in this capacity until 1949, during which period he hired his own secretary and rented his own office space, serving with no compensation.

He was a member of the Board of Directors and the Board of Trustees of the Montclair Y.M.C.A. from 1916 to 1948, and led the campaign to liquidate the indebtedness of the Methodist Home for the Aged in OCEAN GROVE, N. J. Among the many honors accorded him for his leadership and benevolence, were the "Order of the Jade" tendered by the Republic of China in 1940, a citation by SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY in 1944 (on whose Board he served from 1923 to 1944), and a citation by St. Lawrence University in 1949. His service from his retirement to his death accounted for thirty-three years of unremunerated leadership for missions and the Church.

He died in 1956 and is survived by two daughters. He is interred in Montclair, New Jersey.

MCCABE, CHARLES C. (1836-1906), "Chaplain-Bishop" of American Methodism, was born Oct. 11, 1836, at Athens, Ohio, a grandson of Robert McCabe, class leader and adviser of JOHN STEWART, pioneer American Methodist missionary to the Delaware and Wyandott Indians of OHIO. In 1847 McCabe's family moved to Chillicothe, Ohio, and, from thence, to BURLINGTON, IOWA, in 1850. For a short time he farmed at Mt. Pleasant, Iowa, and clerked in a Cedar Rapids store. He was converted at the age of eight, under the ministry of JACOB YOUNG; later, in 1850, after his removal to Iowa, he went to the altar at a watch night service conducted by Levin B. Dennis in Burlington's Old Zion Church, afterward explaining: "I was born in Ohio, and born again in Burlington." He joined Old Zion in 1851.

CHARLES C. MCCABE

McCabe attended school at Athens, Ohio, and at Burlington, Iowa, before entering preparatory school at OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY (1854). For two years he was high school principal in Ironton, Ohio. He married Rebecca Peters on July 5, 1860. Also, in 1860, having been previously a local preacher, he was ordained DEACON, was admitted to the OHIO CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, and was assigned to Putnam (now in Zaneville), Ohio.

In 1862, the Civil War having broken out, he became Chaplain of the 122nd Ohio Volunteer Infantry and, being captured June 16, 1863, spent four months in Libby Prison, Richmond, Va.; later, he went into the Christian Commission movement to obtain assistance for wounded soldiers. His singing, in this position, popularized the "Battle Hymn of the Republic," while his addresses crystallized into his lecture, "The Bright Side of Life in Libby Prison."

In 1865 McCabe became pastor at Portsmouth, Ohio, building a church there, and served as Conference Centenary and Educational Agent (1866). He was financial agent of Ohio Wesleyan University (1867), before being called to PHILADELPHIA in 1868 as assistant to A. J. KYNETT in the Methodist Extension Society, where he continued as a secretary for sixteen years. His battle cry in promoting church extension, "we're building two a day," became famous throughout the church.

McCabe transferred to the NEW YORK CONFERENCE in 1870. This "apostle of optimism" was elected Corresponding Secretary of the Missionary Society by the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1884 and soon began sounding the slogan, "a million for missions." "Chaplain" McCabe was elected to the Methodist episcopacy in 1896. This missionary promoter, evangelist, and gospel singer, known to many as the "Methodist missionary millionaire," became Chancellor of AMERICAN UNIVERSITY, Washington, D. C., in December 1902. He died Dec. 19, 1906, in New York City and was buried in Rose Hill Cemetery, Chicago, Ill.

Bishop McCabe's writings include Final Report on Salt Lake City Church (pamphlet, 1880); A Glance Backwards (pamphlet, 1886); The Open Door in Latin Countries (First General Missionary Convention Address, Cleveland, 1903); The American University—Taking Our Bearings (pamphlet, 1903); Shouting (pamphlet about Christian rapture, n.d.); and "Dream of Ingersollville" (an allegory). He edited Winnowed Hymns, assisted by D. F. McFarlane.

McCain, Alexander (1768-1856), American preacher and one of the founders of the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH, was born in DUBLIN, IRELAND, of Roman Catholic parents and designed for the priesthood. When he was about twenty years of age he came to CHARLESTON, S. C., where he was converted under the ministry of WILLIAM HAMMETT, who led one of the earliest secessions from the M. E. Church.

McCain began preaching in Charleston and attracted the favorable attention of Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY, who took him as a traveling companion. He joined the Conference in 1797 and served circuits in the Carolinas and Virginia. He located in 1806 to educate his children, but after the death of his wife in 1815 and at the solicitation of Asbury he re-entered the active ministry. Although he was not a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE, he was elected secretary of that body in 1820. He again withdrew in 1821 and became the head of a boys' school in BALTIMORE.

He was appointed by Asbury to prepare a commentary on the Bible but did not complete the work. In 1827 he wrote a book under the title of The History and Mystery of Methodist Episcopacy, in which he opposed episcopacy and espoused the cause of the Reformers, whose agitation led to the formation of the M. P. Church. JOHN EMORY, the BOOK AGENT in NEW YORK, published a reply, A Defense of Our Fathers, which called forth from McCain a rebuttal entitled, A Defense of the Truth, which was published in 1829. In 1850 he published a book under the title of Letters on the Organization and Early History of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Among his other writings were a series of thirty-six letters in the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate, and forty letters in the Boston Olive Branch, which appeared also in book form. In all of these he upheld the principles of the Reformers. He also wrote in defense of slavery and published in 1842 a work called Slavery Defended Against the Attacks of the Abolitionists. He contributed numerous articles to the Western Recorder on the same theme.

McCain was active in the M. P. Church to the end of his life. He was a member of the General Conventions at Baltimore in 1827 and 1828 and of the General Conference of 1830, and a member of the committee which prepared the Constitution and the Discipline of the new denomination. He was also a delegate to the General Conferences of 1842 and 1854.

He worked mainly in the South and died in the home of his daughter, Mrs. James Brett, in Augusta, Ga., on June 1, 1856.

McCallum, Duncan (? -1834), was JOHN WESLEY'S apostle-general in SCOTLAND, commissioned to convert the heathen there. Self-taught, he mastered four languages and extensive scientific knowledge. McCallum preached in Erse and English. He commenced as an itinerant in 1775 and labored indefatigably until 1829, becoming then supernumerary. He traveled forty years in Scottish circuits, serving long, broken terms at Aberdeen, Inverness, Edinburgh, and Dumfries, and eleven years around Newcastle, Shields, and Morphet. He was named in the DEED OF DECLARATION. Wesley ordained him DEACON and ELDER in August 1787. A celebrated preacher, disciplinarian, and frequently chairman of the district, he experienced hardship among Calvinistic and unresponsive fellow countrymen. He died July 21, 1834.

McCleary, Paul (1930-), missionary to BOLIVIA, was born in ILLINOIS, received his A.B. degree from Olivet Nazarene College, attended the University of Illinois, and earned a B.D. degree from GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY. He married Rachel Timm, a science teacher, and they have four children. Since he began work in Bolivia in 1957, he has served as pastor in Cochabamba, both of the Union Church (English-speaking) and the Spanish-speaking Methodist church, and of the Methodist church in Santa Cruz. He was superintendent of the Central District. In 1962 he was appointed executive secretary of the annual conference.

NATALIE BARBER

McClelland, Clarence Paul (1883-), American college president, was born at Dobbs Ferry, N. Y., on Jan. 18, 1883. He was educated at WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, and SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY. He joined the NEW YORK CONFERENCE in 1908, serving churches until 1917. From then until 1925 he was president of Drew Seminary for Young Women.

Transferring to the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE, he became president of Illinois Woman's College, later named MACMURRAY COLLEGE, in Jacksonville, Ill. During his twenty-six-year term, until retirement in 1952, the college was greatly expanded in every way. The religious emphasis of his administration was exemplified by the new Annie Merner college chapel, erected in 1949.

Dr. McClelland served as a director of the Association of American Colleges, and as a member of the National Council of the Y.M.C.A. He is the author of Question Marks and Exclamation Points. Upon retirement he and Mrs. McClelland continued to live in Jacksonville, Ill.

JOHN M'CLINTOCK

M'CLINTOCK, JOHN, JR. (1814-1870), American clergyman, educator, editor, was born in PHILADELPHIA, Pa., on Oct. 27, 1814, the son of John and Martha (M'Mackin) M'Clintock, both born in County Tyrone, IRELAND. He was educated in the Grammar School of the University of Pennsylvania. At fourteen he started clerking in his father's retail dry goods store; at sixteen he became a bookkeeper in the Methodist Book Concern in NEW YORK CITY. While here he was soundly converted and considered entering the ministry. He entered the University of Pennsylvania in 1832, completing the required course with honors in three years. During his last year at the University he preached regularly. In April 1835, he was admitted on trial in the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church and appointed to JERSEY CITY, N. J. Never physically strong, his health broke in 1836 and he gave up the pastorate.

With the help of friends he turned to education, becoming assistant professor of mathematics at DICKINSON COLLEGE, and two years later (1837) full professor. Here he remained for twelve years, transferring in 1840 to the chair of classical languages. He published A First Book in Latin (1846), and with George R. Crooks, A First Book of Greek (1848). "Second Books" in both subjects appeared a few years later. These are noteworthy in that they started a method of teaching the classical languages which is still used.

Improving health enabled him to preach more frequently and on April 19, 1840, he was ordained an ELDER by Bishop ELIJAH HEDDING.

In 1848 the GENERAL CONFERENCE elected him editor of The Methodist Quarterly Review and he resigned his professorship to accept. During his eight-year term the Review became a scholarly exponent of the best Christian thought, and for the first time, self-supporting. His analytical essays on the positivist philosophy of Auguste Comte, and his detection of its errors attracted the French philosopher's notice and led to a correspondence between them.

He declined the presidencies of two universities to which he was elected, Wesleyan (1851), and Troy (1855).

In 1853, with JAMES STRONG, he began the Cyclopaedia of Biblical, Theological and Ecclesiastical Literature, a work in twelve volumes, still authoritative in many fields, which took much of his time for the rest of his life. Other publications included The Temporal Power of The Pope, (1855); a volume of sermons; a translation of A History Of The Council Of Trent, from the French of L. F. Bungener (1855); and from the German, with Charles E. Blumenthal, The Life of Christ, by August Neander.

In 1856, resigning from the Review he accompanied Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON as a delegate to the British Wesleyan Conference and the Conference of the Evangelical Alliance at Berlin. On his return he became pastor of St. Paul's M. E. Church, New York City. This appointment expiring by limitation in 1860, he was appointed pastor of the American Chapel, Paris, France.

During the Civil War he was a most effective representative of the Northern interests through his speeches, writings, and personal contacts, removing apprehensions abroad, and through The Methodist, of which he was corresponding editor, giving correct information at home. In 1864 he returned to the pastorate of St. Paul's from which ill health forced his resignation.

As chairman of the General Conference Centenary Committee (1864-1868), he kept busy planning the celebration of the CENTENNIAL of AMERICAN METHODISM (1866). DANIEL DREW, financier and philanthropist of New York City, desired to found a "Biblical and Theological School" in connection with this event, and in accordance with his wishes M'Clintock became the first president of DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, now part of DREW UNIVERSITY, in 1867. Less than three years later (March 4, 1870), he died and is buried in Madison.

In 1837 he married Caroline A. Wakeman, to whom was born one son, Emory. In October 1851, he married Catherine W. Emory, widow of his friend, ROBERT EMORY. The University of Pennsylvania honored him with a D.D. (1848), and Rutgers University conferred the LL.D. on him in 1866.

WILLIAM M. TWIDDY

MCCOLL, DUNCAN (1754-1830), Canadian preacher, the apostle of Methodism in southwestern New Brunswick, was born in Argyllshire, SCOTLAND. His parents belonged to the Scotch Episcopal Church, which he later left to become "a hearty and zealous Wesleyan." At an early age he enlisted as pay sergeant in the British army. In 1778 his regiment was ordered to Halifax, and at the battle of Penobscot Bay he was under fire for the first time.

His military experiences caused him to think deeply about religion, to set aside a day for prayer, and to slip away with his Bible to a quiet retreat in the woods. While in Bermuda in the winter of 1784 he met a Methodist woman from PHILADELPHIA, who told him about Methodism. She later became his wife and a help to his ministry.

When his regiment was disbanded in the spring of 1784, he settled at St. Andrews, New Brunswick, and during the next year he entered business at St. Stephen. Because the people were without a place of worship, he opened his home for service. So many were drawn to his services that the magistrate threatened to suppress them, and in consequence McColl was certain that it was his duty to preach.

At this stage he gave up his business, formed a Methodist society, and devoted his time to preaching. It was not easy, nor did he have full cooperation. "I had also to provide a house, seats, and a fire for people in the winter, for no one took it into his head to help me," he wrote. In 1790, however, he induced his supporters to build a church.

WILLIAM BLACK met Duncan McColl in 1792 and encouraged him to become a Methodist itinerant. He helped to found societies in Frederickton and in other parts of the St. John valley. Ordained in 1795 by ASBURY, McColl returned to St. Stephen where he remained the rest of his career.

For thirty-five years of his ministry, Duncan McColl labored hard to win souls to Christ and to form Methodist societies. He had to endure many hardships, provocations, and discouragements and the numerical results were not great. Nevertheless he left a deep impression on the religious life of the region.

In 1829 he became superannuated, but was unable to assist his successor greatly. He finished his diary Dec. 5, 1830, and on December 17 he died. He was buried in the St. Stephen and Milltown Protestant Cemetery where, in 1885, a substantial monument was erected in his honor.

Duncan McColl was a brave soldier, Loyalist, settler, and preacher of Jesus Christ. He symbolized the fact that the strength of the Methodist movement in the Loyalist period depended on the spontaneous response of converted and deeply concerned persons to the profound religious needs of the new communities. As a lay preacher he emerged to meet the challenge of spiritual destitution on the frontier. He introduced Methodism to New Brunswick and, to his distinguished colleague Matthew Richey, "he was second to none of the earlier Provincial itinerants in mental power."

McCOMBS, VERNON MONROE (1875-1951), American missionary and eventually leader in Spanish-American missions in the far west, was born at Parkers Prairie, Minn., in July, 1875. Licensed to preach in 1902, he attended St. Cloud Teachers College and taught for a short time. Later he graduated with the B.A. degree from HAMLINE UNIVERSITY, 1903, and then from DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, 1906. In the same year he received the M.A. degree from New York University. In 1906 also he married Eva M. White, and he and his young wife, both Student Volunteers, sailed for the mission field in PERU, where he engaged for a time in teaching. Later he was appointed as superintendent of North Andes Mission, covering Peru and ECUADOR. After a few years of work, he broke in health and had to return to America. A physician in NEW YORK advised him to go to the Southwest for rest, and thus he went to southern CALIFORNIA.

As early as 1879 the SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE had interested itself in mission work among the Mexicans. The first Sunday that McCombs was in Los ANGELES he made his way to the Mexican Sunday school on Bloom Street. There he found one teacher struggling with a small class. The visitor was invited to speak to them and this he did in perfect Spanish. This was his introduction to new work, for that same year he was named superintendent of Spanish work in Los Angeles. By his deep interest in and love for the Mexicans, he gathered about him a growing number of them, and by Conference time the work was so well established that in 1912 he was appointed superintendent of Spanish and Portuguese work and later, after some years, he was appointed superintendent of the Latin American Mission.

To secure help for the expanding work, he had to secure two ministers from MEXICO, and the new impact on the Mexican population soon made it necessary to move from the Bloom Street building to an adequately planned church on the old Plaza, the center of the Spanish speaking community. In a comparatively short time, a long-time hoped for school for young Mexicans was started. Earlier in the century, the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the Conference had established a school for Mexican girls in Hollywood. In 1909 a group of interested Methodists had organized and incorporated The Spanish American Training School for Boys, but little happened until McCombs revived the project, and since in southern California he had been fortunate in meeting former friends from his Hamline student days, many of whom had prospered, he readily found cooperators.

Ten acres of land was secured on Fiferua Street on the outskirts of Gardena, and here in October 1913, the school became a reality in newly erected buildings. Its aim was "to educate and give industrial and spiritual training to Mexican boys." Today the school is known as the Spanish American Institute.

The plight of the Mexican people demanded that well planned social work should go hand in hand with the religious activities, and this resulted in the organization of the Plaza Community Center. This actually began in the Bloom Street quarter, and in a way was the forerunner for the GOODWILL INDUSTRIES, for bags were given out to interested people to be filled with cast-offs. This gave employment to a few needy people. However, that method was changed with the coming of the better equipped Goodwill. The center developed an Employment Office, a Medical, and a Legal Clinic, a Dental Clinic and a General Welfare Office. The Center has followed the Mexicans as they moved from the Plaza area to other homes on the East side of the city. The work, however, is the same. Today several of the leaders in both church and social service have come from the Gardena School and from the influence of the Plaza Church and the Community Center. Both the Superintendent of the School and of the Center are Mexicans today. These institutions are living and growing memorials to the love, devotion, and tireless labors of Vernon Monroe McCombs, who died in Los Angeles, Calif., on March 15, 1951, and is buried in Forest Lawn Cemetery, Glendale, Calif.

JOHN GABRIELSON

MCCONNELL, CHARLES MELVIN (1886-1957), an American clergyman and educator, son of Israel and Nancy Jane (Chalfant) McConnell and brother of Bishop

FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL, was born on Jan. 16, 1886. He was educated at OHIO WESLEYAN (B.A., 1907) and BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY (S.T.B., 1910). CORNELL COLLEGE honored him with the D.D. in 1941. In the NORTH-EAST OHIO CONFERENCE, he was received on trial in 1909 and in full connection, 1911. His appointments were as follows: Middlefield, 1910-12; Berea, 1913; Lakeville-Newkirk, 1914-20; Board of Sunday Schools, 1921-23; representative of the General Board of Home Missions and Church Extension, 1924-25; professor, Boston University School of Theology, 1926-54.

He married Grace Dimmick in 1911 and to them were born four daughters. Mrs. McConnell died in 1949. In 1953 McConnell married Mrs. Margaret Brown and they made their home in Deering, N. H., where he died, Sept. 6, 1957. Burial was in Delaware, Ohio.

His career included teaching at Andover-Newton Theological School, staff membership with the Interseminary Commission for Training for the Rural Ministry, and activities as a founder of the Methodist Rural Fellowship. The Methodist Rural Fellowship Bulletin (Winter, 1957) was dedicated to "Pat" McConnell and carries wonderful tributes to him. He had an unerring sense of the values of rural life and of the need to nourish, to conserve, and to enhance them. In both Methodist and in ecumenical circles he played a leading role in giving spiritual depth and practical expression to the great movement for rural betterment.

MCCONNELL, DOROTHY (1900-), American editor and author, was born at Ipswich, Mass., Sept. 18, 1900, daughter of FRANCIS JOHN and Eva (Thomas) MCCONNELL.

She received the A.B. degree from OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in 1920, and the M.A. degree in 1922 from Columbia University.

She was a social worker, 1922-26, and an editor, 1926-32. From 1940 to 1966 she was editor of World Outlook, periodical of the BOARD of MISSIONS of The Methodist Church, New York, New York.

Miss McConnell has served as a member of the Board of Higher Education in Asia, on the executive committee of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, on the national board of the Y.W.C.A., committee member of the NATIONAL COUNCIL of THE CHURCHES of CHRIST in the U.S.A., and of the WORLD COUNCIL of CHURCHES.

She is the author of Friends of Nippon, Sugar is Sweet, Focus on Latin America, Pattern of Things to Come, Contemporary Man and the United Nations, and co-author of Sharing The Gift. She continues to reside in New York.

MCCONNELL, FRANCIS JOHN (1871-1953), American bishop, was born on a farm about five miles from Trinway, Ohio, on Aug. 18, 1871, the son of I. H. and Nancy J. (Chalfant) McConnell. His father and one of his brothers were Methodist preachers. He was educated at OHIO WESLEYAN (A.B., 1894) and BOSTON UNIVERSITY (S.T.B., 1897; Ph.D., 1899). Eleven institutions, including Harvard, Yale, Boston, and Ohio Wesleyan Universities, awarded him honorary degrees. On March 11, 1897, he married Eva Thomas, and they had two sons and one daughter.

McConnell joined the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE in 1894. He had four appointments in MASSACHUSETTS—West Chelmsford, 1894-97; Newton Upper Falls, 1897-99; Ipswich, 1899-02; and Harvard Street, Cambridge, 1902-03—and was pastor of New York Avenue Church, BROOKLYN, 1903-09. He served as president of DEPAUW UNIVERSITY, 1909-12, and was elected bishop in the latter year. His episcopal residence was in DENVER, Colo., 1912-20; PITTSBURGH, Pa., 1920-28; and NEW YORK, 1928-44. He retired in 1944.

He was president of the FEDERAL COUNCIL of THE CHURCHES of CHRIST in AMERICA, 1929, and was president of the Religious Education Association in 1916. He was a leader in the METHODIST FEDERATION for SOCIAL ACTION from its founding in 1912 to his retirement in 1944.

Bishop McConnell and Edgar S. Brightman were recognized as the two most famous students of BORDEN P. BOWNE, the personalist philosopher of Boston University. Bowne once told McConnell that if he planned to enter the ministry, he should pursue the study of philosophy long enough to earn the Ph.D. degree, and then concentrate on economics and political theory. Later McConnell said that he could work any problem in mathematics ever given him, but still he might make a mistake "in the additions and subtractions."

A great preacher, more intellectual than emotional, McConnell was one of the eleven American Methodists who up to his time delivered the Lyman Beecher lectures at Yale (1930). In 1931 he was the Barrows lecturer in INDIA. He served as visiting professor at Columbia University, 1932-33, at DREW and GARRETT SEMINARIES in 1934, and at Yale in 1946. His sermons were simpler than his lectures.

While president of DePauw, McConnell attended more to the spiritual development of the students than to the finances of the institution. He astounded church people by urging the Indiana legislature to appropriate more money for state schools because, he said, it would result in more money being given to DePauw.

During McConnell's episcopal residence in Denver, the area included Mexico, a nation then undergoing revolution. In administering the area, he traveled an average of 42,000 miles a year.

McConnell received both praise and condemnation for serving as chairman of the Interchurch World Movement Committee to investigate and report on the Pittsburgh steel strike in 1919. A strong champion of human rights on moral and religious grounds, he disregarded the pressure brought to bear on him to repudiate the committee's report. In the end the report proved helpful in eliminating the twelve-hour day in the steel mills, and some of the industrialists later became McConnell's friends. After the steel strike McConnell was recognized as an ecclesiastical leader of the first rank.

In a debate with Clarence Darrow, the famous agnostic lawyer, Bishop McConnell granted so many of the attorney's contentions that it surprised Darrow. Then in a masterful way McConnell showed that there is intelligence in the universe. Taking Darrow's premises and leading the man into what for him was a new field of thought, McConnell presented impressive and all but unanswerable arguments in favor of theism.

In writing a 1,000-word weekly article for The Church School Journal for thirty years, Bishop McConnell published about 3,500,000 words. In addition, he produced twenty-four books. Some of them were: Is God Limited? 1924; The Christlike God, 1927; Borden Parker Boune, 1929; The Prophetic Ministry, 1930; John Wesley, 1939; and By the Way, 1952, which was his autobiography.

As was the case with John Wesley, Bishop McConnell met the needs of the people at the place of their greatest need. He was one of the foremost American prophets of neighborly concern during his generation. In intellect, in religious insight, and in world-wide sympathy, he stood forth as a scholarly seer, a practical theologian, and a prophet of the social gospel. He died at his home in Lucasville, Ohio, on his eighty-second birthday, Aug. 18, 1953, and was buried there. Bishop FREDERICK B. NEWELL of New York officiated at the funeral, and two masterful addresses by Bishop HERBERT WELCH, then past ninety, and HARRIS F. RALL, were read by sponsors, with Bishop U. V. W. DARLINGTON among those in attendance.

Eva Thomas McConnell (July 23, 1871-Feb. 19, 1968), the wife of Bishop McConnell, was a remarkable woman in her own right and enjoyed wide esteem over the whole church. For some years she was vice-president of the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. E. Church and traveled widely with her husband. Speaking at a final dinner given in his honor by the New York Area on his retirement, Bishop McConnell said that his wife had asked him a few days before just what was meant by a "realist." The bishop said, "I'm not sure I know, but if there ever was one, she is." She died at Lucasville, Ohio, in her ninety-seventh year.

MCCORMICK, THOMAS (1792-1883), a charter member of historic St. John's Church, BALTIMORE, Md., was one of eleven preachers in Baltimore who were expelled from the M. E. Church because of their advocacy of reform in the church government. He was born in Loudoun County, Va., on Jan. 5, 1792, but following the death of his mother he was reared by his uncle, Thomas Moore, in Montgomery County, Md., and brought up in a Quaker atmosphere. He visited Methodist churches, however, and in 1811 joined the M. E. Church. He was licensed to exhort in 1816 and in the following year was licensed to preach. On April 21, 1822, he was ordained deacon by Bishop MCKENDREE. McCormick served as a pallbearer at Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY's funeral in 1816. He attended the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1816 and 1820. An early advocate of ecclesiastical reform, McCormick joined the first Union or Reform Society in Baltimore, and following the establishment of the Associated Methodist Church, later known as the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH, he was ordained an elder by NICHOLAS SNETHEN on April 5, 1829. Following a long and active career in the M. P. Church, he was elected as a supernumerary member of the MARYLAND CONFERENCE (MP) in 1869. He later served as a member of the famous Union Convention of 1877 in which the two branches of the M. P. Church re-united.

He died on Feb. 20, 1883, and was buried in Mount Olivet Cemetery in Baltimore.

JAMES H. MCCOY

MCCOY, JAMES HENRY (1868-1919), American bishop, was born in Blount County, Ala., on Aug. 6, 1868. He received the degrees of B.A., M.A. and D.D. from Southern University, Greensboro, Ala., north BIRMINGHAM SOUTHERN COLLEGE. He joined the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE in 1889, and served the Ensley Circuit and churches in New Decatur, Dadeville, Alexander City, BIRMINGHAM, TUSCALOOSA and Huntsville.

He was editor of the Alabama Christian Advocate for one year and was president of Birmingham College from 1906-1910. He was elected bishop of the M. E. Church, South, by the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1910. He served as president of the EPWORTH LEAGUE Board and trustee of various institutions of learning. He died March 22, 1919.

Bishop McCoy was a man of singularly modest demeanor. His strength was in his sincerity and the utter trust his brethren of North Alabama had come to repose in him. He did not live to become widely known over the whole church, dying in an untimely way when he was only fifty-one years of age. He presided only once back in and over his own home conference held in Anniston, Ala., in 1913. "From his election to the episcopacy until his death," says Lazenby, "his name was carried at the head of the clerical roll of the Conference as an honorary member."

MCCOY, LEWISTINE M. (1918-), American missionary to CHINA and BRAZIL, and now Executive Secretary for Brazil, MEXICO, PANAMA and COSTA RICA of the BOARD OF MISSIONS of The United Methodist Church. He was born on March 9, 1918 in Lexington, Ky., and graduated from KENTUCKY WESLEYAN COLLEGE in 1940. In 1943 he married Jessie Marion Wall of NORTH CAROLINA, a graduate of DUKE UNIVERSITY. They have five children.

After receiving his B.D. in 1944 from the Divinity School at Duke University, McCoy joined the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE. For a year he taught Bible and Religion at Kentucky Wesleyan; then, planning to go to China as a missionary, he spent a year at Yale studying the Chinese language and culture. The McCoys sailed for China, and arrived in Shanghai on Dec. 31, 1946. He was ordained elder in the East China Conference, served as co-pastor at Huchow Institutional Church and as Relief Administrator until forced to leave China because of the Communist take-over. The McCoys moved to HONG KONG, and there he opened the first American Methodist office; helped some 400 missionaries to leave China, and find other work; served as treasurer of Church World Service, of the American Mission to Lepers, the United Board of Christian Colleges, and some Brethren and Mennonite groups.

In 1951 he came back to the United States on furlough and in 1952 was appointed to Brazil. During the next ten years there, McCoy served as church pastor, treasurer for the old Division of World Missions, and for the Woman's Division of Christian Service. He was president of the Social Security Department of the Methodist Church of Brazil and of its JUDICIAL COUNCIL; as president of the Board of Directors of the Interdenominational Language School in Campinas (São Paulo), and a member of other church Boards. He was twice elected delegate to the General Conference of the Methodist Church of Brazil. In 1961 he was named delegate from Brazil to the Second Latin-American Protestant Conference in LIMA, PERU; and in 1962, was made Executive Secretary of the first Latin American Methodist Consultation, held in BUENOS AIRES. In 1958 Kentucky Wesleyan awarded him the honorary title of D.D.

McCoy was called to NEW YORK in 1963 to be the Executive Secretary of the Joint Commission on Missionary Personnel. In September 1965, he was elected Executive Secretary for Brazil, Mexico, Panama and Costa Rica in the Division of World Missions. He also serves on the Administrative Committee of the Latin America Department of the Division of Overseas Ministries of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, and is Chairman of the Supporting Committee on Brazil within that department. Recently, he was elected to the Board of Trustees of Santiago College, CHILE.

M'CULLAGH, THOMAS (1822-1908), British Wesleyan Methodist, was born at New Inn, Galway, IRELAND, on Feb. 17, 1822. He was brought up in the Established Church of Ireland, but became a Methodist in Kilkenny in 1839. He was employed by the Ordnance Survey; and in 1841 his work took him to Yorkshire, where his increasing devotion to Methodism led him into the Wesleyan ministry in 1845. He soon became a preacher known all over the country and was a respected superintendent and chairman. In 1875 he was elected to the LEGAL HUNDRED, and the presidency of the Conference followed in 1883. His literary work appeared mostly in journals, and revealed his considerable interest in Methodist history. He died on Nov. 11, 1908.

McCULLOCH, JOSEPH FLAVIUS (1856-1934), American educator, minister, and editor, was born in Guilford County, N. C., Jan. 24, 1856. He received his education at ADRIAN COLLEGE, Johns Hopkins University, and Clark University. He served on the faculty of Adrian College and the University of Michigan, and later returned as President of Adrian College.

McCulloch had one supreme purpose in his life, and that was to see the establishment in NORTH CAROLINA of a college for members of the M. P. Church. He worked toward that goal for forty years.

In 1893 McCulloch moved to GREENSBORO, N. C., and established a church paper, Our Church Record, which first appeared in 1894. It was later called the Methodist Protestant Herald. His reason for starting the paper was to create sentiment for the building of a M. P. college in North Carolina. He saw his dream realized when the cornerstone of Roberts Hall, the first building on the campus of HIGH POINT COLLEGE, was laid in 1924. The boy's dormitory was named McCulloch Hall in recognition of McCulloch's patient crusade.

A quiet, determined man who was so engrossed in his work and purpose that he allowed few people to get to know him well, McCulloch was respected as a man of deep conviction and high ideals.

He died in Greensboro, N. C., Oct. 1, 1934.

MCCULLOCH, MARY ELIZABETH BARROW (1858-1924), outstanding leader in the woman's work of the M. P. Church, was born near Oberlin, Ohio, on April 9, 1858. She attended school at Blissfield, Mich., and at ADRIAN COLLEGE where she and her husband-to-be, Joseph F.

McCulloch, graduated in 1883. They were married in September of that year. Mrs. McCulloch took an active role in supporting the work of her husband while he served as President of Adrian College, and as minister in churches in Fairmont, W. Va., and GREENSBORO, N. C. She did pioneer work in organizing, expanding, extending and strengthening the North Carolina Branch of the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. P. Church. The women of this organization paid the following tribute to her: "To Mrs. McCulloch's far-sighted leadership, her quiet suggestion and her spirit of hopefulness we owe much that we have gained. For nearly twenty years she led us, always forward, steadily upward, pushing toward the great objective with that active faith that must achieve even if conditions were unfavorable." She served (1902-1920) as the editor of The Woman's Missionary Record, a M. P. paper aimed toward creating a missionary spirit by letting its readers know the need and work being accomplished in the mission field. She died in November 1924, and was buried in the cemetery at Tabernacle Church, Greensboro, N. C.

MCCULLOH, GERALD OTHO (1912-), American minister and church official, was born at Auburn, Kan., Sept. 10, 1912, son of Otho John and Eva (Skaggs) McCulloh.

He was graduated with the A.B. degree from BAKER UNIVERSITY in 1932, and by that University he was awarded the D.D. degree in 1954. He received the M.A. degree from BOSTON UNIVERSITY in 1934 and the S.T.B. there in 1935. In 1938 he received the Ph.D. degree from the University of Edinburgh (Scotland). He was awarded the D.D. degree by HAMLINE UNIVERSITY, and the L.H.D. by OHIO NORTHERN UNIVERSITY.

Admitted on trial into the KANSAS CONFERENCE, M. E. Church, and ordained DEACON in 1934, he was received in full connection and ordained ELDER in 1936.

He was professor of philosophy in Hamline University, 1938-42; minister, Hamline Church, ST. PAUL, Minn., 1942-46; professor, systematic theology, GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, 1946-53. Since 1953 he has been director of the Department of Ministerial Education of the General Board of Education of The Methodist Church, known now as the Department of the Ministry, in which he continues at NASHVILLE, Tenn.

He was a delegate to the WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCE, 1951, 1956, 1961, 1966; to the World Conference on Christian Education, Tokyo, Japan, 1958; and to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, New Delhi, India, 1961, and Uppsala, Sweden, 1968. Since 1956 he has been a member of the department of ministry, and since 1962 of the triennial assembly and the General Board of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Since 1953 he has been a trustee of GAMMON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY; and since 1957 he has been a trustee of the Interdenominational Theological Center, Atlanta, Ga., and of ST. PAUL SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY. He is also a trustee of Hamline University. He is a member of the American Society for Church History and of the American Philosophical Association.

On June 8, 1939 he was married to Evelyn Belle Butler, and they have two children.

MCCULLOUGH, WILLIAM (1759-1840), American layman, who named Asbury, N. J., was born near Bloomsbury, Warren Co., N. J., on Dec. 18, 1759, the son of Benjamin and Hannah Cook McCullough. Both father and son served in the Revolutionary Army, the former as a captain, and the latter, seventeen years old when he enlisted in 1776, as a private, later becoming brigade quartermaster.

In 1784, William settled in Hall's Mills, N. J. In 1793 he became a lieutenant colonel of the Sussex County Militia, and thereafter was called "Colonel." He was a member of the New Jersey State Assembly, 1793-1799, the State Council, 1801-1803, and County Judge, 1803-1838.

McCullough was converted and joined a Methodist society in 1786 under the preaching of John McClaskey and EZEKIEL COOPER. His mansion on a bluff overlooking the Musconetcong River was a place of entertainment and preaching for the preachers, and there he welcomed Bishop ASBURY in 1789. The meeting house at Hall's Mills was erected in 1796, and Asbury laid the cornerstone on August 9. Colonel McCullough named both the church and the town for the bishop; Hall's Mills was the first community in America to be called Asbury, and the same was true of the church. He had the Warren County community of Mansfield renamed Washington, in honor of George Washington. He aided in the establishment of a Methodist society there and gave the property on which the First Methodist Church was erected in 1825.

McCullough died on Feb. 9, 1840, and was buried in the cemetery at Asbury, N. J.

MCCUSKEY, ROY (1883-), American pastor, district superintendent, and college president, was born four miles from Cameron, W. Va., on June 19, 1883.

He entered the WEST VIRGINIA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church and after serving a number of appointments became President of WEST VIRGINIA WESLEYAN COLLEGE, 1931-41. Then he served St. Paul's, Parkersburg from 1941 until his retirement in 1949.

He was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1924, 1932, 1936, and 1940.

Roy McCuskey did more than any man to save the college during the depression of the early thirties. After unification, he kept the institution in Buckhannon, W. Va., where it is said to have the most beautiful campus in America. Under McCuskey one-half the members of the West Virginia M. E. Conference were then trained at Wesleyan. Dr. McCuskey resides in Parkersburg, W. Va.

MCCUTCHAN, ROBERT GUY (1877-1958), American musician, hymnologist and editor of The Methodist Hymnal (U.S.A.) of 1935, was born Sept. 13, 1877, at Mt. Ayr, Iowa. He graduated from SIMPSON COLLEGE, Iowa, Bachelor of Music, 1904, and Doctor of Music in 1927. He began teaching music in BAKER UNIVERSITY, Kansas, 1904, but in 1911 became dean of the School of Music of DEPAUW UNIVERSITY, Indiana. In 1939 McCutchan went to Claremont, Calif., becoming a lecturer in the Claremont Graduate School in 1940 and there he remained until his death in 1958.

His first wife was Carrie Burns Sharp whom he married on Nov. 23, 1904 (deceased 1941), and they had one son, Robert John. He married again on Dec. 11, 1944, Helen Laura Cowles.

A skilled choral conductor, Robert McCutchan developed wide interest in congregational singing throughout the country and lectured on church music to church groups and at colleges and universities. He made a practice of collecting church hymnals, commentaries, and early American writings on religious music beginning with the seventeenth century. He left 3,000 such items to Claremont College in 1957. This collection is considered to be the finest of its field in the west.

McCutchan once observed: "Hymns have always filled the common need of human beings to praise God, give thanks, meditate or speak in penitence. When you want to discover the essential spirit of Christianity, turn to a hymn." He edited The Methodist Hymnal of 1935 and wrote Our Hymnody, 1937—an annotated enlargement of this hymnal. He also wrote Hymns in the Lives of Men, 1945; Music in our Churches, 1925, and Music in Worship, 1927. In 1957 he wrote his last book, Hymn Tunes: Their Sources and Significance. He died on May 15, 1958, at Pilgrim Place, Claremont, Calif., and was buried in Greencastle, Ind.

MACDONALD, FREDERIC WILLIAM (1842-1928), British Methodist, was born at LEEDS, Feb. 25, 1842, the son of George Browne Macdonald, a Wesleyan Methodist minister, and grandson of James Macdonald, one of John Wesley's preachers. Frederic was educated at St. Peter's Collegiate School, London, and at Owens College, Manchester, the earliest form of what was to become the present Manchester University. He entered the Wesleyan Methodist ministry in 1862, and served as circuit minister, theological tutor at Handsworth College, Birmingham (from 1881), and secretary of the Wesleyan METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY (from 1891). He was a fraternal delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church at CINCINNATI in 1880 and was elected president of the Wesleyan Conference in 1899. He superannuated in 1914, and died in Bournemouth, Oct. 16, 1928. He was most famous as one of the preachers of his time; he also wrote biographies of WILLIAM MORLEY PUNSHON and JOHN W. FLETCHER of Madeley.

Macdonald came from a remarkable family. His sisters Georgiana and Agnes married respectively the painters Sir Edward Burne-Jones and Sir Edward Poynter; and Alice and Louisa became the respective mothers of Rudyard Kipling, poet and novelist, and Earl Stanley Baldwin of Bewdley, Conservative leader and prime minister. One result of this relationship, we are told, was that Kipling sometimes made suggestions about the phrasing of Baldwin's speeches.

McDONALD, WILLIAM (1820-1901), American holiness minister, writer, and editor, was born March 1, 1820, at Belmont, Maine. He was converted and received his call to the ministry in 1838 and was licensed to preach in 1840. In 1843 he joined the MAINE CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church. During his sixty-one years of active service he was pastor of churches in MAINE, WISCONSIN, PROVIDENCE, NEW YORK EAST, and NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCES, some twenty-six churches in all.

McDonald stated that he experienced entire SANCTIFICATION in 1857 at the Kennebunk (Maine) CAMP-MEETING, and as the holiness movement progressed he came quickly to the front. He was one of the founders of the National Campmeeting Association for the Promotion of Holiness and served as vice-president for sixteen years and president for twelve. He was the first editor of the Advocate of Bible Holiness, the Association's national periodical, and later edited the Christian Witness.

He wrote numerous books in a variety of fields. His most popular were his holiness books, The New Testament Standard of Piety and The Scriptural Way of Holiness. He wrote a history of Methodism in Providence, R. I., where he had organized the Trinity Church. While he lay dying, his last book, Young Peoples' Wesley, was at the press. He passed away Sept. 11, 1901.

MacDONELL, GEORGE NOWLAND (1879-1953), an American missionary to CUBA and MEXICO, was born in Savannah, Ga., the son of George N. and Margaret Walker MacDonell. He was graduated from Emory College, Oxford, Ga., in 1893, then studied theology for three years at VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY. He was first appointed for work in CHINA, and studied the language and customs of the Chinese people. Although his reservation had been made to sail from SAN FRANCISCO, Bishop WARREN A. CANDLER, in charge of both China and Cuba, recognizing the strategic need for workers to go immediately to Cuba, canceled the trip to China and ordered MacDonell to go to Cuba.

Accordingly, he arrived in Havana on Dec. 31, 1898, and the following day the Spanish flag went down and the United States flag went up. The day marked the end of the era of Spanish colonization in the Western Hemisphere. Since there were many American soldiers stationed at Camp Columbia, in Havana, for some months after the end of the War with Spain, he assisted chaplains while studying Spanish.

There was then raging an epidemic of yellow fever with a heavy death toll, which MacDonell noted in his diary. He and his room-mate, Thaddeus E. Leland, came down with the dread disease, and both were nursed back to health by Mabel Kenerly Thrower, a teacher in the Colegio Central of which Leland was principal. While the two men were still sick, they were visited by Major W. C. Gorgas, head of the Army department of sanitation, and Dr. Carlos J. Finlay, Cuban physician who first advanced the theory that the disease was transmitted by the mosquito. They formed a lasting friendship. As associates, MacDonell soon had Hubert W. Baker and H. W. Penny.

He was married in 1900 by Bishop Candler to Mabel K. Thrower, and their first child, George MacDonell, Jr., was born in Havana. Two other sons, Thomas and Robert, and a daughter, Margaret, were born after they left Cuba.

Recognizing the need for medical missions, he asked for leave of absence to study medicine and graduated from Atlanta Medical College, now a part of EMORY UNIVERSITY. On finishing his medical course he engaged in practice as surgeon at the Minas Viejas, near Villaldama, and later conducted the American hospital in Monterrey, Nuevo Leon, Mexico.

After ten years in Mexico, he retired from that field due to severe revolutionary conditions which forced American citizens to be recalled to the U.S. He moved to Miami, Fla., where he became head of the city health department. He was awarded the Carlos J. Finlay medal by the Cuban government for his continued interest in Cuba, and his research with Finlay on the transmission of yellow fever by the mosquito.

His widow continued the missionary zeal of her partner and for many years was vitally interested in the missionary work of The Methodist Church. She passed away in Miami, on Feb. 23, 1968.

MacDONELL, ROBERT WALKER (1857-1885), pioneer missionary to MEXICO of the M. E. Church, South, was born in Savannah, Ga., on Oct. 11, 1857, the son of George G. N. MacDonell. His primary education was in the public schools of SAVANNAH and then he attended EMORY COLLEGE at Oxford, Ga., graduating in 1877. He was converted in a CAMP MEETING near Springfield in October 1872, and received into the church in November of that year. Having finished college, he taught school for a time and was then licensed to preach in 1877 and admitted to the SOUTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE on trial. For a time he served a circuit in South GEORGIA. He felt the call to the mission field in 1880, and Bishop GEORGE F. PIERCE presented his name to the BOARD OF MISSIONS for that work. He was accepted in May 1880, but was permitted by the Board of Missions to remain in Georgia for the rest of that year, serving at Savannah in place of a pastor who had been injured in a railroad accident. He was ordained DEACON and ELDER in December 1880, by Bishop Pierce. On December 28 of that year, he was united in marriage with Fachie Williams, the daughter of W. D. M. Williams, president of the State Institute for the Blind. They traveled to Mexico early the next year.

He served in several places in Mexico—for a time as superintendent of the District of Leon and in April 1884, was transferred to the American Church in EL PASO. He maintained his interest in and contact with the Mexican believers during this time, however. In 1885, he was charged with opening a new mission in the city of Durango, capital of the state of the same name. He was well-received and soon a school was opened with the cooperation of Catherine McFarren, a Presbyterian. He obtained the right to be known as the "Apostle of Methodism" in the state of Durango. His influence widened and he was respected throughout the area.

At a conference in SAN ANTONIO in 1885, the missions in the far-reaching territories of the area were formed into an Annual Conference and MacDonell was named secretary of this body. This organization was the forerunner of the RIO GRANDE CONFERENCE of the present. At times, the district superintendent did not arrive when scheduled for conferences and other meetings and MacDonell presided in his absence. In 1886, at the Annual Conference in Monterrey, H. C. Hernández was named assistant to MacDonell and his help proved most valuable in maintaining the work established at Nombre de Dios and San Juan del Rio as well as in the capital. At the following session of the Annual Conference in 1887, a new District was formed of the work in Durango, Chihuahua, Sonora and Sinaloa in Mexico and of the American territories of NEW MEXICO, ARIZONA and the mission at El Paso. MacDonell was named District Superintendent. He died at Nombre de Dios on Dec. 21, 1885, after a hard ride on horseback to keep a preaching engagement.

MCDUGALL, GEORGE MILLWARD (1821-1876), Canadian Methodist missionary, was born in Kingston, Upper Canada, Ontario, on Sept. 9, 1821. Educated at VICTORIA COLLEGE, he was received on trial in 1850. As a probationer he worked with WILLIAM CASE at Alderville and subsequently served at the Garden River and Rama missions. Ordained in 1854, he was appointed in 1860 as chairman of the Hudson's Bay and Rocky Mountains district and missionary at Rossville, Manitoba.

After a 1,200-mile exploratory trip to Fort Edmonton in 1862 with his son John and THOMAS WOOLSEY, he established a new mission about eighty miles east of Edmonton. Here he worked with Woolsey, H. B. STEINHÄUER, and John as a lay assistant. In 1867-68 he visited eastern CANADA to raise money to recruit men for his field. George and Egerton Ryerson Young and Peter Campbell responded to his appeal.

Following a great smallpox epidemic in 1871, during which he lost two children and many of his Indian charges, he established a permanent mission at Edmonton, a post first occupied by R. T. RUNDLE in 1840. Two years later he opened a new mission on the Bow River to the Stoney and Blackfoot Indians. In 1874-75 he returned to the east and to Britain. His mission was exceptionally successful in arousing enthusiasm for the Indian missions and in persuading the federal government to improve the condition of the Northwest.

Upon his return to the west, McDougall was asked by Lieutenant-Governor Morris of Manitoba to pacify the western Indians. They accepted his advice and did not block the work of surveyors and other federal officials.

While he was engaged in January 1876, in putting up new buildings at Morleyville on the Bow River, McDougall perished on the plains. He was buried at the mission site.

George McDougall was the effective founder of Methodist and indeed Protestant Christianity in Alberta. To Principal Grant of the Queen's University, he was "one of our simple great ones." Governor Laird acclaimed him as "one of the most devoted and intelligent advisers the Indians ever had."

MCDUGALL, JOHN (1842-1917), Canadian Methodist missionary to the Indians, was born at Owen Sound, Ontario, Dec. 27, 1842, and was married in 1864 to Abigail, daughter of HENRY B. STEINHAUER, and after her death in 1871 to Elizabeth, daughter of S. C. Boyd. His parents were the GEORGE M. MCDUGALLS, also missionaries to the Canadian Indians. His education was acquired in mission and village schools in Ontario, and two sessions at VICTORIA COLLEGE, Cobourg. He left college to accompany his father to his mission station in Manitoba, where young John taught school. Moving with his father's family to Victoria Mission, near Fort Edmonton, he continued as his father's lay assistant and interpreter, being stationed at Pigeon Lake as a lay supply. He was ordained July 30, 1872, at the missionary conference held at Winnipeg, Manitoba. In 1873 he began a new mission to the Stoney and Blackfoot Indians at Morleyville, then in unsettled territory. On the death of his father in 1876, he became chairman of the Saskatchewan district in the Methodist Church, a position he held until 1896.

He served as president of the Manitoba and North West Conference in 1893 and of the Alberta Conference in 1906, and as delegate to General Conference in 1886, 1890, and 1894. He was granted the doctorate of divinity by Victoria College, Toronto. After retirement in 1906, he was appointed by the Canadian government as commissioner to the Doukhobors and Indian commissioner for British Columbia, Alberta, and Saskatchewan.

Between 1888 and 1912 he wrote a biography of his father, a series of six volumes of personal memoirs, a novel, and many newspaper and magazine articles on the west.

An ardent Canadian nationalist, he advised the Indians at the signing of Treaties 6 and 7 with the federal government and acted as guide, scout, and chaplain during the Northwest Rebellion in 1885. His missionary career had spanned the transition of the Canadian West from a Hudson's Bay fur-trading empire to a peaceful agricultural settlement, and the Indians' transition from nomads dependent on the buffalo to a new life on the reserves. He died in Calgary on Jan. 15, 1917.

MCDOWELL, WILLIAM FRASER (1858-1937), American bishop, was born at Millersburg, Ohio, Feb. 4, 1858, the son of David A. and Rebecca (Fraser) McDowell. His father, a devoted layman, was a member of the 1904 GENERAL CONFERENCE. Young McDowell was educated at OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY (A.B., 1879, and Ph.D., 1893), and BOSTON UNIVERSITY (S.T.B., 1882). AMERICAN, DENVER, NORTHWESTERN, Ohio Wesleyan, Vermont, and WESLEYAN UNIVERSITIES conferred honorary degrees on him—D.D., LL.D., and L.H.D. He married Clotilda Lyon, Calion, Ohio, the daughter of a Methodist minister, Sept. 20, 1882. They had one daughter, Olive, who died while still a young woman. Mrs. McDowell, president of the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY (ME), 1908-21, died Dec. 27, 1930.

McDowell was admitted to the NORTH OHIO CONFERENCE in 1882, and was ordained DEACON in 1883 and ELDER in 1886. He served three churches in the conference:

Lodi, 1882-83; Oberlin, 1883-85; and Tiffin, 1885-90. In the latter year he was named Chancellor of the University of Denver, serving nine years. While in that position he delivered the first series of university extension lectures ever given in the state, using the subject, "Some Studies in the French Revolution." Also, while in Denver he served on the state board of charities and correction.

In 1899 McDowell became Corresponding Secretary of the BOARD OF EDUCATION (ME). In 1900 he was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE from the COLORADO CONFERENCE, and in 1904 he led the North Ohio Conference delegation to the General Conference. At that time he was elected bishop and served in CHICAGO, 1904-16; and in WASHINGTON, D. C., 1916-32, retiring in the latter year. In 1910-11 he made episcopal visits to INDIA, CHINA, JAPAN, and the PHILIPPINES.

Widely recognized as a great preacher, McDowell was invited to deliver the prestigious Lyman Beecher Lectures on Preaching at Yale Divinity School in 1917. He gave the following lectures at educational institutions: Cole, VANDERBILT, 1910; Mendenhall, DEPAUW, 1922; Merrick, Ohio Wesleyan, 1926; Earl, Pacific School of Religion, 1926; Alumni, GAMMON, 1927; Wilkin, WESLEY FOUNDATION, Illinois, 1928; and Drew at Drew, 1933. When in his eightieth year, just two months before his death, McDowell delivered a series of lectures at BOSTON UNIVERSITY which were later published under the title, In All His Offices. Commenting on the man and the occasion, President DANIEL L. MARSH said, "After eleven years, I do not recall that I ever witnessed anything quite comparable to that week at Boston University. Bishop McDowell had the spirit of a patriarch and the bearing of a kindly king. Students wept unashamed. After each lecture, students gathered and talked in a reverent and subdued manner about the things the great bishop had said." Bishop EDWIN H. HUGHES said McDowell was the "most distinctive in manner and speech" of all the bishops, and added, "He specialized in the devotional life. His prayers swung us into God's orbit. His benedictions became equal to a complete service." Others declared that there was hardly a speaker on the American platform in McDowell's day who could equal him in the power to sway an audience.

McDowell was dedicated to the cause of the union of American Methodism and he gave much time and energy to it. He served on his own denomination's commission on union from 1916 until his death in 1937. After the death of Bishop EARL CRANSTON in 1932, McDowell was chairman of the commission. In referring to McDowell's contribution, Bishop JOHN M. MOORE called him "that prince of men, that master of assemblies, that apostle of union, that untiring toiler in the creation of an acceptable and adequate plan of union." Edwin H. Hughes declared that at a meeting of the joint commission in LOUISVILLE, Bishop McDowell "lay in agonized wakefulness until five o'clock in the morning" praying and pondering a solution to the race issue in relation to Methodist union. When the PLAN OF UNION was completed, Bishop McDowell considered it a high privilege to present it to the 1936 General Conference for adoption.

Tall and dignified in bearing, McDowell was impressive in appearance. He looked the part of a church leader, and he always brought statesmanlike qualities to bear on ecclesiastical problems. He was at home in any company; in conversation his wit was brilliant. Withal he was humble. He said, "When I hear men talk about the bishop being the 'chief minister,' and 'chief pastor,' I always think not of the word 'chief' but of being chief 'minister,' chief 'pastor' to my brethren."

Between 1910 and 1933 Bishop McDowell wrote eight books: In the School of Christ, A Man's Religion, Good Ministers of Jesus Christ (Yale Lectures), This Mind, Making a Personal Faith, That I May Save Some, Them He Also Called, and Father and Brethren.

On Sunday April 25, 1937, Bishop McDowell preached at Morganton, N. C., and died the next day in Washington, D. C. A funeral service was held at Foundry Church with Bishops McConnell and Hughes as the principal speakers. There was a second service in the chapel at Ohio Wesleyan University with President EDMUND D. SOPER in charge. Burial was in Delaware, Ohio. A handsomely carved pulpit was later installed in the historic Foundry Church in memory of Bishop McDowell.

McFARLAND, JOHN THOMAS (1851-1913), American minister, educator and editor, was born at Mt. Vernon, Ind., on Jan. 2, 1851. His family moved to Iowa in 1853 and he soon enrolled in the preparatory department of IOWA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, where he remained until his senior college year. After a year at the BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, he served as student pastor in the IOWA CONFERENCE (ME) before returning to Boston University, from which he was graduated in 1878. Accepted into the Iowa Conference, he served a year at Eddyville and in 1879 filled the combined position of the University charge, Mount Pleasant, and adjunct professor of natural science at Iowa Wesleyan. In 1880 he was transferred to the CENTRAL ILLINOIS CONFERENCE for a year each at Elmwood and Peoria. Returning to Iowa Wesleyan in 1882 as Vice President and Professor of Belles Letters and History, he was elected President in 1884. His dynamic leadership until 1891 increased the endowment fund, raised the enrollment, expanded the science and music curricula, developed the museum and laboratories, and initiated work on the Hall of Science and Chapel. He attracted attention in national educational circles and served as a delegate to the 1885 GENERAL CONFERENCE and the 1891 ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE.

In 1891 he returned to pastoral work in the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE; in 1895 in the NEW YORK EAST CONFERENCE at the New York Avenue Church, BROOKLYN, and in the KANSAS CONFERENCE at First Church, TOPEKA, 1899-1904. In 1905 he became Corresponding Secretary of the SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION and Tract Society, and in 1909 Editor of the Sunday School Publications. To the task of editing multiple materials for a vast circulation change, he brought learning, insight and flexibility in spite of criticism from ultra conservative areas of the church. He died at Maplewood, N. J. on Dec. 22, 1913. During his career he received an honorary D.D. from the UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC in 1885, an LL.D. from SIMPSON in 1903 and an L.H.D. from Iowa Wesleyan in 1905.

McFERRIN, JAMES (1784-1840), American pioneer preacher, was born in Washington County, Va., March 25, 1784, of Irish Presbyterian ancestry. He was brought up as a farmer. At age twenty he married, settling in Rutherford County, Tenn.

James McFerrin was a captain in the War of 1812 under General Andrew Jackson; and subsequently suffered great privations in the campaign against the Creek Indians. He was elected Colonel and for several years led the best-trained regiment of state troops.

In 1820 he was converted and immediately began to preach. He was admitted to the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE Nov. 25, 1823. His ministry was in ALABAMA after 1828, and in western TENNESSEE after 1834. He filled a number of prominent appointments and traveled extensively. He reported the following in 1839: "Since I joined the Conference, I have preached 2,080 times, baptized 573 adults and 813 infants, and have taken into society 3,965 members." As a preacher he was somewhat peculiar in his manner, but possessed an indescribable influence over the multitude. He had three sons who entered the ministry. One was JOHN BERRY McFERRIN, able Southern leader. James McFerrin died in Tipton County, Tenn., Sept. 4, 1840.

JOHN B. McFERRIN

McFERRIN, JOHN BERRY (1807-1887), American preacher, editor, and administrator, was born June 15, 1807 in Rutherford County, Tenn. His father, JAMES McFERRIN, was a Methodist preacher who, before his conversion, had been a farmer and soldier, having served as an officer with General Andrew Jackson in the Creek Indian war.

John McFerrin was converted in 1820, and the next year at the age of fourteen he was called on more and more frequently to deliver prayer during meetings. At sixteen he was appointed a CLASS LEADER, gaining from this experience what he called the best theological training ever organized by the Methodists.

At Cambridge, Ark., Oct. 8, 1825, McFerrin was publicly examined, licensed to preach, and recommended for admission on trial as a traveling preacher in the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE. He was assigned to Franklin Circuit, and delivered his first sermon at Tuscumbia, Ala., as northern ALABAMA was then a part of the Tennessee Conference.

After his ordination as DEACON by Bishop JOSHUA SOULE, McFerrin was sent as a missionary to the Cherokee Indians—a highly responsible assignment to be laid on the shoulders of a young man not yet twenty years old. He preached and conducted a school for the Indian children until 1829, when he was ordained by Bishop ROBERTS and assigned to the Limestone Circuit in north Alabama. He was only twenty-four when he was appointed to Huntsville (Ala.) Station. From there he went to NASHVILLE, Tenn.

Despite his protests about being unready for its responsibilities, McFerrin was appointed presiding elder for the Florence (Ala.) District in 1836. In 1837 he was named presiding elder of the Cumberland District in TENNESSEE.

McFerrin was transferred from the pastorate to the editorial field in 1840, when he was asked to edit the Christian Advocate. What was intended as a temporary assignment lasted for eighteen years.

When the split between the Northern and Southern Methodists occurred in 1844, McFerrin supported the position of the South, and provided strong guidance in the organization of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South.

Its General Conference in 1858 elected McFerrin Book AGENT, a post he served effectively.

With the outbreak of the War Between the States, he was placed in charge of all Methodist missionary work in the Army of Tennessee (C. S. A.), frequently preaching to the troops.

In 1866 at the General Conference held in New ORLEANS, which practically reorganized the M. E. Church, South following the war, he was elected Secretary of Domestic Missions. When this post was combined with that of Secretary of Foreign Missions in 1870, McFerrin won the election to head the work of the Missions board.

For eight years he was Secretary of the BOARD OF MISSIONS, until he was returned to the post of Book Agent at a time when the department was in grave financial difficulties. His experienced management enabled the department to regain its former strength and extend its influence.

An honor that stood out for McFerrin was his election as a delegate to the 1881 ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in LONDON. He also attended the important CENTENNIAL of AMERICAN METHODISM held in 1884 at BALTIMORE, Md.

So beloved was McFerrin that even in 1886, when his hearing and sight had failed very much, he was named overwhelmingly as the leader of the Tennessee delegation to the General Conference, where he was again elected as Book Agent.

This big, sharp-featured man with prodigious memory and rapier-like wit sat in more General Conferences and occupied connexional offices longer than any man of his day. He was widely known for his ability as a rough-and-tumble debater, and rarely was he defeated.

Although he was best known for his work as an administrator, McFerrin excelled as a preacher. His distinctive, somewhat nasal voice and simple, direct style created a deep impression on his listeners.

One example of the effect McFerrin's preaching had on people is seen in the fact that when U.S. President JAMES KNOX POLK was dying, he sent for J. B. McFerrin. Polk had never before united with a church, but had been Methodist in sentiment since hearing McFerrin preach at a CAMP MEETING in 1833. At the request of the dying ex-President, McFerrin baptized him and received him into the church. When Polk died June 15, 1849, McFerrin delivered the sermon at the funeral.

John B. McFerrin died on May 10, 1887, and was buried in Nashville, Tenn.

MacGEARY, JOHN SAMUEL (1853-1931), a missionary bishop of the FREE METHODIST CHURCH, was born near PITTSBURGH, Pa. In early life he taught in rural schools. Converted when about twenty-two years of age, he joined the M. E. Church, and later the Free Methodist Church. Called to the ministry, he was admitted to the Genesee Conference in 1876. He was a charter member of the Pittsburgh Conference, 1883, where he served as pastor and superintendent, and also a charter member of the Oil City Conference of 1899. He served as field secretary for GREENVILLE COLLEGE for several years. In 1911 he was elected the first (and only) missionary bishop of the Free Methodist Church. He travelled in INDIA, CHINA, JAPAN and Africa. He was General Missionary Secretary, 1915-19; pastor and district elder of the California Conference until his death at Oakland, Calif., Jan. 20, 1931. He was the author of: Outline History of Free Methodist Church. He was Corresponding Editor of The Free Methodist for twenty-two years. John S. MacGeary was a progressive thinker, aggressive church builder, and outstanding pulpiteer.

McGEHEE, EDWARD (1786-1880), prominent American layman of early MISSISSIPPI and LOUISIANA, was born in November 1786 in GEORGIA, but went into Mississippi and settled in Wilkinson County when he was quite a young man. He became wealthy and was a benefactor of the Colonization Society and the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY, and established an academy near his home. He gave largely to CENTENARY COLLEGE when that was founded.

He came to NEW ORLEANS with Mark Moore and WILLIAM WINANS in 1819, and helped to secure a preaching place for these Methodist ministers in the loft of a flour inspector's office. Later on he gave some $40,000 for the church which was first known as Poydras Street, and later Carondelet Street. The official title of the latter church was in time fixed as "The McGehee M. E. Church, South."

Judge McGehee, as he became, served in the Mississippi legislature and was, it is said, offered the place of Secretary of the United States Treasury by Zachary Taylor, then President. McGehee, however, declined to so serve. His handsome residence, Bowling Green, near Woodville, Miss., was burned during the Civil War. He helped to build the first railroad and first cotton factory in the deep South, and is said to have invented the cattle guards which kept cattle from attempting to go upon the railroad trestles and bridges of that day. He was the last survivor of a family of thirteen children, his brothers Abner, Abram, John, and William becoming planters in Mississippi and Louisiana.

Judge McGehee died on Oct. 1, 1880. A memorial sermon was delivered by Bishop JOHN C. KEENER at the Carondelet Street Church on October 31 of that year. Although one son, Micajah, died in an untimely way, the Judge was survived by seven children and many grandchildren.

McGOVERN, GEORGE STANLEY (1922-), United States senator and member of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, was born in Avon, S. D., on July 19, 1922, the son of Joseph C. and Frances (McLean) McGovern. He was educated at DAKOTA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY and NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, from which he received the M.A. degree in 1949 and the Ph.D. in 1953. His wife was Eleanor Stegeberg, whom he married on Oct. 31, 1943, and they have five children.

For a time Senator McGovern taught history and political science at Dakota Wesleyan University, but in 1956 he was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives from the First District of his state. He was the Food-for-Peace Director in the Kennedy Administration, 1960-62; and was elected a member of the U.S. Senate from SOUTH DAKOTA in 1963. He served as a pilot of the U.S. Air Force in the second World War, and was decorated with the Distinguished Flying Cross. He is the author of The Colorado Coal Strike, 1913-14, 1953; War Against Want, 1965. He was a candidate for nomination as the Democratic nominee for the Presidency of the United States at the 1968 Democratic Convention, and that same summer served as a delegate to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES meeting at UPPSALA, SWEDEN. In 1972 he was the Democratic candidate for the Presidency but was defeated by Richard Nixon.

McINTYRE, ROBERT (1851-1914), American bishop, was born in Selkirk, SCOTLAND, of solid Presbyterian parents, on Nov. 20, 1851. His father was a weaver and brought his family to PHILADELPHIA in America in 1858. His mother died not long after this move, and the father married again, but died, leaving the support of the family to Robert who was then seventeen. The future bishop learned the trade of bricklayer and, at the age of twenty, moved the family to CHICAGO where the great fire just at that time made his services much in demand. McIntyre never forgot his laboring days, and kept a trowel hung in his office the rest of his life as a reminder.

Becoming a book salesman, he was converted in a revival meeting in St. Louis and decided for the ministry. He was received into the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE in 1878, and his unusual preaching ability opened to him some of the largest churches in the Conference. Leaving the Illinois Conference, he became pastor of Trinity Church in DENVER, St. James in Chicago, and finally the great First Church, LOS ANGELES, which almost doubled its membership in the six years of his ministry. He always drew great congregations to his churches and was likewise a popular lecturer. He had an unusual gift for painting word pictures, some of them becoming famous, and his early background made him sympathetic to social problems and kept him in touch with common people. He was judged by many to be the greatest Methodist preacher of his day.

He attended VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY for one year and was given the D.D. degree by the UNIVERSITY OF DENVER in 1896. In 1908 he was elected to the episcopacy of the

M. E. Church, but served only a few months more than six years. While on his official journeys, he was taken acutely ill in Chicago and died there on Aug. 30, 1914. He lies buried in Inglewood, Los Angeles.

The following incident is told of Robert McIntyre, indicative of his character: Once when Bishop WARREN was presiding over the SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE, a minister guilty of a very serious indiscretion was required to stand before the brethren to be reprimanded by the Bishop. There he stood alone in humiliation before the bar of the Conference, while Bishop Warren with trembling voice visited the rebuke upon him. Unexpectedly, a brother minister arose, went forward and took his stand close beside the offending brother as if he would share with him his shame. As a result of the unmeditated, Christlike deed, the Bishop and the entire Conference were in an instant weeping. Such a man was Robert McIntyre. "When he came to Los Angeles he was known as Robert McIntyre, the orator; when he left he was known as Robert McIntyre, the saint."

McKAY, ORVILLE HERBERT (1913-), American minister and seminary president, was born at Crosswell, Mich., on Oct. 9, 1913. His parents were Herbert Washington and Iva M. (Perry) McKay. He was educated at ASBURY COLLEGE, receiving the A.B. in 1934; at DREW UNIVERSITY, B.D., 1937, and the Ph.D., 1941; and did post-graduate work at OXFORD, England, in the summer of 1949. ADRIAN COLLEGE awarded him the D.D. degree in 1962. He was awarded an S.T.D. by MACMURRAY COLLEGE in 1965, and LL.D. by MCKENDREE COLLEGE in 1966. His wife was Mabel Coppock, whom he married on Aug. 19, 1935, and they had three children.

Dr. McKay joined the DETROIT CONFERENCE and was ordained DEACON in 1936 and came into full connection and was ordained ELDER in 1938. He served as associate minister at the Nardin Park Church, Detroit, 1941-43, and 1946-47; was the minister of First Church, Highland Park, Mich., 1947-51; First Church, Midland, Mich., 1951-65, in which year he was elected president of GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY at Evanston, Ill. He has been the chairman of the Board of Hospitals and Homes of the Detroit Conference; the chairman of the Board of the Ministry of that Conference and a member of its Commission on Ecumenical Affairs, and on that of The Methodist Church since 1965; and The General BOARD OF EDUCATION of the Church. He was a delegate to the North Central JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE, 1956, '60, '68; and to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1960 and '64, '66 and '68. He was chaplain of the U.S. Army Air Force, 1943-45.

McKAY, WILLIAM JOHN (1847-1921), American preacher, born at Belfast, Ireland, May 29, 1847. At five years of age he came to the United States where he lived in Port Washington, Horicon and near DeSoto, in WISCONSIN.

At seventeen years of age, he enlisted in the Fourth Wisconsin Infantry and served during the last year of the Civil War. He was converted and at once felt the call to preach, in answer to which he joined the WEST WISCON-SIN CONFERENCE in 1870. His appointments included Mt. Sterling, LaCrosse, Eau Claire and Madison and he was also presiding elder of the Eau Claire and Madison Districts. He was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCES of the M. E. Church in 1884, 1888 and 1896.

LAWRENCE COLLEGE of Appleton, Wisconsin conferred upon him the honorary D.D. degree in 1895. Besides his Conference activities, he was very active in the affairs of the Grand Army of the Republic and was for many years Commander of the G.A.R. Post in Madison, Wis. He was a man of great effectiveness in prayer and one who made a deep impress on his Conference.

McKECHNIE, COLIN CAMPBELL (1821-1896), British PRIMITIVE METHODIST, was born at Paisley, SCOTLAND. He began his ministry in the Primitive Methodist Church in Ripon, Yorkshire, and continued his years of circuit ministry in the Sunderland district until 1870. During this period he inaugurated the Sunderland Ministerial Association for the stimulation of ministerial studies, and this movement spread throughout Primitive Methodism. In 1855 he became the editor of the Christian Ambassador (founded in 1854, the forerunner of the Primitive Methodist Quarterly Review), and continued in the post until his death. He was general connexional editor from 1876 to 1887. Deeply interested in ministerial education, he was the first secretary of the SUNDERLAND THEOLOGICAL INSTITUTION founded in 1868, the earliest Primitive Methodist experiment with a theological college, later superseded by Hartley College at MANCHESTER. In 1880 he was elected President of the Primitive Methodist Conference. He was also responsible, in 1892, for the revision of WILLIAM ANTLIFF's Life of the Venerable Hugh Bourne. He died in September, 1896.

JOHN T. WILKINSON

WILLIAM MCKENDREE

MCKENDREE, WILLIAM (1757-1835), the first native American bishop, was born on July 6, 1757, in King William County, Va., the son of John and Mary McKendree.

He served in the Revolutionary War and was present at the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown.

He was reared in the Anglican faith but joined a Methodist society when he was about nineteen years old. Ten years later he was converted under the preaching of JOHN EASTER. He was received on trial in the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE in 1788 and appointed with Philip Cox to the Mecklenburg Circuit. His succeeding annual appointments until 1794 were the Cumberland, Portsmouth, Amelia, Greenville, and Norfolk Circuits.

For four years his presiding elder was JAMES O'KELLY, who became disaffected and withdrew to form a separate body called the REPUBLICAN METHODIST CHURCH. When the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1792 refused to adopt O'Kelly's resolution providing for an appeal by any preacher who was dissatisfied with his appointment, McKendree went with him for a brief period and declined to take a circuit for one year. Then he traveled briefly with Bishop ASBURY and became convinced that O'Kelly was in error, and again took his place in the Conference. In 1795 he served the Bedford Circuit and the following year he became a presiding elder, a post which he filled for eleven years until he was elected bishop.

In 1801 he was sent to the KENTUCKY District of the vast WESTERN CONFERENCE, which covered OHIO, KENTUCKY, TENNESSEE, WESTERN VIRGINIA and part of ILLINOIS. He later served two years on the Cumberland District. Thus he became identified with the western area.

In 1808 he was asked to preach before the General Conference, although unknown to most of its members. So powerful was his deliverance that Asbury predicted his election as bishop, a prophecy which was fulfilled a few days later.

As a bishop he introduced some new features which did not meet with Asbury's wholehearted approval. One of these was consultation with the presiding elders in making the appointments, from which emerged the "CABINET," which persisted in the Church. Another was a formal report to the General Conference, which gave rise to the EPISCOPAL ADDRESS at all succeeding conferences. McKendree usually traveled with Asbury and the latter made the appointments, but at the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE in 1815, the aging bishop said, "My eyes fail. I will resign the stations to Bishop McKendree—I will take away my feet." McKendree was then practically alone in the episcopacy, for Asbury did not hold another conference and died the following March.

McKendree did not have much formal education but he became a great preacher and ecclesiastical statesman. In 1820 he opposed vigorously a movement in the General Conference to limit the power of the bishops in assigning the preachers to their charges.

Because of physical infirmities he was largely relieved of his work after 1820 but he continued to travel over the connexion and assist in the superintendency until his death. In 1830 he gave 480 acres of land to the Lebanon Seminary in Illinois, and its name was changed to MCKENDREE COLLEGE.

He died at the home of his brother, Dr. James McKendree, in Sumner County, Tenn., on March 5, 1835. He was buried nearby, but his body was later transferred to the campus of VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY at Nashville.

MCKENDREE CHAPEL

MCKENDREE CHAPEL, three miles east of Jackson, Missouri, was designated as a Methodist Historic Shrine by the 1960 GENERAL CONFERENCE. Built in 1819, it is the oldest Methodist and the oldest Protestant church building west of the Mississippi River.

In 1801, William Williams, a Methodist layman, moved from Kentucky to Missouri and soon set aside two acres of his farm to be used for CAMP MEETINGS. The site was first used for that purpose probably in 1806. A Methodist class or congregation was organized there in 1809. Williams served as class leader from the beginning until his death in 1838. Bishop WILLIAM MCKENDREE attended a camp meeting there in 1818, and the chapel which was begun that year was named for him. The Missouri Conference met in the chapel in 1819, its first session west of the River. Also, the conference convened in the chapel in 1821, 1826, and 1831, an indication that McKendree was an important church with an adequate building for that period.

When the M. E. Church divided over slavery in 1844, a majority of the McKendree Chapel members voted to adhere South, but the pastor on the charge, Nelson Henry, strongly favoring the Church North, managed to align the chapel with that body. As time passed the Church North grew weaker in the region and the chapel regularly received missionary aid. About 1890 it ceased to exist as an organized church. However, the building was not forgotten. In September 1910, the ST. LOUIS CONFERENCE (MES) met in Jackson and took occasion to go out in a body and hold a special session in the old chapel. In 1916, the same conference met in Cape Girardeau and went out to conduct a service at McKendree Chapel commemorating the organization of the MISSOURI CONFERENCE in 1816.

In 1925, William Stewart was appointed pastor at New McKendree Church, Jackson. Finding Old McKendree in desolation and disrepair, he led a movement for its restoration. He aroused the interest of the St. Louis Conference (ME), and in 1926 that body voted to deed a one-half interest in the chapel to the M. E. Church, South with the request that it appoint one-half of the trustees and share in the upkeep of the property. Laymen donated money and physical labor to clean up the grounds and repair and restore the chapel. A right of way from the public road to the chapel was purchased. In time a steel canopy was built over the chapel, and later still a home for a curator was erected on the grounds. Since 1933 an annual service of commemoration featuring an outstanding speaker has been conducted at the chapel with several hundred people attending.

Singularly, Old McKendree Chapel might not have survived had not Nelson Henry managed to keep it in the hands of the minority of members who adhered North in 1845. Also, it is significant that the new deed for the chapel dated July 22, 1927, providing that thereafter half the trustees would be members of the Church South, became a point of reunion of the two churches formed by the division of the M. E. Church in 1844.

MCKENDREE COLLEGE, Lebanon, Illinois, was opened in 1828 as Lebanon Seminary with EDWARD R. AMES, later a bishop, as the principal, and with a Miss McMurphy as the other teacher. In 1830, the name was changed to McKendree College in honor of Bishop WILLIAM MCKENDREE. He later deeded 480 acres of rich Shiloh Valley land to the college.

The legislature of the State of Illinois granted a charter to McKendree College on Feb. 9, 1835. A second charter, more detailed, under which the college still operates, was approved by the state legislature on Jan. 26, 1839. The first three members of the faculty were graduates of Wesleyan University. PETER CARTWRIGHT was an active supporter of the college and served as chairman of its board of trustees. PETER AKERS, an able preacher of the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE, was its first president, and was recalled to the office on two later occasions.

The institution has limited accreditation by the UNIVERSITY SENATE of The United Methodist Church. It offers the B.A. and B.S. degrees. The governing board has thirty-six members, a majority of whom must be active members of The United Methodist Church: twelve elected by the Southern Illinois Conference, twenty-four elected by the board but confirmed by the Southern Illinois Conference.

MCKENZIE, JOHN WITHERSPOON PETTIGREW (1806-1881), American preacher and educator, was born on April 26, 1806 in Burke County, N. C. He founded a school at Columbia, Tenn., in 1831 and was admitted to the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE in 1836. He transferred at once to the ARKANSAS CONFERENCE and his first appointment was to the Choctaw Indians in what was later Indian Territory. In 1839 he was appointed to a circuit extending from western ARKANSAS to Preston Bend, near Denison on Red River in the Republic of TEXAS. In 1841 he started a small school in a log house with sixteen children, the beginning of McKenzie College located near Clarksville, Texas. In a few years the school became the most prosperous and vigorous institution in the southwest, if not west of the Mississippi River, during the period up to the Civil War. McKenzie continued to preach on request and officiated at many weddings, funerals, and church dedications, but his major work was conducting the school. Originally the school was chiefly a preparatory one but in 1845 a "female department" and a "collegiate department" were added. In 1848 the first A.B. degree was conferred. By 1846 there were sixty-three students and in 1848 eighty-six were reported in the college, with even more in the preparatory department. By 1859-60 there were 405 students taught by nine faculty members. The war years cut enrollment, and severe economic conditions, plus McKenzie's advancing age, resulted in the closing of the school in 1868. A total of about 3,300 students attended the school, and McKenzie reported that about 2,200 of these "made public profession of religion" while there. Many of the later leaders in the area and the state attended the college. In 1853 four large new buildings, erected at a cost of $30,000 provided almost unrivaled facilities among nineteenth century schools, at least in the South and the Southwest. In 1878 McKenzie was awarded an honorary D.D. degree by EMORY College (now UNIVERSITY). He died on June 20, 1881.

MACKENZIE, PETER (1824-1895), British Wesleyan Methodist evangelist and humorist, was born at Glenshee, Perthshire, SCOTLAND, Nov. 11, 1824, but migrated to England to become a pitman in Haswell Colliery, Durham. He was converted in 1849. He entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1859 and, after many successful years in a number of circuits, was in 1886 relieved of circuit work for work in the connection at large. In great demand as a preacher because of his racy, humorous style, he is described on his epitaph at Dewsbury, Yorkshire, as "the Greatheart of Methodism." He died on Nov. 21, 1895.

H. MORLEY RATTENBURY

MCKINLEY, WILLIAM (1843-1901), the twenty-fourth President of the United States of America and a staunch Methodist, was born in Miles, OHIO on Jan. 29, 1843. At the age of ten he was baptized and received into membership in the M. E. Church by the Rev. Aaron D. Morton. During the American Civil War he served with distinction in the Northern Army, rising from a private to the rank of major. Following the war he studied law and in 1867 opened an office in Canton, Ohio. Here he met and in 1871 married Ida Saxton. They had two children who died in infancy. While in Canton, McKinley was active in the local M. E. Church and for a time served as superintendent of the church school. The pew he occupied in First Church, Canton, is specially marked by an appropriate metal plate.

In 1876 McKinley was elected to the Congress of the United States as a representative from Ohio. Defeated in 1882, he was re-elected in 1884. All together he served six two-year terms between 1876 and 1890. As a congressman he was known for his advocacy of a high protective tariff. In 1890 he sponsored a tariff bill bearing his name which became law. While a congressman McKinley and his wife attended the Foundry M. E. Church in WASHINGTON, D. C. In 1891 he ran for governor of Ohio and was elected.

In 1896 McKinley was nominated by the Republican Party for the office of President of the United States. In the election he defeated his Democratic opponent, William Jennings Bryan, and was inaugurated on March 4, 1897. In 1900 he was re-elected. During his first administration the United States engaged in a brief war with Spain. As a result of this war the PHILIPPINES, GUAM, and PUERTO RICO were ceded to the United States and the island of CUBA became an independent country. While President, McKinley attended the Metropolitan M. E. Church, the national Methodist church which had been erected during the administration of ULYSSES S. GRANT by contributions from Methodists throughout the country. His pastors during this time were HUGH M. JOHNSTON and FRANK M. BRISTOL.

Included among his private papers is a signed statement declaring: "My belief embraces the Divinity of Christ and a recognition of Christianity as the mightiest factor in the world's civilization." In Buffalo, N. Y., on Sept. 6, 1901, William McKinley was shot by Leon Czolgosz. Eight days later he died. He is buried in Canton, Ohio.

MCKINNEY, JOHN WESLEY (? -1946), sixteenth bishop of the C.M.E. Church, was born in Texas. He received his education at Prairie View Normal School and Austin College. He began preaching in 1883 and served as a local preacher for several years before entering the itinerant ministry. McKinney served as pastor, presiding elder, and Secretary of Church Extension before being elected to the office of bishop by the General Conference in 1922. He and Bishop ROBERT TURNER BROWN led in the establishment of a church in Trinidad, WEST INDIES. Bishop McKinney was noted as a man of conviction and high moral standards. He retired in 1942 and died on Aug. 28, 1946.

MACKINNON, SALLIE LOU (1889-1973), American missionary and Mission Board executive, was born at Maxton, N. C., on Oct. 27, 1889, the daughter of Alexander James and Virginia Lee Mackinnon.

She graduated from RANDOLPH-MACON WOMAN'S COLLEGE, 1911, and at SCARRITT Biblical Institute (then in Kansas City, Mo.). She volunteered and was sent to CHINA, where she served as a missionary under the BOARD of MISSIONS of the M. E. Church, South, for ten or twelve years. She then became the executive secretary of the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. E. Church, South, whose headquarters then were in NASHVILLE, Tenn. After the unification of Methodism in 1939-40, she went to New York City where she served as executive secretary for China, Africa and Europe under the Woman's Division of Christian Service of The Methodist Church. Later with the changing situation in China, she remained in charge of Africa and Europe for the Woman's Division. She retired in 1956, and after living in Nashville, Tenn., for several years, took up her residence in the Brooks Howell Home in ASHEVILLE, N. C., in 1964. In her tenure as executive secretary, she served on many important committees and was quite influential in interdenominational and international mission groups in their wider plans and moves.

She died in Asheville on March 16, 1973.

McKNIGHT, GEORGE (? -1813 or 1814), American pioneer layman, at whose home on the Yadkin River in NORTH CAROLINA, the three important frontier conferences of 1789, 1790, and 1791 were held, was one of the earliest settlers on the Yadkin River. His land grant is dated 1762, and there is evidence that he had occupied the land near the mouth of Linville Creek, where the Great Wagon Road from PENNSYLVANIA crossed, at least as early as 1758.

In the years before the Revolutionary War he was connected with the MORAVIANS of the Wachovia settlement, and opened his house to them for preaching in English. Sometime about 1783 a Methodist society was organized in his community, and in 1786 Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY found a living society there, and a chapel at McKnight's. Located just below where the Yadkin turns south, the place was admirably located for gathering the preachers from all directions, and Asbury took full advantage of it.

The 1789 Conference was attended by the preachers from the Holston country of East TENNESSEE, who crossed the mountains by way of the Flower Gap. "We had weighty matters for consideration before us," wrote Asbury. The most important such matter was the launching of the Arminian Magazine, which the BOOK STEWARD, JOHN DICKINS, edited and published at PHILADELPHIA. The preface to the first volume was signed by Asbury and THOMAS COKE at "North Carolina, April 10, 1789."

After the 1791 Conference the growing Methodism on the Holston side of the mountains made conferences there desirable, and McKnight's faded into the background.

The home and chapel of McKnight were located about where the present U. S. Highway 158 crosses the first branch east of the Yadkin River just south of the Interstate 40. It is now in Forsyth County, but at the time of George McKnight it was in Rowan County, almost on the Surry County line. McKnight died at the home of a son-in-law in Surry County in 1813 or 1814.

In 1808 and 1809 the society there, led by McKnight's sons and sons-in-law, built a new church by the name of Mt. Pleasant, some two miles to the south. This, in turn, gave way to a church and school at Clemmons, a mile east of the original site. The old Mt. Pleasant, however, has been restored and stands as a shrine in Tangelwood Park, a public park donated by some of the Reynolds family of that section.

McLAUGHLIN, JOHN RUSSELL (1905-), American minister, and general secretary of the Commission on Chaplains, was born at Blue Mound, Kan., May 24, 1905, son of William and Mattie (King) McLaughlin.

He received the A.B. degree from BAKER UNIVERSITY in 1930, and was awarded the D.D. degree by Baker in 1952. From DREW UNIVERSITY he received the B.D. degree in 1932 and the M.A. degree in 1934. He pursued postgraduate study at Columbia University, 1934-35; at GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, 1938-40; and at New York University, 1946-48.

He was admitted on trial into the NEWARK CONFERENCE, M. E. Church, and was ordained DEACON in 1933. He was received into full connection and ordained ELDER in 1935.

His pastorates were: Baldwin, Kan., 1926-28; Edwardsville, Kan., 1929; Woodrow, Staten Island, N. Y., 1932-35; Jersey City, N. J., 1935-41; Leonia, N. J., 1941-49. He was superintendent of North District, Newark Conference, 1949-55. From 1956 for more than two quadrennia he was general secretary, Commission on CHAPLAINS, Washington, D. C. He served to become chaplain-major in the U.S. Army Air Force.

He married Ada Frances Richard on June 10, 1928, and they had two children. She died in Berchtesgaden, Germany, in 1961.

He was married to Iona S. Henry on June 15, 1963. They continue to reside in Washington, D. C.

McLAUGHLIN, WILLIAM PATTERSON (1849-1921), missionary pastor in ARGENTINA, was born in CINCINNATI, Ohio. He was graduated from OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY and BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL of THEOLOGY and entered the OHIO ANNUAL CONFERENCE. After eleven years of service in several churches, McLaughlin and his wife, the former Rebecca Long, accepted an appointment in NEW ORLEANS, LA., where he organized a missionary district among French- and Italian-speaking people. After seven years he accepted the call to South America.

Arriving at Christmas 1892, he served as pastor of First Methodist Church, BUENOS AIRES for twenty-nine years, until his death in February 1921. His pastorate was distinguished by a widening influence and deepened relationships which left enduring marks. His social insights were particularly effective during the years of the First World War. "He went about doing good," are words on a marble monument erected to his memory.

MACLAY, CHARLES (1821-1890), American businessman and Methodist benefactor, joined the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE but in 1851 transferred to the CALIFORNIA. In 1859 he asked for location on medical advice. He prospered in business, and was one of the chief financial supporters of the church. He served in both the State Assembly and Senate from Santa Clara County. His interest in an educated ministry led him to be active in supporting the UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC. Later he endowed the Maclay College of Theology in connection with the University of Southern California.

The collapse of the land boom in that part of the state brought a series of financial crises. Finally the endowment and the university were lost to the church. But Maclay's loyalty to Methodism never wavered. He was one of California's distinguished laymen.

ROBERT S. MACLAY

MACLAY, ROBERT SAMUEL (1824-1907), pioneer missionary of the M. E. Church in CHINA, JAPAN AND KOREA, was born in Concord, Pa., on Feb. 7, 1824. After graduation from DICKINSON COLLEGE in 1845, he was ordained and sailed for China in 1847. His fiancée, Henrietta Caroline Sperry, followed him two years later, and they were married in HONG KONG in 1850. He was appointed superintendent and treasurer of the mission and continued until 1872.

His first plan for developing Methodist work in China was to move steadily westward, from Fukien to Kiangsi, and then to West China and possibly to Tibet. In furtherance of this plan he sent VIRGIL HART and Elbert Todd from Foochow to Kiukiang on the Yangtze River in 1867. But, by the following year, he was ready to sidetrack further westward advance for a time, in favor of establishing work in North China. In 1869, Lucius N. Wheeler and Hiram H. Lowry were sent to Peking to begin work there.

In 1861, Maclay published his interesting book, Life Among the Chinese, and in 1871 he collaborated with

C. C. Baldwin in a massive dictionary of the Chinese language in the dialect of Foochow.

By this time his thought was reaching out even beyond the bounds of China. On Dec. 16, 1870, he wrote to the missionary society, urging that work be established in Japan. The following year he returned to America—his second furlough in twenty-three years—and while away the bishops transferred him to Japan to found the mission he had advocated.

He arrived in Japan in 1873, and was superintendent of that mission until 1888, serving also in Tokyo as president of Ei Wa Gakko, a college which embraced the Anglo-Chinese Academy and the Philander Smith Biblical Institute. He was delegate from Japan to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in London in 1881. While there he made a strong plea for the closest possible cooperation of the various Methodist mission boards throughout the world.

His continuing statesmanlike concern for the whole East Asia area showed itself in a visit to his old home in Foochow in 1881, when he helped to establish the Anglo-Chinese College; and also in a visit to the king of Korea in 1884, when he obtained permission for the establishment of Methodist work in that country.

In 1888, he was ministerial delegate from Japan to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church held in New York. After the Conference he resigned from mission work and became dean of the newly opened Maclay College of Theology in San Fernando, Calif., a post which he held from 1888 to 1893, when he retired.

FRANCIS P. JONES

McLEAN, JOHN (1775-1861), Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, who among other things is remembered for his thirty-one-year tenure on that Court. He was the first Ohioan to become a Justice of the highest court in the land.

A native of Morris County, N. J., born March 11, 1775, he settled with his family in what became Warren County in southwestern Ohio. He worked on the family farm until he was eighteen, then went to CINCINNATI to work in the Hamilton County Clerk of Court's office and to read law. He was admitted to the bar in 1807, and began his practice in Lebanon, county seat of Warren County.

Almost immediately he began his long political career, first as U.S. Congressman in 1812, re-elected in 1814. In 1815 he was elected to the Ohio Supreme Court bench. In 1822, President Monroe named him Commissioner of the General Land Office. The next year he became Postmaster General. Although he disagreed with President Andrew Jackson, Jackson appointed him to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Justice McLean dissented from Chief Justice Roger Taney in the Dred Scott case, holding that slavery "had its origin in power, was contrary to right and upheld only by local law."

His peers described him as "conscientious, thorough, inherently just. . . inclined to reject the opinion of others."

For many years he was a communicant member of the M. E. Church, and one historian said of him, "His private life was in perfect harmony with his profession." He once was president of the American SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.

Despite his lack of formal higher education, four colleges conferred upon Justice McLean the honorary LL.D. degree. Harvard was one and WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in Connecticut another.

A tall and commanding figure, Justice McLean was a man of simple habits; his manners were genial and courteous, and he was distinguished by his intellectual versatility. It was said that he was as regular in attending class meeting as Chief Justice Taney was in attending mass.

Few men in political life enjoyed such broad support. In 1836 the Whigs favored him for presidential nomination; he was considered a possible nominee of the Liberty party in 1848, and later the same year at the Free Soil Convention. In 1856 the Ohio delegation favored him for the presidential nomination at the first national Republican convention. He was of great help in acting as mediator in the suit the Southern Church (MES) brought against the Northern (ME) to obtain its share of the BOOK CONCERN'S worth after the Northern Church had repudiated the PLAN OF SEPARATION which in 1844 had been agreed upon. However when the suit of the South finally came before the Supreme Court, Justice McLean excused himself because he was a Methodist, and let his fellow justices decide the issue—as they did for the South.

He also entered the field of Methodist biography, writing a life of PHILIP GATCH and of JOHN COLLINS.

Justice McLean died April 4, 1861. The next day the Ohio State Journal, Columbus morning newspaper, said: "Justice McLean was a profound jurist, a citizen justly esteemed for his excellent social qualities, and an exemplary Christian."

JOHN F. YOUNG

MACLEAN, JOHN (1851-1928), Canadian Methodist missionary to the Indians and historian, was born in Kilmarnock, SCOTLAND, Oct. 30, 1851, and was educated at the Burgh Academy, Dumbarton. In 1873 he emigrated to CANADA. He attended VICTORIA UNIVERSITY (B.A., 1882; M.A., 1887) and ILLINOIS WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY (Ph.D., 1888).

Received on trial in 1875, he was ordained in the Methodist Church in 1880. From 1880 to 1889 he was a missionary to the Blood Indians near Fort Macleod, in what is now Alberta. During this period he was also a public-school inspector. Subsequently he had pastorates at Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan; Port Arthur, Ontario; Nee-pawa and Winnipeg, in Manitoba; in the last of which he founded the Maclean Mission. In 1895 he was president of the Manitoba Conference, and from 1902 to 1906 he was editor of The Wesleyan. For many years he was the historian of the Manitoba Conference, and from 1918 to 1922 he was archivist of the Methodist Church.

Maclean's interests were extensive. He was a member of the Canadian Institute, the American Folklore Society, and the Manitoba Historical Society. Widely regarded as an authority on the Western Indians, he wrote numerous ethnological pamphlets and a variety of books. These included Canadian Savage Folk (1896), James Evans (1890), and McDougall of Alberta (1927). He did much to interpret and to preserve the culture of the Western tribes and to strengthen Methodism in the prairie provinces.

McLEAN, JOHN H. (1838-1925), American clergyman and educator, was born in Hinds County, Miss. He attended (and taught for two years at) McKenzie College, Clarksville, Texas, and entered EAST TEXAS CONFERENCE in 1860; went into Trinity (later named NORTH TEXAS) Conference when organized in 1867. He served leading churches and districts; was head of Paris Female College, 1869-71; vice-regent of SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY at Georgetown, Texas, 1880-91; and regent, 1891-97. He was manager of Texas Methodist Organization, 1908-12; and a member of the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in Washington, 1891, and in New York in 1901.

McMAHAN CHAPEL, organized in 1833, is the oldest Methodist church and the oldest continuing Protestant congregation in the state of Texas. The chapel is located on Spur 35 two miles south of Route 21 some twelve miles east of San Augustine. There in what was then the San Augustine Municipality of the Mexican Government, Samuel D. McMahan (d. 1854) who came from Tennessee, settled in 1831.

At the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE in Vicksburg, November 1832, James P. Stevenson was appointed to the Sabine Circuit in LOUISIANA, a few miles east of where McMahan had settled. In the spring of 1833 at Nachitoches, La., Stevenson met some Texans who asked him to come across the line and preach to them, even though Protestant services were forbidden in Mexican territory. Assured by the laymen of protection from prosecution, Stevenson went over and held a two-day meeting in a private home near what is now Milam, Texas. McMahan attended the services and invited Stevenson to come and preach at his home also. Stevenson did so, returning several times during the year to hold services. The people requested Stevenson to organize a church, but he, knowing that organizing a Methodist church would be against the law, formed instead in September 1833, a "religious society" of forty-eight members and named McMahan the "CLASS LEADER." Such was the beginning of McMahan Chapel. Then in July 1834, Henry Stephenson, successor of J. P. Stevenson on the Sabine Circuit, formally organized a Methodist society in McMahan's home, and it was soon called McMahan Chapel.

Following the Texas War of Independence in 1836, the McMahan congregation grew rapidly, and there was need for a church building. In December 1838, the Mississippi Conference appointed LITTLETON FOWLER as presiding elder of the Texas Mission District. Fowler built a home near Samuel McMahan's place and made it his headquarters. Also, in 1839 Fowler assisted with the building of a log chapel forty by thirty feet for the McMahan congregation.

The McMahan log structure was replaced by a frame church in 1872, and another of similar material was erected in 1900. The present brick edifice, valued at $49,500, was built in 1949 and was dedicated in 1956 by Bishop A. FRANK SMITH.

The 1970 GENERAL CONFERENCE designated McMahan Chapel as one of the first three official United Methodist Landmarks because of its historic significance.

A cemetery containing the graves of Samuel D. McMahan, Littleton Fowler, and other early Methodist leaders in Texas, adjoins McMahan Chapel. The chapel is the head of a four-point work with the pastor residing in a brick parsonage beside the church. In 1969 McMahan Chapel reported twenty-nine members.

MCMILLAN, ETHEL (?-1954), a New Zealand Methodist missionary sister, was born in Victoria, Australia. After qualifying as a midwife, in 1915 she became a missionary nursing sister under the Methodist Church of Australasia, on the island of Choiseul in the Western Solomons. When the New Zealand Conference took over the Solomon Islands field in 1922, she continued to work on Choiseul for a further twenty years. For a good part of that time she was the only European worker on the island. Hundreds of orphans owe their lives to her unremitting care, and through her influence, hygienic and domestic conditions were revolutionized in many of the villages. She retired in Melbourne, where she died on Jan. 19, 1954.

M'MULLEN, JAMES (17?-1804), British Methodist pioneer missionary to GIBRALTAR, entered the Wesleyan ministry in IRELAND in 1788 and answered an appeal to go to Gibraltar in 1804. The society consisted of about twenty members, both soldiers and civilians. Yellow fever was raging on his arrival, and his wife died almost immediately. He himself visited the sick and preached, but died on Oct. 17, 1804, only a week or so after landing, the first Wesleyan missionary martyr of the European field.

MCMULLEN, WALLACE (1819-1899), Irish minister, was born in Ards, County Down, in the north of IRELAND, and entered the ministry in 1841. He soon showed administrative gifts, and in 1859 he began his connection with Home Mission affairs as Assistant Secretary of the Contingent Fund. His connection with this work lasted until he died, and for the last twenty years of his life he was the General Secretary of the Home Mission Fund. This was the department through which the whole organization and finance of the Irish Methodist Church was guided. He advocated and helped carry through the plan for lay representation in the Irish Conference in 1877. Much of the work for Methodist Union in Ireland in 1878 was his responsibility, and he helped to consolidate united Irish Methodism by his constructive financial genius. As a member of the LEGAL HUNDRED, he was four times called to the highest office in the Church in Ireland, Vice-President of the Conference, in 1874, 1878, 1888 and 1895.

MacMURRAY COLLEGE, Jacksonville, Illinois, was chartered as Illinois Conference Female College in 1846. The name was changed to Illinois Woman's College in 1899, and in 1930 to MacMurray College for Women in honor of the late James E. MacMurray, former Senator from Illinois, whose devotion to the college was reflected by his large gifts. The college is related to the CENTRAL ILLINOIS CONFERENCE. A coordinate college for men was established in 1955. Degrees offered are the B.A., M.Ed. (Education), and M.S. The governing board has thirty-three members; it is self-perpetuating.

McMURRY, WILLIAM FLETCHER (1864-1934), American bishop, was the son of a Methodist preacher, William Wesley McMurry, and was born in Shelby County, Mo., June 29, 1864. His father was a very influential leader in Missouri Methodism and sent his son to St. Charles College (1880-1882) and to CENTRAL COLLEGE at Fayette (1882-1885). A few years after he left Central College he was married to Frances Byrd Davis, Oct. 9, 1888, and they had three children. He was ordained in the M. E. Church, South, in 1886. He held several pastorates between 1886 and 1897 and was a presiding elder from 1897 to 1902. He then became pastor of Centenary Church in St. Louis and served in that important downtown church until 1906. These were the World Fair years in St. Louis and his pastorate at Centenary was one of the most successful evangelistic pastorates in the long history of Missouri Methodism. In 1906 he was elected Secretary of the Board of Church Extension of his denomination and served until 1918, when he was elected a bishop at the GENERAL CONFERENCE in ATLANTA.

His first assignment as bishop took him to the Orient, and then in subsequent years he served several Episcopal areas in Southern Methodism. For years he was President of the Board of Finance of the M. E. Church, South, was a member of the Joint Commission on Unification of American Methodism, and he was twice a delegate to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE, in 1901 and 1921. In addition to his work as bishop he served as President of Central College from 1924 to 1930.

He presided over a great meeting of his Episcopal Area, including the BALTIMORE, the KENTUCKY and the WEST VIRGINIA CONFERENCES, at Staunton, Va., on Jan. 9, 1934. He returned home with an attack of influenza, was taken to Barnes Hospital in St. Louis and died there of a heart attack on the morning of Jan. 19, and he was buried at Shelbyville, Mo., in his native county.

Bishop McMurry, measured by any standard, was a big man. He was as able an administrator as Methodism in the United States ever produced, and he would have gone to the top in any field of endeavor. He was an indefatigable worker, and he demanded of all who served under him the same kind of devoted and energetic work. Because the tasks committed to him by his church required such drives and strength, he seemed at times to be overpowering.

McMURRY COLLEGE, Abilene, Texas, was established in 1920 and named for Bishop WILLIAM F. McMURRY who presided over the conference that ordered the founding. Its founder was James W. Hunt, a minister of the Northwest Texas Conference.

McMurry is the legal and spiritual successor of four educational institutions of West Texas and New Mexico: Stamford College, Clarendon College, Seth Ward College, and Western College of Artesia. McMurry College received the first endowed lectureship given by Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Willson of Floydada, Texas. Willson lectureships have been given by them to thirty educational institutions. Degrees offered are the B.A. and B.S. The governing board has sixty trustees elected by the NORTHWEST TEXAS and NEW MEXICO ANNUAL CONFERENCES.

MACNAUGHTON, NORMAN (1880-1951), American preacher, lecturer and teacher, was born March 3, 1880 in Glengarry, Ontario, CANADA, the son of Alexander and Sarah (McDonald) MacNaughton. He earned his A.B., B.Th., and B.D. degrees at McMaster University, Toronto, Canada, and received the M.A. degree at Yale in 1912. Further graduate work was taken at the University of Chicago, 1925-1929. ADRIAN COLLEGE conferred upon him the degree of LL.D. in 1945.

He married Kathleen Mabel Chalk on Sept. 20, 1910, in Toronto, Canada. He served congregations in New Westminster, British Columbia; Southfield, CHICAGO, Ill.; and Tecumseh, Mich. He joined the Adrian College faculty in 1930, where he held the Chair of Christian Philosophy for twenty years until his retirement in 1950. He was in constant demand as a speaker for various special occasions. As a teacher of college students he had few superiors. The Michigan Christian Advocate said, "Over a period of years his wit, wisdom, and common sense had been a source of inspiration. Dr. MacNaughton was both humble and great in spirit." His conference relationship was with the ILLINOIS and MICHIGAN CONFERENCES of the M. P. CHURCH, and then into the DETROIT CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church at the time of union in 1939. His death occurred July 12, 1951, and he was buried in Adrian.

MACON, GEORGIA, U.S.A. In 1803, white settlers in GEORGIA purchased a tract of land from the Creek Indians. At the top of the hill on the east side of the Ocmulgee River, Fort Hawkins was built, and on the west side, the streets for Macon were laid out. Circuit riders from adjoining territory came to the settlement to preach and hold revivals.

The first Methodist Society was organized in the home of R. R. Evans in 1826. On Dec. 23, 1826, Governor G. M. Thorpe signed a bill passed by the Georgia Legislature, authorizing the Commission appointed to plan the town of Macon, "to lay off a suitable piece of ground for the Methodist Episcopal Church." The granite marker on this building site (which is Mulberry Street Methodist Church) says, "No building has ever stood on this spot except a Methodist Church dedicated to the worship and service of Almighty God." The first building was erected in 1828.

First Macon appointments read: 1827, SOUTH CARO-LINA CONFERENCE, Milledgeville District, Macon and Clinton, Thos. Darly, P.C. In 1828 the circuit was rearranged to read—South Carolina Conference, Milledgeville District, Milledgeville and Macon, Samuel K. Hodges, sup., Charles Hardy. In 1829 Macon was made a station with IGNATIUS A. FEW, preacher-in-charge. At the end of that first year as a station the membership was 120 white and 36 colored.

In 1828 the GENERAL CONFERENCE authorized the South Carolina Conference to be divided, and in January 1829, the division was made at the Savannah River, with the Carolinas in one conference, and GEORGIA with FLORIDA in the other. The GEORGIA CONFERENCE was organized in Macon in January 1830.

WESLEYAN COLLEGE, under the name of Georgia Female College, received its charter from the Legislature of the State of Georgia on Dec. 23, 1836; began construction in 1837; faculty elected in 1838; opened its doors Jan. 7, 1839, and issued the world's first college degrees for women, July 16, 1840, GEORGE F. PIERCE, President. Today Wesleyan College is located on a 240-acre campus and is supported by SOUTH GEORGIA, NORTH GEORGIA, and FLORIDA CONFERENCES and the BOARD OF EDUCATION of The United Methodist Church.

Additional Methodist churches have been organized in Macon, beginning with Vineville, 1849, followed by First Street, East Macon, South Macon, and then Centenary. Today there are twenty-six congregations with 14,710 members out of a population of 118,764 people. The A.M.E., A.M.E. ZION, and C.M.E. CHURCHES are represented in congregations numbering more than 1,000 members. Macon is the strongest Methodist center in South Georgia.

KING VIVION

Mulberry Street Church, Macon, located in the heart of Georgia, in 1826 had a population of about 800 people and this was the third year of the community's life. There were stores, a school, a Masonic lodge hall, a hotel, but no church building. Occasional religious services were held in a temporary court house located on Mulberry Street.

The first regular services of Christian worship began in Macon when a Methodist society was organized in 1826 with seventeen members. Named the "Macon Methodist Episcopal Church," the congregation was a part of the South Carolina Conference.

By special act of the Georgia Legislature a tract of land was granted the young congregation at the corner of Mulberry and First Streets adjacent to, but outside, the city limits. On this site the first building for Christian worship in the City of Macon was erected in 1828. The church has remained on this site during all its life. In the first simple frame structure built there the Georgia Conference, including the churches in Georgia which had formerly been a part of the South Carolina Conference, was organized. Because of this historic event Mulberry Street Church has been known as the "Mother Church of Georgia Methodism." In the year 1847 the name of the church was changed from "Macon Church" to "Mulberry Street Church."

In 1850 a second and larger church building, this one of brick construction and more handsome than the first, was erected. As the congregation grew there was a need for still further expansion, and in 1882 the third sanctuary building was constructed. The walls of this building are still in use.

By the time Mulberry Street Church was ready to celebrate its centennial it had "mothered" eight congregations in the growing city of Macon. At the time of the centennial a new expansion program was begun, and in 1929 a large educational building and a remodelled sanctuary were completed at a cost of $250,000.

The economic depression of the 1930's found the church in serious financial difficulties with a large debt. In 1937 a legal agreement was reached with holders of bonds on the church's debt by which only a portion of the indebtedness was to be paid. But the moral obligation to pay 100 percent of the value of the bonds was never forgotten by the church, and in 1945 this was done. The dedication of the educational building followed. In the early 1950's plans were made and funds raised for a new activities building, a chapel, a new organ, and the renovation of the sanctuary. Before the end of that decade the task was completed at a cost of more than $400,000, and in 1960 the Stevens-Taylor Chapel was dedicated.

On an April morning in 1965 a disastrous fire destroyed all but the walls of Mulberry's sanctuary. With courage and devotion the congregation made plans for rebuilding. The new construction was done within the same walls of the old sanctuary and was completed in 1968 at a cost of $560,000.

Through the years the Mulberry congregation has sought to set a pace for the churches which it has sponsored in evangelism, missions, education, social concerns, and stewardship. At a time when the growth of cities and suburban churches has weakened many congregations in the downtown areas, Mulberry has maintained a vigorous strength and leadership.

In 1970 it reported 2,091 members, property valued at $2,469,458, and $134,940 raised for all purposes.

Swift Creek Church, situated in Bibb County, near Macon, is an old country church which was founded in 1867. It was organized by William Capers Bass of Wesleyan College as Swift Creek Mission. When first entered in the minutes of the South Georgia Conference, 120 white and two colored members were reported. A century later the membership is approximately double that number, this still being a rural community.

The men of the community built the Swift Creek church on a lot of three and one-half acres deeded by Mrs. Elisha Davis to the first trustees, William Hanover Donnan, James Duke and Lunce Riggins, Nov. 5, 1868. The original building is still the sanctuary. Wings have been added and extensive improvements made.

For ninety years Swift Creek was on a circuit with one pastor serving several churches. By 1933 the depression had dwindled to six active members and the church was closed. In 1936 it was reopened with twenty-five members. Membership and attendance steadily increased. In 1957 a parsonage was bought and it became a station with a full-time pastor.

MCPHEETERS, JULIAN CLAUDIUS (1889-), American evangelist, pastor and educator, was born at Oxley, Mo., on July 6, 1889, the son of William Garland and Edna (Greer) McPheeters. Educated at Marvin College, Missouri, he later taught Latin and Greek and studied at Meridian College, Mississippi, 1910-11, and was at SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY for one year, 1916. Honorary degrees were later conferred upon him. He married Ethel Chilton on Jan. 28, 1914, and they had two children, Chilton Claudius and Virginia Wave.

Licensed to preach in 1908, he held summer revivals and then was received on trial in the ST. LOUIS CONFERENCE (MES). He was ordained deacon and elder and went into full connection in 1921. His appointments were: Oran, 1909-10; evangelist, 1912-16; Williamsville, 1917; Mellow Memorial, St. Louis, 1918; Summersville, 1919-21; Missoula, Mont., 1921-23; University Church, Tucson, Ariz., 1923-30; Clide Memorial, SAN FRANCISCO, 1930-48. He became president of ASBURY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, 1942-62 (1942-48 serving both Clide Memorial and the seminary), and he retired in 1962.

In 1918 an authoritative medical report indicated that he had tuberculosis and would never be able to preach but might find it possible to do light work in five years. By faith, prayer and following his physician's directions (he slept on an open porch for three years), he was preaching twice on Sunday within one year. During his pastorate at Missoula, the membership doubled in two years.

He was the founder and builder of Clide Memorial Institutional Church in San Francisco, then called the most pagan city in America. When Clide Church purchased the Californian Hotel, McPheeters did away with the bar, and within one month the hotel's average rate of occupancy became the highest in the city.

A leader of the holiness movement, McPheeters restored the academic accreditation of Asbury Theological Seminary; paid off its debt; and increased the annual enrollment from sixty to 250 students. He was also founder and president of the Redwoods Camp Meeting near Santa Cruz, Calif. From 1942 to 1962 he was editor of The Herald, successor of The Pentecostal Herald, edited by H. C. MORRISON. After retirement McPheeters continued to edit The Herald. He wrote eleven books and was a delegate to the UNITING CONFERENCE in 1939, the JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE in 1940, and the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE, 1947.

MCPHERSON, HARRY W. (1879-1957), American education executive, was born in rural Cumberland County, Ill. His college education was at ILLINOIS WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, and his theological training at BOSTON UNIVERSITY. Joining the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE in 1904, he served churches until 1932, with a term as superintendent of the Springfield District, 1923-25. His social and ecumenical outlook led him to be one of the founders of the Illinois Council of Churches.

As president of Illinois Wesleyan during the difficult depression years, 1932-36, he saved it from financial losses by his firm and wise administration. His plan of accepting farm produce as tuition kept many students in college, and gave Wesleyan much good publicity. The larger church called him in 1936 as Executive Secretary of its BOARD OF EDUCATION, and gave him charge of the Division of Educational Institutions. He was continued in this position in The Methodist Church from 1940 to 1948, in which position he served with distinction.

MCQUIGG, JAMES, Irish preacher and scholar, had an outstanding knowledge of the Irish language and was one of three General Missionaries along with CHARLES and GIDEON OUSELEY appointed in 1799. Owing to the hardships he had to endure, he broke down in health and had to return to circuit work. Here also his evangelistic success led to the formation of many new Societies. Trinity College, DUBLIN, offered him a Readership in Irish, but he refused this attractive academic post, choosing to remain a Methodist preacher. In 1815, after twenty-six years as a preacher, he was expelled by the Conference on the grounds of immorality, despite his strong denial of the charge. He continued the work he had begun of editing the Bible in Irish for the BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY. Not until after his death, a few years later, was his innocence proved and his name cleared by the confession of the guilty party.

FREDERICK JEFFERY

MACROSSIE, ALLAN (1861-1940), American pastor, district superintendent, educator, was born of Scotch parentage at Kingston, Ontario, Canada, the son of William and Althea (Hershey) MacRossie, both devout Methodists. He married Edith M. Weston on Oct. 18, 1888, and they had two sons, William and Allan, Jr.

Educated at Queens University, Kingston, Ontario (A.B.) and DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, B.D., 1887, and later the D.D., he entered the New York East Conference in 1888. His appointments were: Corona, N. Y., 1888-91; South Park, Hartford, Conn., 1891-93; Mamaroneck, N. Y., 1893-94; Grace, Brooklyn, N. Y., 1894-99; Sand Street, Brooklyn, 1900-01; St. James, New York, 1901-11; Superintendent, New York District, 1911-17; St. Andrew's, New York, 1917-21; Commissioner, War Council, American Red Cross, 1917-18; then he became educational director, General Conference Commission on COURSES OF STUDY, 1921-39, and proved a commanding leader in the field of ministerial training.

A member of the Board of Home Missions, Board of Foreign Missions, and Commission on Conservation and Advance, he was also a trustee of Drew and Drew Seminary for Young Women. MacRossie was a manager of the New York Federation of Churches, the New York Deaconess Home, and the Methodist Hospital in Brooklyn. Several times he was a delegate and reserve delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE.

MacRossie's excellent training in Biblical perspective at Queens University and Drew Seminary prepared him in the beginning for the so-called higher criticism which was then starting to stir theological circles and causing confusion and bitterness. Young MacRossie found his way between "the stagnation of reactionarism and the over-rashness of radicalism." As pastor and district superintendent he was an inspiring counsellor.

A dynamic executive, he completely revolutionized the method of training young ministers in the Conference Course, establishing virtually a system of adult education through correspondence. He developed what might be called a college of preachers which met once a year at Evanston, Ill., to listen to religious leaders from the most important pulpits and theological schools. The ministers in the Conference Course constituted what was sometimes called the largest theological school in the world.

Bishop MACCONNELL said in his memoir of MacRossie in 1940:

He had to be on his guard constantly against other administrative agencies which would, if they could, have taken over his commission as a secondary part of some other organization. He had need of all his Scotch sturdiness before he came to the end. During the past two decades, the influence of Dr. MacRossie has played more directly upon the majority of younger ministers than that of any other educational official during his time. Dr. MacRossie was a marvel of industry, of persistent persistence in working toward an end, of shrewdness of discernment as to men's capabilities and peculiarities, of loyalty to his friends and his ideals.

He died on March 2, 1940, and his funeral was conducted in Christ Church Methodist, New York City, on March 5. Bishops E. H. HUGHES and F. J. McCONNELL delivered the addresses. Burial was in Kingston, Ontario. He was survived by his wife and two sons.

H. N. MCTEYRE

MCTEYRE, HOLLAND NIMMONS (1824-1889), American bishop, editor, educator, and the great figure in Southern Methodism during the crucial years following the Civil War, was born in Barnwell County, S. C., on July 28,

1824. He was educated at the old COKEBURY SCHOOL in his native state and at RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE in VIRGINIA, remaining there as a tutor one year after his graduation. In 1845 he was admitted on trial to the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South, and appointed to Williamsburg. Two years later, he became pastor of St. Francis Street Church in Mobile, Ala. He was sent to NEW ORLEANS in 1849 and in 1851 he joined the New Orleans Christian Advocate. He became editor of the central organ of his Church, the Christian Advocate at NASHVILLE, Tenn., in 1858 and continued in that influential position for four years, becoming an intense Southern protagonist as the Civil War came on. He attacked abolitionists, Republicans, and the North generally until 1862 when Nashville was taken over by the Union Army and the METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE property occupied. McTyre bitterly criticized the withdrawal from Nashville under General Joseph Johnston and wrote: "The tameness of surrender, without a blow, must have made the bones of Andrew Jackson turn in his grave at the Hermitage."

The McTyres refugeeed in southern ALABAMA at a cabin built in the woods near Mobile. The effectiveness of the Northern blockade was such that McTyre could buy no shoes for his wife in all Mobile.

Later McTyre was appointed pastor in MONTGOMERY, Ala., where he served until the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1866. There was some question just after the war among the Southern bishops of abandoning the Church's status as an independent organization, but they asked McTyre to draft an address which would summon the annual conferences to elect delegates to a General Conference to decide on these matters. He did so and in this General Conference, the first the South had had in eight years, McTyre took the lead, being the champion of lay representation and for an increase in the pastoral time limit from two years to four. He also championed plans for organizing the COLORED METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH and took the lead in calling for the reestablishment of the missionary program of the Church, and for rehabilitating the Publishing House in Nashville.

He was elected bishop by this conference and at this critical time when he was forty-two years of age. As Bishop SOULE died in 1867, this threw great responsibility on him as one of the new bishops. He lived in Nashville, but conducted 125 annual conferences, an average of five and one-half for each year he served as bishop.

McTyre was the virtual founder of VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY in Nashville in 1872. He secured from Cornelius Vanderbilt the original gift of $500,000, which was later increased to $1,000,000 and which has been added to by other members of the family in later years. Vanderbilt provided that Bishop McTyre should be president of the Board of Trustees with full veto power.

In his later years he lived on the grounds of the University. He died there on Feb. 15, 1889, and is buried on the campus.

McTyre's greatest literary contribution was his History of Methodism. He also wrote a work called Duties of Christian Masters, dealing with the question of slavery. He was the foremost authority on Church law and published A Manual of the Discipline and A Catechism on Church Government. He was one of the strongest bishops of the Church in an era of strong bishops. Bishop ATTICUS HAYGOOD wrote of him: "He was no mere ecclesiastic. He was in his Church, its first statesman, as well as chief pastor."

MADAN, MARTIN (1726-1790), Anglican Evangelical, was the elder brother of Spencer Madan, Bishop of Peterborough, and cousin to William Cowper, the poet. Educated at Westminster School and Christ Church, OXFORD, Madan was called to the bar in 1748. Shortly afterward he was converted under JOHN WESLEY's preaching and was ordained in the Church of England. In 1750 he was appointed chaplain of the Lock Hospital in London, a post which he held for thirty years. He itinerated for the COUNTESS OF HUNTINGDON from 1757. He also associated with the Methodists and attended the Conference of 1762.

MADHYA PRADESH ANNUAL CONFERENCE is a conference of INDIA which was named for and covers a central and the second largest state of India. Bhopal is its capital, and the state is located between the Narbada and Godavari Rivers, and touches the states of the Deccan, as well as of the northern part of the country. It is rich in minerals and has extensive forests. Hinduism is the predominant religion and Hindi the chief language. There are many tribal languages and dialects. The state covers an area of 171,217 square miles and has a population of about 32,000,000.

The Madhya Pradesh Conference was organized in 1913 out of what had been the Central Provinces Mission Conference. The name was changed after independence to Madhya Pradesh Annual Conference, which has the same meaning.

The conference has four districts, namely Balaghat,

Bastar, Jabalpur, and Khandwa. Of these the largest is the one centered in Jabalpur, a city of 295,375, and perhaps the most centrally located city in India, with a healthful climate and high altitude. It is about 616 miles from Bombay and 733 miles from Calcutta. Jabalpur contains two Methodist churches and the Leonard Theological College. The conference supports a membership of 15,901 (1968) served by approximately thirty-two ordained and fifty supply pastors.

MADISON, WISCONSIN, U.S.A., the state capital, population of 170,073, was planned as a community by Steven Mason and James Doty in 1836 and was named for President James Madison. Incorporated as a city in 1856, it is the seat of the University of Wisconsin (chartered in 1848) and of Edgewood College.

Methodist services were first held in Madison in November 1837, "in the Barroom of the American House, then owned by James Morrison." Salmon Stebbins, a presiding elder, preached that night, and then received an offering totaling $11. During 1838, a Mr. Pillsbury preached in Madison about once a month. Salmon Stebbins also is reported to have stopped by occasionally that year, as presiding elder.

The first Methodist building was begun in 1849, and completed in 1853. The second building, on the present site at Wisconsin and Dayton, was built in 1876. Madison first appears in the minutes in 1843, with Thomas L. Bennett as pastor. In 1845 the church had only forty-six members. By 1876 the Madison M. E. Church reported 230 members and church property appraised at $43,590. Then the German Methodist Church had sixty-five members and property worth $4,500.

During the 1890's the membership grew rapidly to about 400. As early as 1908 the church employed an assistant pastor to work with the University students, and in 1912 a WESLEY FOUNDATION was started near the campus. A few years later First Church sponsored the forming of a mission in the city's Italian district, and this was merged with a neighborhood church in the early 1960's. In 1919, First Church started Methodist Hospital, which today is a modern 150-bed institution.

The greatest period of expansion into the growing suburban areas came after World War II, when new congregations were established in each new major development in the city.

Madison also has two WESLEYAN METHODIST churches, a FREE METHODIST CHURCH, and an A.M.E. CHURCH.

Madison had eleven United Methodist churches in 1970 with a combined membership of 7,481 and property appraised at $3,549,862. First Church with 2,302 members had property worth $1,292,739.

MADISON COLLEGE, Uniontown, Pennsylvania, the third college established in the United States under the auspices of the M. E. Church. It was a project of the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE launched at the initial session of that Conference in 1825. It opened for students and was chartered by the Legislature of PENNSYLVANIA in 1827. The first President was HENRY B. BASCOM, later a bishop of the M. E. Church. South. Bascom had been Chaplain of Congress in 1823 and named the College for President James Madison.

Madison only continued as a M. E. College for five years, until 1832, at which time the patronage of the Pittsburgh Conference was transferred to ALLEGHENY COLLEGE at MEADVILLE, Pa., and the faculty and students of Madison were transferred to Allegheny. Since the first Methodist college, COKEBURY, had been discontinued after the fire that destroyed it in 1795; and since the second college, AUGUSTA, established under the patronage of OHIO and KENTUCKY CONFERENCES in 1822, was abandoned in the 1840s, this continuity of Madison in and via Allegheny gives to Allegheny College the claim to be the oldest Methodist college in the United States.

The Madison College buildings in Uniontown were occupied for a time in the 1830s as a Cumberland Presbyterian college, and then they went under the control of the M. P. Church. At the meeting of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of that church in 1850, GEORGE BROWN reported that the trustees of Madison College had offered the institution to the conference. Since the location was at a central point between the northern and southern conferences of the M. P. Church, the offer was accepted.

A Board of Trustees was appointed and Madison College commenced operations again in the summer of 1851. In 1853, the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M. P. Church recommended Madison College "as the most suitable place at which the sons of Methodist Protestants may be educated." In 1854, JOHN SPEIGHT was appointed to act as agent for the North Carolina Conference and solicit funds for the college. R. H. Ball, FRANCIS WATERS, and Samuel K. Cox each served as President of Madison College for short periods of time. However, since the various presidents, faculty members, commissioners and trustees of the college were largely selected from the southern conferences of the M. P. Church, some tension was created. As a result of the controversial political atmosphere of the period, the faculty and president resigned at the commencement of 1855 and announced that a new M. P. college would open in Lynchburg, Va., in September of that year. Eighty-five students also withdrew from Madison College to enroll at Lynchburg College. Brown, who had served as President of the Board of Trustees, became President of Madison College that fall, and remained in that position until 1857 when, due to indebtedness, small enrollment, lack of financial support and endowment, the trustees decided to close the college.

MAGARET, ERNST CARL (1845-1924), German-American minister and hymn writer, was born at Anklam, Pomerania, Germany on July 6, 1845. Educated in the classical Gymnasias at Anklam and Greifswald, he emigrated to America in 1864 and became a teacher at CENTRAL WESLEYAN COLLEGE, Warrenton, Mo. In 1869

he was admitted to the Southwest German Annual Conference of the M. E. Church. From 1868-1883 he served various churches in IOWA and ILLINOIS. From 1883-1884 he was a professor at the MOUNT PLEASANT GERMAN COLLEGE. He then served important German churches in BURLINGTON, IOWA; Warsaw, Pekin and Belleville, Illinois; and in ST. LOUIS until his retirement in 1917.

He was noted for his writings, particularly poetry, and the editorship of the Jubiläumsbuch der St. Louis Deutschen Konferenz. His greatest achievement was in the translation and composition of original hymns for every important German Methodist hymnal: Deutsches-Gesang-und Melodienbuch (1888); Die Perle (1894); Lobe den Herrn! (1895) and Die Pilgerklänge (1907). He edited himself Die Kleine Palme (1895) which contained fifty-six translations and twenty-one originals. He died in Omaha, Neb., on July 3, 1924.

MAGATA, DAVID, was born in the Magaliesberg, was captured by the Matabele and became a personal attendant of Mzilikazi. He escaped when Mzilikazi was attacked by the Boers and went to Thaba 'Nchu Wesleyan Mission. Converted he returned to the Magaliesberg to find his family had disappeared. He settled in Potchefstroom and preached every morning on the market square to the Bantu and colored people. Some whites laid a charge of disturbing the peace against him. The local magistrate ordered a public lashing and banished him from the Republic. After receiving his lashing, Magata went to Natal and then to Sekukuniland. On the border he met Commandant Paul Kruger who listened to his story sympathetically and gave him written permission to return to Potchefstroom. He was to be allowed to preach and no one was to interfere with him. Blencowe appointed Magata as a lay agent of the Wesleyan MISSIONARY SOCIETY at an annual salary of £12.

Certain distinctive and significant magazines which have been and may now be published as official organs of the Church will be found listed under their own names, as Arminian Magazine, Methodist Review, Southern Quarterly Review, Religion In Life, etc.

British Methodism. Wesleyan Methodism. The first Magazine of Methodism, The Arminian Magazine (q.v.) was started by JOHN WESLEY in 1778 and continued under various titles until 1969 (vide Methodist Magazine). The nineteenth-century controversies within the Connexion, together with the growing literacy of the people, created a great demand for more reading matter, and the number of Methodist magazines and newspapers multiplied. The Watchman (see below), The Illuminator (1835-36), and The Wesleyan Vindicator (1850-52) defended the official Wesleyan policy and polity against left-wing reformers.

Learned comment on events and current literature was catered for in The London Quarterly Review (1853-1932), later to be amalgamated with The Holborn Quarterly (see below) to form The London Quarterly and Holborn Review (1932-68) and now allied with The Church Quarterly Review to form the present Church Quarterly.

LOCAL PREACHERS were served by The Preachers Magazine (1890-1927) and The Preachers and Class Leaders Magazine (1928-54) which has now been superseded by The Preachers Quarterly. An earlier publication, The Methodist Pulpit (1871-73), simply reproduced sermons by well-known preachers.

For Sunday school teachers there were The Wesleyan Sunday School Magazine (1857-89), The Methodist Sunday School Magazine (1890-1901), The Teacher and Preacher (1909-13) and The Teachers Magazine (1930-47).

Many magazines for children and young people were issued: The Child's Magazine (1824-45), Early Days (1846-1916), The Kiddies Magazine (1917-57), Our Boys and Girls (1887-1905), Youth's Instructor (1817-55), and The Guild (1897-1901). The Choir (1910-64) catered for musicians, and was superseded by a general magazine on the arts, Mosaic (1965-67). The Church Record, under various similar titles (1892-1957) provided an inset for local church magazines. Magazines for home reading included The Cottager's Friend, later entitled The Christian Miscellany and Family Visitor (1846-1900), The Wesleyan Tract Reporter (1841-49), The City Road Magazine (1871-76), The Methodist Messenger (1871-72), The King's Highway (1872-1927, "A Journal of Scriptural Holiness"), Experience (1881-1927), The Monthly Greeting (1890-92), Hope (1909-11) and Home and Empire Magazine (1924). Special interests were met in The Methodist Temperance Magazine (1868-1906), The Wesley Naturalist (1887-89), The Journal of the Wesley Bible Union (1914-27).

The Methodist New Connexion. The first real rival to The Methodist Magazine was one of the same title, started by the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION in 1798, but in 1812 the title was changed to The New Methodist Magazine and in 1833 to The Methodist New Connexion Magazine. Thus it continued until 1907. The Methodist Monitor had appeared in 1796-97 as an organ for disseminating the views of the Kilhamites who, under the leadership of ALEXANDER KILHAM and WILLIAM THOM, separated from the Wesleys in 1796 to form the Methodist New Connexion. This connexion also published The Sunday Scholars Magazine (1850-98) and Young People (1899-1907).

The Reform Movements. The Reform Movements produced an abundance of literature. The Tent Methodist Magazine (1823), The Wesleyan Protestant Methodist Magazine (1829-34), The Wesleyan Association Magazine (1828-57), The Watchman's Lantern (1834-35), The Wesley Banner (1849-54) (q.v.), The Wesleyan Review and Evangelical Record (1850-51), The Wesleyan Reformer (1851-52), all expressed the thought and traced the development of the reform agitation within Methodism during the first half of the nineteenth century, but when the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES was formed in 1857, The United Methodist Free Churches Magazine held the field until 1907—from 1892 to 1907 the title was The Methodist Monthly. Other magazines of this body were The Sunday School Hite (1849-91), Welcome

Words (1867-91), and The Brooklet (1885-94). The Wesleyan Methodist Penny Magazine ran from 1853 to 1857. Those who did not enter the United Methodist Free Churches formed THE WESLEYAN REFORM UNION, and as such exist to this day. They published The Wesleyan Reform Union Magazine (1861-65), which in 1866 assumed the title Christian Words which it still carries.

The Bible Christians. This small Connexion published The Bible Christian Magazine (1822-1907) and a Young People's Magazine which began about 1825 and ran, under various titles, until 1907.

The United Methodist Church. This body published The United Methodist Magazine (1907-32), Young People (1907) and Pleasant Hour (1908-12).

The Primitive Methodist Church. This, the largest non-Wesleyan body, published its own magazine from 1819 to 1932. From 1819 to 1899 its title was The Primitive Methodist Magazine, and from 1900 to 1932 The Aldersgate and Primitive Methodist Magazine. Of high quality, especially under the editorship of A. S. PEAKE, was The Holborn Review (1910-32), previously known as The Christian Ambassador (1863-77) and The Primitive Methodist Quarterly Review (1878-1915). Teachers and preachers were catered for by The Primitive Methodist Preachers Magazine (1832-?) and later by adapting the Wesleyan periodical of the same title, The Teachers Assistant (1873-95), The Sunday School Journal and Preachers Magazine (1896-1907), The Teacher and Preacher (1908-13), The Primitive Methodist Sunday School Magazine (1914-32). Young people were provided for in Springtime (1886-1929), Joyful Tidings (1892-1903), Advance (1923-32), and The Child's Friend (1865-1914).

Interdenominational. A magazine intended to serve all branches of Methodism, The Methodist Quarterly, ran from 1867 to 1872. It claimed to be "independent and unsectional," sympathetic to liberal tendencies in Church polity and without bigotry. It believed that the days of controversy over ecclesiastical polity were past. Of shorter duration were The Methodist World (1870) and a Methodist Times which ran from 1867 to 1869 and is not to be confused with a newspaper of the same title which ran from 1885 to 1932 (see below).

Newspapers in British Methodism. The first Methodist newspaper to appear was The Watchman (1834-85) (q.v.), intended to defend Wesleyan policy and polity against the attacks of left-wing reformers (as Protestant Methodists, The Warrenite Controversy and The Fly Sheets agitation). Although it was not an official Conference publication, it exerted a strong influence on Wesleyan Methodists. Conservative in tone, it reported and commented on ecclesiastical and political events. The newspaper of the Wesleyan Reformers was The Wesleyan Times (1849-52), but there were others of short-lived duration—The Wesleyan Chronicle (1840), The Wesleyan and Christian Record (1841), and The Wesleyan (1843-48). In 1861 The Methodist Recorder (q.v.) appeared, and is still in circulation. In 1885 a new publication, representing more liberal tendencies, was started under the editorship of HUGH PRICE HUGHES—The Methodist Times (1885-1932). The PRIMITIVE METHODISTS had The Primitive Methodist (1868-1905) which incorporated The Primitive Methodist World (1883-1908), and, in turn, became The Primitive Methodist Leader (1905-25) and The Methodist Leader (1926-32). With the consummation of METHODIST UNION this newspaper amalgamated with The Methodist Times to become The Meth- odist Times and Leader (1932-37) and in 1937 this was incorporated with The Methodist Recorder. Other newspapers representing the smaller denominations were The United Methodist (1903-1932) and The Free Methodist (1886-1907). The Methodist (1874-84) endeavored to serve all branches of Methodism and was of wide culture, politically liberal and was the predecessor of The Methodist Times which it commended in its last issue. The Wesleyan Methodist (1923-24) promulgated the views of a party within Wesleyan Methodism which protested against Methodist Union.

The Joyful News was a lively weekly journal with an emphasis on evangelism. The first issue, edited by THOMAS CHAMPNESS, appeared in February 1883. It greatly extended its influence under SAMUEL CHADWICK, Principal of CLIFF COLLEGE. As the magazine of this college, it continued under its original title until 1962, when it appeared as Advance (not to be confused with an earlier magazine of this title). In 1964 it was succeeded by The Cliff Witness.

JOHN C. BOWMER

J. RALPH MAGEE

MAGEE, JUNIUS RALPH (1880-1970), American bishop, was born in Maquoketa, Iowa, June 3, 1880, the son of John Calvin and Jane Amelia (Cole) Magee. He received his early educational training in his native state. He graduated from the Iowa State Teachers College in 1901 with the B.D. degree. In 1904 he received the Ph.B. degree from MORNINGSIDES COLLEGE and the LL.D. degree there in 1931. He graduated at BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY in 1910, receiving the S.T.B., and the D.D. in 1947. He held a number of other honorary degrees.

He was ordained and served as a deacon in 1904 and as elder in 1906. His pastorates were: Rustin Avenue Church, Sioux City, Ia., 1902-04; Paulina, Ia., 1904-07; Falmouth, Mass., 1907-11; First Church, Taunton, Mass., 1911-14; Daniel Dorchester Memorial, Boston, 1914-19; St. Mark's Church, Brookline, Mass., 1919-21; and First Church, Seattle, Wash., 1921-29.

He became superintendent of the Seattle District, serving in this capacity until 1932, when he was elected and consecrated bishop. He was resident bishop of the ST. PAUL (Minn.) Area from 1932 until 1939; president of HAMLINE UNIVERSITY, St. Paul, 1933-34; resident bishop of the DES MOINES Area, 1939-44, and resident bishop of the CHICAGO Area from 1944 until 1952, when he retired. He was director of the CRUSADE FOR CHRIST, 1944-48 and president of the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS, 1950-51.

Bishop Magee was married to Harriet A. Keeler on Sept. 10, 1902. Their children are J. Homer Magee, Associate Secretary of the Council on WORLD SERVICE and FINANCE; and Dorothy J. Magee of the American Hospital Supply Corporation. Mrs. Magee died on Oct. 31, 1943.

In 1944 a portrait of Bishop Magee was presented by Iowa Methodists to the Iowa State Department of History and Archives. Bishop Magee was the first native Iowan ever to be made a bishop and to serve in Iowa as such from any denomination.

Bishop Magee served in an official capacity in a number of important church-wide organizations. He was named by B. C. Forbes in the Hearst Newspapers, as one of the sixteen most influential persons in Seattle.

He was the chairman of the committee to combine the Puget Sound Conference and Columbia River Conference into what is now the PACIFIC NORTHWEST CONFERENCE, and presided at the Northwest German Conference when it was integrated into nine other conferences. This meant considerable work with pension funds, equalization in re ages of members, etc.

He served as trustee of the following organizations: Chamber of Commerce, Seattle, 1925-32; UNIVERSITY OF PUGET SOUND; SIMPSON COLLEGE; CORNELL COLLEGE; MCKENDREE COLLEGE; Iowa Methodist Hospital; Hamline University; NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY; Greater Chicago Federation of Churches; GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY; KENDALL COLLEGE; ILLINOIS WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY; WESLEY FOUNDATION, University of Illinois; Wesley Memorial Hospital, Chicago; and the Lake Bluff, Illinois, Children's Home.

He died Dec. 19, 1970, in Morton Grove, Ill.

JOHN T. WILKINSON

MAHABANE, EZEKIEL EGBERT (1900-), South African minister, was born at Thaba 'Nchu, Orange Free State (brother of Z. R. MAHABANE), on Feb. 21, 1900. He received primary education at Besonvale Practising School and high school education at Morija in Basutoland (now Lesotho). He then trained as a teacher at Lovedale Missionary Institution and thereafter entered the Methodist ministry in 1925. After theological training at Wesley House, Fort Hare, he travelled in the following circuits: Douglas, Kilnerton, Pretoria, Randfontein, Vereeniging and Johannesburg. In 1962 he became the first African Superintendent of the Witwatersrand (African) Mission. Offices held: General Secretary of the Temperance and Social Welfare Department of the Methodist Church 1939-56; General Missionary Secretary 1957-62; Ministerial General Officer of the Missionary Department 1963 to present time; Vice-President of the Christian Council of South Africa 1960-61; President of the Witwatersrand

E. E. MAHABANE

Christian Council 1965 to present time. He represented the Methodist Church of South Africa at the 1956 WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCE at Lake Junaluska, and at the Third Assembly of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES at New Delhi in 1961. He is a member of the World Council of Churches Central Committee.

S. P. FREELAND

MAHABANE, ZACCHEUS RICHARD (1881-), South African minister, was born on Aug. 15, 1881 at Thaba 'Nchu, Orange Free State. His parents were converted from heathenism when he was ten years old and his father began to preach immediately. Zaccheus was a herd boy until he went to school. He trained for the teaching profession at Morija, Basutoland, but after two years' teaching became a court interpreter. Accepted for the ministry in 1908, he was trained at Lesseyton, Queenstown and served in the following circuits: Cape Town, Vrede, Kimberley, Winburg, Kroonstad, Brandfort. He became the first African official member of the Methodist Conference in SOUTH AFRICA when he was appointed Secretary of the Board of Examiners (1935-40), and served as a member of the Revision, Church Union and Sessional Committees. He also became the first African President of the Triennial Convention of the Young Men's Guild, held a number of positions on national bodies, and attended gatherings in BELGIUM (1926), Accra (1957) and Ibadan, NIGERIA (1958). He retired from active work at the end of 1957, but continues to preach and undertake supply work.

S. P. FREELAND

MAHIN, MILTON (1824-1916), pioneer American clergyman, was born in Green Co., Ohio, on Oct. 22, 1824. He moved to INDIANA and was admitted on trial in the NORTH INDIANA CONFERENCE in 1841. He married Eliza Dorsey, Oct. 31, 1843. Milton Mahin had an enviable and unique record in that the Conference Minutes show that he served a total of seventy-five years as pastor and presiding elder. He was elected to the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1868. He died Oct. 7, 1916.

HAROLD THRASHER

MAHON, ROBERT HENRY (1840-1929), American minister, was born in Crockett County, Tenn., on Oct. 22, 1840, the son of Jackson H. Mahon, a Methodist minister. He was received on trial in the MEMPHIS CONFERENCE in 1860, and appointed junior pastor with his uncle, Robert Burns, to the Trenton Circuit. After two years he was sent to Paris, Tenn. He served also as pastor at Grenada, Miss., at Mayfield, Ky.; Broadway, in Paducah, Ky.; First and Central Churches, MEMPHIS; and at Brownsville, Dyersburg and Union City, Tenn.; presiding elder of Memphis, Dyersburg and Brownsville Districts. Seven times he was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE and two other times alternate; several times he received a considerable vote for bishop. He published a book, The Token of the Covenant or The Meaning of Baptism. R. H. Mahon was one of the outstanding scholars and ecclesiastical statesmen of his conference, and was well-known as interpreter of the Scriptures.

In 1864 he was married to Annie Vaulx Blakemore of Trenton, Tenn., who died in 1876; in 1878 he was married to Mrs. Sue Hobson Senter of Nashville, Tenn.; she died in 1912. This same year he took the supernumerary relation after fifty-two years of active ministry. Thereafter he lived in the home of his daughter, Mrs. Ruth Hay of Brownsville, Tenn. He died May 28, 1929. He taught a ladies' Bible class regularly during his years of retirement.

While pastor of First Church, Memphis, he secured the appointment of JOHN R. PEPPER as Sunday school superintendent, a world figure in Sunday school work.

IDABELLE LEWIS MAIN

MAIN, IDABELLE LEWIS (1887-), missionary educator in CHINA and BRAZIL, was born in Iowa and studied at MORNINGSIDE COLLEGE and Columbia University. Her first teaching was at Tientsin, in the Keen School for Girls. She also taught English in Nankai University, where for one semester she had Chou En-lai in her class.

In 1924, she was appointed assistant secretary of Methodist education for all China, and assisted in editing The China Christian Educational Review. In 1926, she became president of Hwanan College in Foochow, but resigned in 1929 to make way for a Chinese president, and in the following year she returned to Shanghai as a secretary of the China Christian Educational Association.

In 1932, she was married to W. A. Main, treasurer of the China missions of the M. E. Church. They remained in China until 1941, editing The China Christian Educational Review and The China Christian Advocate. In 1941 they retired and lived in America, but after Mr. Main's death in 1945, she returned to Hwanan College where she taught until the Communist occupation in 1949. In 1950 she was appointed to Colegio Bennett in RIO DE JANEIRO, and taught there for five years. She is now retired and living in Robincroft Home, Pasadena, Calif.

FRANCIS P. JONES

MAINE is the extreme northeastern state of the Union. It is bounded on the east, north, and west by CANADA, on the southwest by NEW HAMPSHIRE, and on the southeast by the Atlantic Ocean. The forty-fifth parallel divides the state into almost equal northern and southern sections. The extreme north is free of killing frost about three and one-half months of the year, and most of the state is spared for about four and one-third months. The largest of the New England states, Maine's area is 33,215 square miles, and its population is about 977,260.

The Province of Maine was granted to Ferdinando Gorges and John Mason in 1622. Gorges became the sole owner; after his death the Colony of Massachusetts Bay gradually encroached, and finally in 1677 bought the province from Gorges' heirs for 1,250 pounds. Maine continued as a part of Massachusetts until it was admitted to the Union as a state in 1820.

Methodism entered Maine when JESSE LEE was appointed to the Province of Maine and Lynn, Mass., at the session of the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE in Lynn in August 1793. On September 10, of that year, Lee delivered the first Methodist sermon in Maine at Saco. He soon visited eighteen towns in the province. In 1794 Lee was named presiding elder, and his district included MASSACHUSETTS, New Hampshire, and Maine. On November 13 that year, Lee preached at MONMOUTH, Maine, and found that a man named Wagner had formed a class of fifteen members there; it was the first Methodist class to be organized in Maine. During the conference year 1794-95, Lee dedicated a Methodist meetinghouse at (East) READFIELD, the first one to be erected in Maine. The next year a chapel was dedicated at Monmouth.

In 1798 BISHOP ASBURY conducted the New England Conference at (East) Readfield. At the 1799 session of the same conference in New York City, JOSHUA SOULE was admitted on trial; he was the first native of Maine to become a member of the New England Conference. Asbury appointed Soule a presiding elder in 1804. As a member of the 1808 GENERAL CONFERENCE, Soule drafted the plan for a delegated General Conference, one of the most important pieces of legislation ever adopted by the supreme law-making body of Methodism (see RESTRICTIVE RULES). Elected bishop in 1824, Soule was a dominant figure in the office for more than two-score years. He adhered South after the division in 1844. Two other bishops were born in Maine, DAVIS W. CLARK and EDGAR BLAKE, elected in 1864 and 1920, respectively. All three men were serving in other states and conferences when elevated to the episcopacy.

For several years Maine formed one district in the New England Conference, and in time it grew to three districts. The MAINE CONFERENCE was created by the 1824 General Conference, and was organized in 1825. In 1848 the Maine Conference was divided to form the East Maine Conference. After seventy-five years the two conferences were merged to form again the Maine Conference covering Maine and part of New Hampshire.

As soon as the Maine Conference was organized it became affiliated with a school called the Maine Wesleyan Seminary which had opened at Kent's Hill in February of that year. The institution had difficulties, but it kept going and in time was named the Maine Wesleyan Seminary and Female College. The conference board of education declared in 1880 that Maine Wesleyan was the leading institution of learning in the state and said that many young men were going directly from the school into the ranks of the itineracy. In 1900 the same board said there were few churches in the conference which had not felt the uplifting influence of the college. About 1910 Maine Wesleyan became a secondary school and was called KENTS HILL SCHOOL. Under that name it is today an accredited Methodist secondary school with an endowment of some $750,000, a plant worth $1,000,000, and about 300 students.

The Maine Wesleyan Journal was published from 1832 to 1841, and was then merged with Zion's Herald.

In 1970 the Maine Conference reported three districts, 134 pastoral charges, 142 ministers, 33,257 members, and property valued at $16,366,666.

MAINE CAMP MEETINGS. The first CAMP MEETING in MAINE is believed to have been held at Buxton in 1806. About twenty preachers, traveling and local, were present. Bishop ASBURY preached on Saturday and Sunday to a crowd estimated to be 5,000. Two years previously Asbury was in Buxton for a session of the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE. At that time he preached and ordained ministers in a grove, using a hay cart for a pulpit.

From this beginning at Buxton, camp meetings spread throughout the State, becoming a powerful influence in the life of Methodism. Evangelism was the prime purpose; however, not only were souls converted but also for several generations many preachers in the Conference were men converted at camp meetings. Here, too, the moral reform movements, especially the abolition of slavery and the temperance cause, were powerfully presented.

In the earlier development of the camp meeting, not much equipment was required—a speaker's stand, plank seats for the congregation, straw for mattresses, a place for tents and perhaps some sort of fence with a gate. As time went on, refinements were added, such as a "tabernacle," a boarding house for meals, and cottages built by individuals or by local churches on ground rented from the local camp meeting association.

There are known to have been forty or more locations in Maine where, for a longer or shorter time, camp meetings were held. Some changed from one site to another. The greatest crowds on record were those at Littleton. "Some of the Presiding Elders," wrote A. A. Callaghan, "reported great crowds, one reported an attendance of 15,000 and said that if anyone had any suggestion as to how the situation could be handled he would be glad to consult."

East Livermore Camp Meeting was established in 1847; one of the organizers was a man who came to be known as Camp Meeting John Allen. He was converted in 1825 at the camp meeting at Industry. He used to take his granddaughter to the camp meeting at Strong, a few miles from her home at Fairbanks, where she often sang as a girl. Later she was known in world opera as Madame Nordica. Camp Meeting John Allen fittingly preached his last sermon at the age of ninety-three at the East Livermore Camp Meeting, and the next morning went "home to glory." The East Livermore Camp Meeting is still active, though for several years has not been under Methodist auspices.

Two outstanding camp meetings deserving particular mention are Old Orchard and Northport. The former, which ran from 1872 to 1934, at one time attracted national attention. The Northport Camp Meeting, which served the churches up and down the Penobscot River, had a landing for the Bangor-Boston steamships which was an added convenience and attraction. The association sponsoring this camp disbanded in the 1920's. Many of the cottages were privately owned; the others were acquired by individuals, and the place became a summer resort.

At present only two camp meetings continue to hold services and to preserve their organizations. The Empire Grove Camp Meeting at East Poland draws considerable support from the Portland District, holds a week of services and a Church Vacation School. The cottagers who spend the summer on the grounds for the most part have Methodist membership or traditions. Several Conference ministers own cottages, and one retired minister "winterized" his cottage and lives there the year round.

The other camp meeting still in operation is at Jacksonville located in Washington County on the Bangor District. It has a week of services and a youth program for those who cannot get to the Methodist Camp at Winthrop. For several years there has also been a camp for underprivileged youth.

As the camp meetings gradually disappeared, especially from about 1910 to 1918, the work with adults in the field of evangelism of the revival type has declined almost to the vanishing point. Beginning with about 1920, several EPWORTH LEAGUE Institutes were held across the state in preparatory schools and teacher's colleges. After much experiment and with the increased availability of automobile transportation for delegates, it seemed wise to establish only one organization and to secure a desirable camp site for the newer approach to youth work. Such a camp with a dozen buildings and a waterfront was purchased on a lake in Winthrop in 1948. There a series of different age groups of children and youth attend camps of one or two weeks duration from mid-June until September, followed by a camp for the Conference Lay Activities. Many young adults as well as youth who are active members of local churches, and several young ministers in the Conference, answered the challenge of Christ at the recent Methodist Camp and this seems to have taken over some of the function of the camp meeting of former times.

MAINE CONFERENCE (ME) was created by the 1824 GENERAL CONFERENCE. Its territory at the beginning was MAINE and the part of NEW HAMPSHIRE east of the White Hills and north of Ossipee Lake. The Maine Conference was carved out of the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE. The new conference was organized at Gardiner, Maine, July 6, 1825, with Bishop ENOCH GEORGE presiding. It began with three districts, thirty-two charges, forty-two preachers, and 6,960 members. (See MAINE for beginning of Methodism in the state.)

By 1840 the membership of the Maine Conference had trebled, and in 1843 it reported 27,400 members, the high water mark in membership for a century. In the next three years the net loss was nearly 7,000 members. The total membership in 1847 was 20,448.

In 1848 the Maine Conference was divided to form the EAST MAINE CONFERENCE. The division left 10,773 members in the Maine Conference.

From the beginning the Maine Conference supported a school at Kent's Hill called the Maine Wesleyan Seminary (see KENT'S HILL SCHOOL). Also, the conference supported the BOSTON SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, and it had close ties with WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in Connecticut as long as that institution was related to the church. The conference owns and operates a 180-acre Camp and Conference Center at Winthrop. Instead of maintaining WESLEY FOUNDATIONS, in more recent years the conference has supported an ecumenical ministry on college campuses. In 1968 the conference established the Methodist Conference Home, Inc. at Rockland, Maine.

The 1920 General Conference adopted an enabling act permitting the Maine and East Maine Conferences to merge during the quadrennium if both should so vote. The Maine Conference rejected the merger in 1921, but in 1922 both conferences voted for it, and it was consummated in 1923. The first session of the enlarged Maine Conference was held at Bangor, April 18-23, 1923. At that time the conference had four districts, 271 charges, and 23,234 members. By 1930 the conference membership had declined to 21,880, but thereafter it increased. In 1935 there were 25,908 members, and in 1945 the total was 28,425.

In 1966 MARGARET K. HENRICHSEN was appointed superintendent of the Bangor District, the first woman district superintendent in Methodism.

In 1970 the Maine Conference reported three districts, Augusta, Bangor, and Portland, 134 charges, 142 ministers, 33,257 members, property valued at $16,366,666 and $2,067,918 raised for all purposes during the year.

MAITLAND, New South Wales, Australia, was originally known as the Hunter River Circuit and included the settlement at Newcastle. SAMUEL LEIGH visited the penal establishment at Newcastle in 1821. A second visit was made later. JOSEPH ORTON passed through Newcastle in August 1839, sailing up the Hunter River to Morpeth and travelling across country to Maitland. Here he found a Methodist Society and a chapel in course of construction, due largely to the labors of a local preacher from IRELAND named Jeremiah Jedsam. Later the same year, NATHANIEL TURNER preached and met members of the Society during a brief visit. The first missionary stationed at Maitland, Jonathan Innes, arrived the following year (1840); the circuit then extended from Newcastle to Singleton. For several years previously, meetings for Christian fellowship had been held in Newcastle, led by William Lightbody, later employed by the Wesleyan Conference as a local preacher and school teacher. In 1854 Rev. W. Curnow resided in Newcastle for a short period. In 1856 it was separated from the Maitland Circuit, with William Clarke as the first minister. Singleton Circuit was created the same year. The mother-circuit, Hunger River, was in 1855 renamed Maitland.

MALAYSIA is a constitutional monarchy comprised of the nine Sultanates and two British Straits Settlements of the former Federation of Malaya (Malay Peninsula), together with the former British Colonies of SARAWAK and Sabah (North Borneo) situated on the Island of BORNEO. SINGAPORE (city and island) had been a constituent element of Malaysia when it was established in 1963, but it withdrew in 1965, because of racial and political tensions, to become an independent country. Both Malaysia and Singapore are members of the United Nations and the British Commonwealth.

The area of present Malaysia is approximately 138,000 square miles, of which 78,000 stands in the elements on Borneo (Sarawak and Sabah). The population is about 8,350,000, of which 1,250,000 live in Sarawak and Sabah. In the population, Malays predominate in all sections except Singapore, where Chinese are at least seventy-five percent. There are sizeable groups of Tamils from INDIA, as well as Indonesians. The capital is Kuala Lumpur (300,000 people), twenty-five miles inland from Port Swettenham on the Straits of Malacca.

The aborigines of Malaya were never left alone. Varied peoples came from far to trade and settle, bringing their gods and their cultures with them. A hardy group of the Singh clan of northwest India, forced from their homes, settled on the island at the southern tip, building a town which they called "Lion City"—Singapore. Others from South India and CEYLON, speaking Tamil, came in such numbers as to form an enclave with Hinduism and its culture. The teachings of Buddha entered by way of a strong dynasty out of Siam (Thailand). CHINA seems always to have been overpopulated, and thousands have poured into Malaya, revering Confucius—sturdy peasants, astute businessmen, wise legislators. Early Arab traders dominated the eastern seas, Islam appearing in their communities in every port city.

Catholic Christianity arrived with the ships of PORTUGAL, Spain and FRANCE, soon to be followed by the Protestantism of the Dutch and British. Portugal proved unable to maintain any sizeable area. Spanish influence centered in the PHILIPPINES. France consolidated what became French Indo-China—now Viet Nam, Laos and Cambodia. The Dutch achieved an island empire of over 1,500 miles from Sumatra to Celebes—now INDONESIA. Britain's foothold was the cosmopolitan focal center, Singapore, and the supporting peninsula, producing great quantities of rubber and tin. Singapore and environs became a Crown Colony, while Protectorates were established for the Peninsula Sultanates.

After Pearl Harbor and the decimation of all Allied naval units between India and AUSTRALIA, early in World War II, Japanese forces swarmed down the coast and along the Malay Peninsula. Singapore fell without a siege, its strong defenses having been constructed against sea-attack, and requiring supporting naval power. After the ultimate defeat of JAPAN, British sovereignty was restored, the Federation of Malaya was established and independence achieved. A wearisome and costly struggle against Communist infiltration and sabotage has practically eliminated that menace from the Peninsula.

The British-protected Sultanates and Settlements of the Malay Peninsula, together with the separate city-island, Singapore, were constituted a limited monarchy in August 1957, becoming a member of the United Nations. In September 1963, following two years of negotiations, this Federation in turn became the sovereign state, Malaysia, including the former British colonies, Sarawak and Sabah (North Borneo), located on the northwest coast of Borneo. Malaysia was duly admitted to membership in the United Nations, occupying the seat of the former Federation of Malaya. Indonesia, under Sukarno, had consistently challenged the procedure, entering upon forceful attack. Numerous military invasions of the Borneo elements were repulsed by the Malaysia armed forces, aided by some British troops. The Philippines also entered a legal claim to the Borneo territories.

Early in 1966 a military coup occurred in Indonesia, toppling the Sukarno regime. Lieut. Gen. Suharto assumed leadership of the new military junta, designating the experienced Adam Malik as Foreign Minister to succeed Dr. Subandrio who was arrested on charges of treason.

Sukarno was retained as a figurehead of government, stripped of all essential powers. The Indonesia Provisional People's Consultative Congress unanimously approved overthrow of the Sukarno regime, and ordered the complete realignment of the foreign policy. After careful negotiations, on Aug. 11, 1966, Abdul Razak, Malaysia Vice-President, and Adam Malik, Indonesia Foreign Minister, signed a formal accord and treaty, declaring the cessation of hostilities between the two countries. The accord also provided for the restoration of normal diplomatic relations, and pledged to the citizens of Sabah and Sarawak (North Borneo) the right to a plebiscite to determine their future status as between Indonesia and Malaysia. The restoration of normal trade and cultural relations is implicit in the accord.

On Feb. 7, 1885, WILLIAM F. OLDFHAM (later bishop) arrived at Singapore with JAMES M. THOBURN (later bishop), to establish work under appointment of the SOUTH INDIA ANNUAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church. Within a month Oldham had organized a church and quarterly conference, including English, Eurasians, Tamils and Chinese in membership. The Municipality granted land, and the first church building was erected that year. The Chinese colony provided several thousand dollars for a school. The Tamils developed their own church and school. In 1887 the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY appointed Sophia Blackmore of Australia, under support of the Minneapolis Branch. She arrived July 18 and promptly opened a school for Tamil girls. Miss Blackmore gave forty years of service in Malaya.

The Malaya work passed to the BENGAL CONFERENCE at its organization in 1887. In 1889 the work became the Malaya Mission, and the Malaysia Mission Conference in 1894. Annual Conference status was gained in 1902. The extensive growth of work among the Chinese prompted separate organization for that element, as the Malaysia Mission Conference 1936, Provisional Annual Conference 1940, and Malaysia Chinese Annual Conference, 1948.

Among the early missionaries in Malaya, William G. Shellabear should be named. English by birth, an officer in the Royal Engineers, ordered to Singapore, he met Oldham. Catching the gleam of missionary service, Shellabear went back to England, resigned his commission, married, and returned to the new line of duty among the Malays. A born linguist, he acquired several dialects as well as the basic language, translated and printed much literature in Malay tongue, as he studied, loved and served that fascinating people. Unable to remain on the equator in the later years, Shellabear came to America. He taught oriental languages at DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, and also at Kennedy School of Missions, Hartford, Conn., until his death. "He was a distinguished linguist and scholar, an authority on the Malays and their language, a wise and devoted missionary, and a sincere Christian."

The Methodist Church has grown steadily on the Peninsula, with over eighty churches and about 12,000 members. The chief centers are the capital, Kuala Lumpur, and Klang, Malacca, Seremban, Raub, Ipoh, Sitiawan, Telok Anson, Penang, Taiping. The schools, however, with registration of many thousands, constitute the distinguishing mark of the Mission. Statements concerning Methodist work in Singapore, and Sarawak-Sabah, will be found in separate articles under those titles.

Methodist Church of Malaysia and Singapore. In response to the felt need of an autonomous Methodist Church in Malaysia, and pursuant to permission given by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of The United Methodist Church in 1968 to effect the same, such a Church, denominated the Methodist Church of Malaysia and Singapore, was officially constituted on Aug. 9, 1968. Upon that same day, the first national of that land to be elected a bishop, Dr. YAP KIM HAO, was by ballot elected as the first bishop of the new autonomous Church.

The Malaysia Chinese Annual Conference, the Singapore-Malaya Annual Conference, and the Tamil Provisional Annual Conference in West Malaysia and Singapore, and the Sarawak Annual Conference and the Sarawak Iban Provisional Annual Conference in East Malaysia comprise the new Church. In its structure it has been provided that there shall be a president for each annual conference who will be the administrative head. Not all such presidents will receive remuneration, but will serve in other capacities in the Church. The bishop is looked to as the spiritual leader of the whole Church and his voice is to be the voice of the Church. He makes appointments in each annual conference with the help of an advisory board, and will ordain those who seek ordination as DEACON or ELDER when proper authorization is given.

The early life of the new Church is being guided by eight ministers and eight laymen forming the Executive Council of its General Conference. These will share with Bishop Yap the important task of fashioning policies and procedures, and of establishing the guidelines by which the autonomous Church will function under the new Discipline. "New Life for the New Church" has become the theme for this autonomous Methodist Church as it "faces with vitality and a new commitment the opportunities for effective witness and mission in newly developed nations."

MALDEN, MASSACHUSETTS, U.S.A. Centre Church, located five miles north of Boston, was organized in 1821, largely through the work of shoemaker James Howard in whose home a class was formed. Prior to this time the Methodist influence had been at work through the preaching of GEORGE WHITEFIELD (in 1740 and 1770) and JESSE LEE (1790). Although a class was formed on Cross Street at the time of Lee's preaching, no permanent results followed.

The Malden congregation, outgrowing two earlier buildings, each one at different sites (one erected in 1826, the other in 1856), constructed the present large, red brick edifice on Washington and Pleasant Streets in 1874. A three-story brick building was added in 1911.

The congregation numbering in 1970, 1,071 members has been influential in civic, educational and philanthropic circles. Four pastors of this church have become bishops: ERASTUS O. HAVEN, GILBERT HAVEN, JR., EDWIN HOLT HUGHES, and LAURESS J. BIRNEY. Another pastor, LUCIUS BUGBEE, became the editor of Methodist church school publications. From this church eighteen men have gone into the ministry.

MALLALIEU, WILLARD FRANCIS (1828-1911), American bishop, was born at Sutton, Mass., Dec. 11, 1828, and was educated at WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in Connecticut.

He joined the New England CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in 1858 and was pastor at Grafton, Mount Bellingham, Chelsea, Lynn, Monument Square, Charleston; Bromfield Street, Boston; Walnut Street, Chelsea; Trinity in Worcester; Broadway in South Boston; and presiding elder of the Boston District. He was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1872, 1880, and 1884. At the last he was elected bishop. He served for nine years as bishop in NEW ORLEANS, four years in Buffalo, N. Y., eight in Boston. He retired in 1904.

Bishop Mallalieu received honorary degrees from East Tennessee Wesleyan University and New Orleans University. He was the author of the Why, When and How of Revivals, The Fullness of the Blessing of the Gospel of Christ, and Words of Cheer and Comfort. He died on Aug. 1, 1911 at Auburndale, Mass., and was buried in Bay View.

MALLINSON, WILLIAM (1854-1936), British layman and philanthropist, was born at Whitechapel, LONDON, July 6, 1854. He was a timber merchant and prospered in business. Brought up a member of the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES, he became treasurer of the London Church Extension and Mission Committee in 1893 and held office for forty years. During this period the United Methodist Free Churches—and after 1907 the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH—built under his leadership in London thirty chapels and thirteen schools. He endowed the Mallinson Trust for the benefit of London churches, and carried through a scheme for the extinction of all debt on United Methodist chapels in London and the home counties, the amount totaling £66,000. He held other connexional offices, was a magistrate, and was created a baronet in May, 1935. He died on May 5, 1936, at Walthamstow, London.

MALTBY, WILLIAM RUSSELL (1866-1951), British Methodist, was born at Selby, Yorkshire, on Dec. 5, 1866. A Wesleyan Methodist minister's son, he qualified as a solicitor in 1892, but in 1893 entered the Wesleyan ministry. He was warden of the WESLEY DEACONESS ORDER from 1920-40. He was President of the Wesleyan Conference in 1926. In 1928 he gave the Burwash Memorial Lecture, on The Significance of Jesus. He delivered the first Cato Lecture in AUSTRALIA in 1935, Christ and His Cross. He strongly supported proposals to admit women to the Methodist ministry.

MALVERN, ARKANSAS, U.S.A. Rockport Church is one of the earliest churches organized west of the Mississippi River, established in 1816 by JOHN HENRY. The first Rockport Church was built of logs and heated by a large stone fireplace with split log benches for seats and a split log table. It was situated on the Ouachita River on the north side of the Military Road, which was then the Southwest Indian Trail. One of the first bridges across the Ouachita River was built at this point about two miles northwest of Malvern.

One of the earliest settlers was Christian Fenter, and most of the preachers in early days stayed in his home when they preached or traveled by. The township in which Rockport is located is named after him.

In 1877 the Rockport Methodists decided to move their church building to Malvern, because the railroad had come through that place in 1871, and most of the members at Rockport moved into Malvern. At Malvern itself a new church building was erected in 1888. During the time the building was going on in Malvern, the Methodists who remained at Rockport reassembled and held services in the public school building at Rockport. When the congregation at Malvern did build their new church, the church at Rockport bought back their old church building for $50, moved it back to Rockport where it stands today.

During the Centennial celebration of ARKANSAS in 1936, which was also the centennial of the Rockport Church having been established as a preaching circuit, the church received a visit from President Franklin D. Roosevelt and his wife. The President delivered an address to several thousand people from the porch of this old church, and the sermon for the occasion was preached by Bishop JOHN M. MOORE of Dallas, Texas.

Rockport Church has been remodeled and repaired many times and is today a neat frame building sitting at the intersection of two well-traveled, paved highways. The people in that section consider it a monument to the religious devotion and endeavors of their pioneer ancestors.

MANCHESTER, ARKANSAS, U.S.A. The first Methodist church east of the Ouachita River was organized in 1837 by Jacob Custer. It was located on one acre of land given by George S. Wimberley. The chartered members of this church included the following: Thomas C. and Jamima Hudson, Nathan and Nancy Strong, Miss Tennessee Hudson, Miss Mariah Strong, and one colored member, Laney. Later came the Joneses, the Bullocks, the Littlejohns, and the Sims. The Manchester Church was the strongest church in the south ARKANSAS area during the days of its prosperity. Preaching was held in homes of the members until a log cabin of one room was built in 1844. It was named the Manchester M. E. Church.

About 1850 the Princeton Circuit was set off, embracing nearly all the territory between the Ouachita River on the west, Saline on the east, Camden on the south, Hot Springs on the north, of which Manchester was the principal church. In 1863 the Manchester Church, due to the problem of slavery, changed its name to the Manchester M. E. Church, South, which it remained until unification in 1939.

In 1888 Manchester Church was divided due to a growing community called Dalark. At this time the Manchester M. E. Church, South moved from the one-room log building to its present location, which was given by Mr. and Mrs. W. F. McCaskell, and two sons, Joe and Charlie Neal. This deed is recorded in the Circuit Court Clerk's office in Arkadelphia, Ark., Sept. 20, 1910.

In 1910 and 1911, under the capable leadership of J. H. McKelvey, the first part of the present building was constructed. It continued in use till 1938 under the capable leadership of A. J. Bearden. The present sanctuary was added to the old part of the original church. The original church was made into class rooms for the church school. At this time it was placed on the Dalark Charge. In 1970 Manchester had a membership of 74 with an average attendance of seventy at its morning service.

J. J. MCKNIGHT

MANCHESTER, CONNECTICUT, U.S.A. In August 1790, GEORGE ROBERTS, assistant to JESSE LEE, organized a Methodist Society in Manchester in the home of Thomas Spencer. Four years later Bishop ASBURY found a neat house of worship on Spencer Street. In 1821 a larger church was built at the Center, which was used for thirty years.

Three preaching points developed: one in the north section which started its first Sunday school in 1826 and developed into a separate church in 1851. This is today known as St. Paul's in Manchester. One developed in Buckland's Corners and flared up in a revival, but never managed to become an enduring church. The Center congregation moved to the south and built its church in 1854 and this last was destined to endure and to become known today as South Methodist Church.

SOUTH CHURCH, MANCHESTER, CONNECTICUT

South Church today has an elegantly appointed sanctuary and the largest membership of any church in the NEW ENGLAND SOUTHERN CONFERENCE. The style of the church is Tudor Gothic and is of local grey field stone with trimmings of grey case stone and with English cathedral glass windows leaded in small panes. The building is now covered with ivy. A square tower, sixty-seven feet high and surmounted by turreted battlements, is placed at the southwest corner of the main building and contains a bell from the first Methodist church in Manchester and a memorial set of chime bells ranging in size from 275 to 2,000 pounds. Because of its unique design and setting the South Church has long been a familiar and famous landmark of Manchester, Conn.

Throughout the interior, there are carved oak antique decorations. Julian S. Wadsworth, a former pastor and wood carving enthusiast, carved the Twelve Apostles in oak to form panels in the reredos screen. Guido Mayr of Oberammergau, who portrayed the part of Judas in the "Passion Play," carved a bas-relief of the famous Leonardo da Vinci painting of "The Lord's Supper" across the top of the screen. Other wood carvings decorate the pulpit and lectern and depict the lives of Christ and His Disciples.

The lectern itself is bronze and represents an eagle standing on a globe, a symbol of St. John in his capacity as an Evangelist where "He soared in the Spirit and saw God."

The Pulpit has five carved oak panels representing Biblical references to Christ and His Church. The central panel, carved by Wesley B. Porter, a former member of South Church, symbolizes Christ—The Rose of Sharon and the Cross forming what is known as the "Rose-Croix." At the base of this panel is the inscription, "As a Lily Among Thorns," taken from the Song of Solomon.

The music of South Church has been emphasized for many years with vocal choirs of all ages and a rhythm choir which interprets ideas through rhythmic motion. The large window in the sanctuary, facing east has been given the name of "Creation," for here in the ivy-covered panes, the birds nest year after year and raise their young.

The baptismal font made of Carrara Italian marble is located in the west arm of the cruciform building. The handcarved antique silver lamp which hangs above the font came from one of the ancient churches of Jerusalem and was presented by Mrs. Mattie Case.

Across the street from the Church proper are ten acres of land known as the "South Church Campus," where two Cheney mansions are located. Today, these two mansions provide class space for all the church school below junior high school age, a church parlor for group meetings and a hundred-car parking lot.

From the original membership of six, the church has now grown to 2,397 members, making South Church the largest as well as the most influential church in the New England Southern Conference.

HARVEY K. MOUSLEY

MANCHESTER, England. Manchester's growth into one of the greatest industrial and commercial centers of modern England dates from the industrial revolution of the eighteenth century.

JOHN WESLEY visited Manchester on three occasions before his evangelical conversion to see his friend JOHN CLAYTON. GEORGE WHITEFIELD paid the first of seven visits there in December 1738; and BENJAMIN INGHAM preached in Long Millgate in May 1742. The first Methodist sermon was delivered by JOHN NELSON at Manchester Cross in either 1742 or 1743; but not until CHARLES WESLEY's visit in January 1747 was a society formed. JOHN BENNET, who had already pioneered Methodism in the surrounding villages, added the society to his round in March of that year; and John Wesley came in May 1747, when he preached at Salford Cross. This new society had several homes, including a garret by the river Irwell and a Baptist chapel in Shudehill, before a chapel was begun in Birchlin Lane in 1750. Completed in 1751, it was, with Liverpool, the first Methodist chapel in Lancashire.

In 1752 Manchester became the head of a circuit covering much of Lancashire and Cheshire. The following year, despite the defection of John Bennet, there were 250 members, and the chapel had to be enlarged. In 1765 the Conference met in Manchester for the first time, a sign of the town's growing connectional importance. In 1781 Birchlin Lane was replaced by the Oldham Street Chapel, which was "about the size of that in London." For some years later after 1788 there was a close link with the nearby St. James' Church, and the Oldham Street congregation attended services there in a body. The Wesleys also played a part in setting up interdenominational Sunday schools in Manchester in 1786.

After 1751 John Wesley usually visited Manchester every year. On Easter Day, 1790, his last visit, he described 1,600 communicants at Oldham Street. The membership grew with the rapid rise in the town's population—in 1799 there were 2,225 members in Manchester and Salford. More chapels were built: Gravel Lane, Salford, 1791; Great Bridgewater Street, 1801; Swan Street, 1808 (closed, 1826); Chancery Lane, 1817; Grosvenor Street, 1820. In 1826 four large chapels were built: Irwell Street, Salford; Ancoats; Oxford Road; and Oldham Road, Wesley.

In 1824 a second Wesleyan circuit was formed, with Grosvenor Street at its head. For some years this was the wealthiest chapel and circuit in the British connection, as may be seen from its contributions in THE CENTENARY FUND, 1839. Despite the Warrentite secession of 1834-35 (see below), Wesleyan Methodist membership reached 10,000 in Manchester in 1853. The second Wesleyan theological college, Didsbury, was built there in 1842. In 1886, when the central area was beginning to lose ground, the first Wesleyan Central Mission was begun in Manchester under SAMUEL COLLIER. The failing Oldham Street Chapel, now surrounded by warehouses, was closed in 1883, and the Central Hall was erected on the same site.

Collier built up what he called "the largest congregation in the world," which met for more than twenty years in the famous Free Trade Hall until the Albert Hall was built in 1910 as its permanent home. This is still the preaching center of the mission. The first General Chapel Committee met in Manchester in 1790; from this grew the Wesleyan Methodist Department for CHAPEL AFFAIRS, which was established in Manchester in 1855. It remains the only British Methodist departmental headquarters outside London.

The METHODIST NEW CONNEXION started in the city in 1797, when a secession took place, mainly in Salford. Manchester formed one of the first seven Methodist New Connexion circuits. Mount Zion Chapel, Nicholas Croft, was built in 1800, but had to be relinquished in 1808 for a smaller building in Oldham Street. The cause made little progress until 1835, when a new chapel was opened in Peter Street. The Methodist New Connexion Book Room was in the city from 1827-44, and the Jubilee Conference of the denomination was held there in 1846. Salem Chapel, Strangeways, was opened in 1851 and the following year became the head of a Manchester North Circuit. Apart from strong churches at Pendleton and Newton Heath, the New Connexion made slow progress; in 1906 the total membership of the two circuits was fourteen hundred.

On the other hand, the secession of 1834-35 under SAMUEL WARREN was much more serious, as Warren was then superintendent of the Wesleyan Oldham Street Circuit. About a thousand members left the four Manchester circuits and formed the Wesleyan Methodist Association. Their chapels were often built as close as possible to those of their Wesleyan rivals. Sunday school teachers seem to have played an important part in the division. Membership fell slightly after the initial excitement, but in 1851 there were eleven Association chapels in the Manchester registration district, compared with eighteen Wesleyan, five Methodist New Connexion, and two PRIMITIVE METHODIST chapels. These Association chapels entered union with the Wesleyan Reformers in 1857, and membership then increased. In 1876 the resulting UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES opened their ministerial training college in Manchester at Victoria Park.

As for Primitive Methodism, evangelism probably reached Manchester late in 1819. By October 1820 there were 130 members, and in 1821 Manchester was constituted a separate circuit. The first chapel was in Jersey Street, Ancoats, opened in 1823, followed by one in the Oxford Road, and in King Street, Salford. The main expansion came between 1850 and 1900, when several large chapels were built, including Great Western Street, in Moss Side, and Higher Ardwick. The Primitive Methodist theological college, Hartley, was set up in Manchester in 1868, not far from Great Western Street. In 1932 there were twelve Primitive Methodist circuits in the city area, with thirty-eight churches. These circuits, together with the Wesleyan circuits, joined the six UNITED METHODIST CHURCH circuits (formed in the union of 1907) in 1932. The strength of the Wesleyans was approximately equal to that of the other two bodies combined.

Despite the decline in religious observance in England and the fall of Manchester's population, it was more than twenty years before the rationalization of the city's circuits neared completion. Membership has fallen steadily since 1932; and although the number of chapels has been reduced from about one hundred in 1932 to about fifty-six in 1965, some overlapping remains. Other changes included the removal of Didsbury College to BRISTOL in 1945 and the closure of Victoria Park College in 1932, when it was amalgamated with Hartley to become HARTLEY VICTORIA COLLEGE. The Central Hall in Oldham Street was damaged by bombs in the Second World War, but reopened in 1954. The offices of the Chapel Affairs Department remain in the building.

E. A. ROSE

MANCHESTER, NEW HAMPSHIRE, U.S.A., is situated on the east bank of the Merrimack River and on the Boston and Maine Railroad in the south central portion of the state. Its territory was traversed by the early pioneers of Methodism, although because of its connection with older appointments, the name appears first in the conference minutes in 1819. Services were occasionally held at the Town House by Reuben Peaslee of Hampstead, and later by John Haskell, a member of the Legislature, both local preachers. Orlando Hines, here a few years on a part-time basis, was the first Methodist to administer the ordinance of BAPTISM in this town, having baptized Mrs. Edna Procter and Miss Rhoda Hall by immersion about 1827. Made a part of the Poplin Circuit, embracing Popkin, Chester, Sandown, and Manchester in 1828, it was the scene of a great revival a year later, with meetings conducted by JOHN BRODHEAD and Caleb Lamb, preachers on the circuit. Eighty were converted, among them James M. Young and James McCaïne, who entered the Methodist ministry.

On Sept. 29, 1829 the first Methodist society was organized in the kitchen of Israel Morrill on Huse Road with eighty members. A church commenced at the Center was completed the following year at a cost of $1,800. This building was used for ten years. On Dec. 16, 1839, a new church society was organized and building erected on the corner of Hanover and Chestnut Streets. This was soon removed to the corner of Pine and Merrimac Streets and was transferred later to another denomination. In 1842 a brick church on Elm Street was built at a cost of $16,000 when John Jones was pastor. The lower part of this Elm Street Church was occupied by stores. In 1856 a third society was organized as the North Elm Street Church, which first met in a hall up the street. It continued in existence until 1862, when it was united with the old church and Bishop OSMON C. BAKER named the new organization St. Paul's and appointed JAMES MONROE BUCKLEY as pastor. In 1875 a society known as The Tabernacle was organized and held services in Smythe's Hall. It continued six years, but gradually growing weaker it finally favored re-uniting with St. Paul's to help build a new church.

At the north end a new society was organized in 1886 called The People's Church. W. A. Loyne was appointed pastor. The City Hall, the Y.M.C.A. parlor, and homes were the scenes of services, until a lot at the corner of Pine and Penacock Streets was secured and a chapel built. Later the name was changed to St. James' Church and during M. V. B. Knox's pastorate, 1891-92, a fine new church was built. This was merged with St. Paul's during the pastorate of Franklin P. Frye, Oct. 1, 1951.

Feeling itself no longer at the center due to population shifts, Center Church considered the need for moving. While J. W. Bean was pastor, 1885-87, a lot was bought on Valley and Jewett Streets and a house built, later to be used as a parsonage though at first this was used for chapel services. When Claudius Byrne became pastor, the Center Church was moved to a location next to the parsonage, raised, and a story built beneath it for a vestry and the house finished for a parsonage. Here the membership remained until 1920, when with Centenary aid they erected a splendid modern plant, now known as First Church. New pews, a new chancel, and a change of the choir loft was made during the pastorate of Ray H. Cowen in 1953-54, at a cost of $14,200. In 1960, $12,400 was spent on redecorating the sanctuary, installing new light fixtures, covering the floor with tile and laying asphalt driveways to church and parsonage.

From 1891-1911 some work was carried on in a chapel at Massabosic Lake, which for a time was a Methodist Church served by the pastor at First Church, but because of lack of growth the work was given up. In 1888, Louis N. Beaudrey, a French missionary, began work in Manchester among French people. This subsequently was carried on by Thomas A. Dorion in 1889, and by Emile J. Palisoul for many years. In October 1895, a church society was organized on the west side with sixteen members. This was called Trinity Church. The following year there were thirty-nine members, a congregational average attendance of 150 and a Sunday school of sixty students. With the purchase of a schoolhouse on School Street and much sacrifice, a desirable house of worship was made in 1897. This served nobly until with the gradual weakening a merger was effected with St. James Church in 1940.

The 1970 statistical report gives: Manchester, First, 644 members, 359 church school members, and property valued at $403,175. St. Pauls, 444 members, 147 church school, and $301,000 property values.

MANEFIELD, ALBERT GEORGE (1896-1963), Australian minister, was born at Wallsend, New South Wales, Australia. He was accepted as a candidate for the ministry in 1919, trained at LEIGH COLLEGE, and ordained in 1925.

Prior to appointment as Assistant Home Mission Secretary in 1934, he ministered in the Far West and North West Missions of New South Wales. He was appointed Home Mission Secretary in 1940 and became General Superintendent in 1949, which position he held until retirement in 1962.

He was elected President of the NEW SOUTH WALES CONFERENCE in 1954. It is recognized that his work and vision made possible the Methodist Nursing Service in the Far West of New South Wales. He was responsible for the establishment of the Deaconess Order in New South Wales.

He was an able administrator, a competent preacher and a significant leader. He was the Convenor of the Federal Home Missions Council and the Canberra Consultative Council in the Australian Capital Territory.

MANGUNGU, Northland, NEW ZEALAND, situated on the Hokianga River, was the site of the re-establishment of the Wesleyan mission following the forced withdrawal from Wesleydale, and the return of the missionaries to NEW SOUTH WALES in January, 1827.

The mission party, led by JOHN HOBBS arrived at the Hokianga Heads on the "Governor Macquarie" on Oct. 31, 1827. They settled temporarily at Horeke under the protection of the great chief, Patuone. Shortly afterward, land was secured but not occupied at Te Toke.

Final choice fell on Mangungu, where an area of 850 acres was purchased. The missionaries moved in on March 28, 1828, and established a base from which the work spread throughout the whole country. It continued to be of importance until the late 1850's, when as a result of population movements, it was largely abandoned in favor of Waima.

MANHATTAN, KANSAS, U.S.A., First Church, is a large church serving not only the community but the Kansas State University of Manhattan. It records for itself an interesting and colorful past. The Kansas-Nebraska Bill of 1854, with its doctrine of "Popular Sovereignty," which left the slavery question up to the settlers, created a rush of emigrants hurrying to settle the West and taking one side or the other of the slavery issue. The groups that came to the junction of the Blue and Kansas Rivers were predominantly Northern Methodists, and were there to keep KANSAS a free state. ISAAC T. GOODNOW, professor at the Providence Seminary at East Greenwich, R. I., was the leader, along with his wife's brother, JOSEPH DENISON. Denison was to be the first regular minister of the M. E. Church in Manhattan.

These folk came to Kansas in 1855, built a church, established Bluemont Central College (which later became Kansas State University), and helped to make Kansas a free state. Charles H. Lovejoy held the first Methodist church services on March 25, 1855. The Church was really first established on the Hartford, a steamboat bringing a group of ardent free-staters from CINCINNATI, Ohio, to Kansas. This group was organized under the leadership of Judge John Pipher on April 30, 1855. On its return the Hartford burned, but the bell, known as the "Hartford Bell" is still a museum piece in Manhattan First Church. The name "Manhattan" was chosen because money was given to the settlers by donors from the island of Manhattan, NEW YORK CITY, with the understanding that this would be the name. Nearby is the famous "Beecher Bible and Rifle Church" at Wabauunsee.

Bluemont Central College, chartered in 1858 under the auspices of the Kansas-Nebraska Conference of the M. E. Church, began classes in 1859. Washington Marlatt was its promoter and first president. He was joined by Isaac T. Goodnow and Joseph Denison in the establishment of the Kansas State Agricultural College. This received the first land grant provided for Kansas under the Morrill Act. Bluemont Central College was turned over to the State, and eventually became Kansas State University.

The University has several buildings named after former Methodist ministers, including Goodnow, Washington Marlatt, and Joseph Denison. First Church in 1970 had 2,635 members, and property valued at $947,000.

MANILA, Philippines. The city of Manila, on Luzon Island in the Republic of the Philippines, is the cultural, commercial, industrial, educational, and religious center of this relatively new nation. It is the governmental capital, though Quezon City, a former suburb of Manila, is technically the governmental capital of the Republic. Manila's population is approximately one-twentieth of the 35,000,000 people on the whole archipelago.

Manila was the first city in the Philippines entered by Methodist missionaries in 1899, and it has continued to be the "headquarters city" for Methodism and its principal institutions since that time. There are thirty-five Methodist churches in Manila and its immediate environs. The two largest Methodist churches in the Islands are in the heart of Manila, and there are two English-speaking congregations.

HARRIS MEMORIAL SCHOOL, MANILA

Serving the entire archipelago are the following specialized institutions founded by Methodist missionaries, and now largely operated by Filipino pastors, teachers, and technical personnel: the HARRIS MEMORIAL SCHOOL, training young women from all east and southeast Asia as deaconesses and kindergarten teachers; Mary Johnston Hospital, which was destroyed by fire during World War II, and later rebuilt with American and Filipino funds; the Mary Johnston School of Nursing; Eveland Hall, a residence for graduate nurses; Methodist Social Center, including Hugh Wilson Hall, a college girls' dormitory, and pre-school and kindergarten classes, and a dental clinic; and the Methodist Book Room, providing educational and religious reading materials for Methodists and the general public. In cooperation with other Protestant groups in the Philippines, Methodists are engaged in the support and administration of these institutions in Manila: Philippine Christian College; Protestant Chapel and Fellowship Hall at the University of the Philippines; the Sampaloc University Center; and the activities of the National Council of Churches of the Philippines.

MARY JOHNSTON HOSPITAL, MANILA

Mary Johnston Hospital began with the dream of Dr. Rebecca Parish when she volunteered to go to Manila in 1906 to put her life into the task of saving babies, children, mothers, and to help bring health to the Philippines. By December 10 of that year she had opened Despensaria Betania and the project was underway.

D. S. B. Johnston of St. Paul, Minn., gave $12,500 for a hospital to be a memorial for his wife. Located on a sea beach in Manila the hospital was inaugurated on Aug. 18, 1908, with rooms and wards for thirty-five patients. There were three missionaries on the staff, which was headed by Dr. Rebecca Parish, and eleven nursing students.

In 1911, the hospital burned but it was repaired and a third floor for nurses' dormitory was added. In 1913, the Philippine government gave funds for an additional building to house the maternity ward, dispensary and milk station.

At the outbreak of World War II, the hospital became an emergency hospital where the wounded from air raids were hospitalized. The Imperial Japanese Army allowed work to continue under the supervision of the Filipino staff. The hospital burned on Feb. 5, 1945, during the liberation of Manila.

On Sept. 3, 1949, the cornerstone of the new building was laid. On Aug. 26, 1950, the new building was inaugurated with President Elpidio Quirino as the main speaker. The new 137-bed hospital was designed to serve as a general hospital, accommodating men, women, and children. As in the past, crowds still throng to the hospital, seeking health, hope and happiness. After the war until his death in 1964 the administrator of the hospital was Dr. GUMERSINDO GARCIA, SR.

MANLEY'S CHAPEL, located in Henry County, Tenn., U.S.A., was the first church in the territory now embraced by the MEMPHIS CONFERENCE of The United Methodist Church. In 1820 a local Methodist preacher, John Manley, organized the church and the first pastor was Benjamin Peeples, who had been sent by the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE to organize Methodist work in the territory. The original log church was built in 1821, but was soon replaced by a larger log building, as Manley's Chapel became the head church and center of the Sandy River Circuit.

In 1823 the Manleys donated land and John Manley, in conjunction with Richard and Hamlin Manley, William and Abraham Walters, T. F. Lilley, Johanan and Robert Smith, James and John Randle, Henry Wall, Joel, John and W. T. Hagler, the Moodys, the Lowrys and a few others organized a camp ground around the church. The annual CAMP MEETINGS became a vital part of Manley's Chapel and were held every year but one until 1912.

The old log church was replaced by a frame structure in 1857, when W. H. Gillespie was pastor, and in 1934, when the site of Manley's Chapel had become inaccessible to automobiles, a church built largely of materials salvaged from the old building was constructed on a location donated by Melvin Carter. On this site about seven miles from Paris, Tenn., on Reynoldsburg Road, a new brick church was erected and dedicated on Nov. 2, 1958.

MANNING, CHARLES (1714-1799), British Anglican, was the son of a Norwich painter. He graduated from Caius College, Cambridge, and from 1738 to 1757 was rector of Hayes, Middlesex. He supported the Wesleys and attended the Conferences of 1747 and 1748. He is said to have officiated at John Wesley's wedding in 1751, but there is no entry in the parish register to confirm this statement.

MANSELL, HENRY (1833-1911), pioneer M. E. missionary in INDIA, was a graduate of ALLEGHENY COLLEGE. He then married Annie Benschoff, and they arrived in India in 1863. He founded a boys' school at Pauri, Garhwal, out of which has grown the Messmore College, named for JAMES MESSMORE, one of his colleagues who was associated with the institution for many years.

Mansell was the first principal of the Centennial School at LUCKNOW, forerunner of LUCKNOW CHRISTIAN COLLEGE. He was principal of Bareilly Theological Seminary, 1884-85, and of Philander Smith College at Naini Tal.

Mansell acquired a mastery of Hindu and Urdu; and in addition to preaching often in these languages, he wrote many articles and a number of books, including commentaries on the Old Testament prophecies, as well as adaptations and translations of English language commentaries.

His children became the first second-generation M.E. missionaries in India. A daughter, Hattie, was sent to India by the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY and, after brief service in Moradabad, joined ISABELLA THORBURN as a professor in the Woman's College at Lucknow. She later married David C. Monroe, and their son, Harry Monroe, served as a missionary in India. A son, William Mansell, became principal of Lucknow Christian College during the furlough of the founder, and later was principal of the Bareilly Theological Seminary.

MANSFIELD, RALPH (1799-1880), early missionary to AUSTRALIA, was born at Liverpool, England on March 12, 1799, the son of Ralph and Ann Mansfield. He was ordained in 1820, designated as a missionary to NEW SOUTH WALES, and received into full connexion at the Conference of 1823. After an eventful voyage in the Surry, anchor was cast at Hobart Town where he "was graciously received by His Honour, Lieutenant-Governor Sorrell with permission to preach and with a guard of constables to prevent disturbances." Arriving in SYDNEY, he was appointed Secretary of the auxiliary of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. He had a first-class flair for journalism and co-edited the Australian Magazine which showed interest in secular matters. It was successful but its policy disturbed the Wesleyan Committee in England who prohibited its publication.

In July 1823, he was appointed to Van Diemen's land and in Hobart Town presided at the first business meeting of the Hobart Town Society on Aug. 11, 1823. In 1824 Lieutenant-Governor Arthur desired to form a native establishment for the education and civilization of the aborigines. Mansfield was keen to establish a training school for young men in this missionary enterprise. Nothing concrete seems to have developed.

The Lieutenant-Governor assisted in the building of a chapel and asked that a chaplain be nominated for Macquarie Harbour. Again the London committee rejected local suggestions. Mansfield was transferred to Sydney in June 1825. He became the District Secretary. The London committee was unsympathetic toward suggestions from Mansfield, and he was disciplined for preaching during church hours and administering Holy Communion. In 1838 the committee refused to increase or consider New South Wales requests for increased living allowances. Mansfield, incensed at their parsimony, resigned in October 1828. He wrote, "I formally resign but am virtually expelled. I do not resign the Ministerial office but simply that of a Wesleyan missionary. As a local preacher I hope that I may still be useful to the cause of God."

His resignation and slight obstinacy was a serious loss to the connexion. He became joint-editor with Robert Howe of The Sydney Gazette in January 1829. A month later Howe was drowned and Mansfield became sole editor. He was editorially involved in political concerns and supported Governor Darling. In 1831 he printed the first issue of the Government Gazette and for eight years contributed to The Colonist. Keenly interested in education, he became the Secretary of the Protestant committee opposed to Governor Burke's "Irish system of National Education."

In 1836 he was director and secretary of the Australian Gaslight Company, secretary of the Sydney Floating Bridge Company and Royal Exchange Company. In 1841 he was appointed Editor of The Sydney Morning Herald of left-wing politics.

Deeply attached to the church, he felt it an honor to hold the position of first secretary to the Baptist Church in New South Wales.

He died at Parramatta on Sept. 1, 1880, remembered as a man of courage, a layman who never lost his missionary vision, a man of rare ability who served God and man.

MANSO, JUANA (1819-1875), was an Argentine educator and writer. In 1836 she went into exile in MONTEVIDEO, URUGUAY, because of political persecution by partisans of the Argentine dictator Juan Manuel de Rosas. When Rosas partisans dominated that city also, her family fled to BRAZIL. There Miss Manso married a Brazilian musician, Francisco Paula de Noronha, whom she accompanied to the United States. There she deserted her. Probably sometime during her stay in the United States she became a Methodist. Shortly after Rosas had fallen, she returned to BUENOS AIRES (in 1854) and became active in the Methodist church there.

The great Argentine educator, President Domingo F. Sarmiento, charged her with organizing public libraries. She was one of the very few persons who joined Sarmiento in his revolutionary ideas on public education. She was founder of the government publication, Los Anales de la Educacion Comun (Annals of Common Education). She wrote books on pedagogy, but also wrote in the fields of history and sociology and was the author of novels and plays.

One of Miss Manso's novels, La hija del comendador (The Commander's Daughter), was a cry against slavery—obviously written under the influence of Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin, published two years before. Miss Manso was concerned with social problems and the advancement of young women. Already, during her stay in Montevideo, she had founded the Young Ladies' Athenaeum, and in Buenos Aires she started one of the first women's magazines in the country, Album de Señoritas (Young Ladies' Album).

Her life in the United States stirred in Miss Manso a desire to establish Sunday schools in her mother country. In 1870 she published in Argentina a booklet describing Sunday schools in North America.

Miss Manso confronted many hardships and persecutions because of her Protestant profession, extending even to her death bed. She was buried in the British (Protestant) Cemetery in Buenos Aires, but in 1920 her remains were transferred to the National Mausoleum of the Teaching Profession.

MANTRIPP, JOSEPH CLOSS (1867-1943), British Methodist, was born at Lowestoft in 1867. He entered the PRIMITIVE METHODIST ministry in 1891. He became secretary of the Derby Conference in 1913, and from 1926 to 1931 served as CONNEXIONAL EDITOR. After METHODIST UNION in 1932 he was deputy editor. His publications included The Faith of a Christian (Hartley Lecture, 1931) and, later, The Devotional Use of the Methodist Hymn Book and The Great Good News. He was a valued member of the Methodist Union Committee, and high tribute was paid to his editorial work as a member of the Methodist Hymn-Book Committee. He died on Feb. 3, 1943.

MANUAL LABOR SCHOOL, west of Covington, Newton County, GEORGIA, was a forerunner of EMORY UNIVERSITY in Atlanta, and of EMORY COLLEGE (later called Emory-at-Oxford and now again Emory College). The Manual Labor School was established in 1834 but was absorbed by Emory College in 1840. Emory College was named in memory of Bishop JAMES O. ANDREW's episcopal classmate, Bishop JOHN EMORY, who was killed in a carriage accident in 1835. Manual labor was a part of the college (chartered Dec. 19, 1836) program but was doomed to failure. One year after absorption of the Manual Labor School, the system was dropped.

Because the latter school was not as successful as it had been hoped, the 1836 GENERAL CONFERENCE noted that RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE in VIRGINIA was too distant for Georgia youth who might want an education under Methodist auspices. So the Conference acted on IGNATIUS FEW's suggestion to establish a Methodist college in Georgia. Samuel Bryan and Thomas Benning were appointed agents to raise $100,000 for it. Few was chairman, and then became the college's first president. It is significant that he was also the prime mover in plans for the Manual School.

Few inspected land purchased by the Manual Labor School lying one to three miles north-northwest of Covington. The college and the 330 acres of that land laid out for the college town of Oxford are both named for "the seat of learning of John and Charles Wesley."

MAORI KING MOVEMENT. In 1858 a confederation of powerful inland tribes in the Waikato area of the North Island of NEW ZEALAND "elected" an aged chief, Potatau Te Wherowhero, as the first Maori king. The purpose was threefold: to oppose further sales of land to European settlers; to secure law and order among warring tribes, in which it was felt that the European administration had failed; and to seek to recapture the dwindling prestige of the Maori people.

Through the intervening years "the king movement" has lost much of its early political significance, and remains as a cultural and spiritual link between all the Maori tribes of New Zealand. The Movement's headquarters is the Turangawaewae Pa, at Ngaruawahia, and the present leader is Queen Te Ata-i-rangi-kaahu, sixth in line of direct descent from the first Maori king, NGATETE KERAI KUKUTAI, a New Zealand minister, was a respected friend and adviser of the Movement.

MARIETTA, GEORGIA, U.S.A., First Church, was organized in 1833 in the home of George W. Winters with thirty-seven charter members, John P. Dickinson serving as pastor. Shortly thereafter a building was erected on Husk Street at Whitlock Avenue.

Under the pastorate of Charles R. Jewett in 1848 a new sanctuary was dedicated on Atlanta Street at Waverly Way. Here the first Sunday school was organized. The first railroad in Cobb County began operations Sept. 15, 1845, from Marietta to "Marthasville"—renamed "Atlanta" two years later. Marietta was directly in the path of Sherman's march-to-the-sea and was all but destroyed by the ravages of that terrible conflict. Although the parsonage was burned, the church building was spared and is still standing.

In June 1878 the first WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY in Southern Methodism was organized by this congregation. Some years later it merged with the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY and, after unification in 1939, became known as the WOMAN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE.

At the turn of the century a new building on Atlanta and Anderson Streets was built during the pastorate of J. W. Quillian and dedicated by W. W. Wadsworth. This plant, with subsequent additions, served admirably for some sixty years. During World War I, sixty-three of its members entered the armed services and during World War II a service flag with seventy-seven stars was proudly displayed. At the Atlanta Street location the membership grew from 455 in 1896 to 2,115 as reported in 1965. Numerically it had then become the fifth largest in the NORTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE and had long since outgrown its physical capacity.

In September 1909, Dr. Fred P. Manget, with a M.D. degree from EMORY, returned to Marietta and married Louise Anderson, daughter of W. D. Anderson, a beloved former pastor of this church. This dedicated young couple left immediately for the Orient, founded, and for almost four decades operated the Huchow General Hospital, one of Methodism's great missionary outposts.

In the early 1960's a movement was started for a complete new church facility. Prevailing sentiment was that it should continue as a "downtown" church. During the pastorate of Gordon Thompson (1957-61), enough money was raised to buy several acres within two blocks of the Public Square, and to have left a substantial start on a building fund. It is interesting to note that this tract of land included the site of the original church built in 1835.

Under the able leadership of Charles B. Cockran the building program was brought to a successful conclusion. On Jan. 16, 1966, Bishop J. OWEN SMITH with District Superintendent W. Candler Budd consecrated the present plant—said to be one of the finest in GEORGIA Methodism. A church school of thirty-two class rooms, a fellowship hall, administrative offices, library, parlor, and chapel are all air conditioned and tastefully decorated. The sanctuary seats 1,046. Membership in 1970 was 2,103.

MARIETTA, OHIO, U.S.A., an old historic city situated at the confluence of the Ohio and Muskingum Rivers, was the first organized settlement in the Northwest Territory. Methodism began in the new settlement in 1799, when Robert Manley crossed the Ohio River and organized classes. "He was welcomed to the log cabin of Robert McCabe, a shoe-maker-settler, who with his wife and two other couples professed faith in Christ and were constituted the first regular Methodist Church in Ohio." A circuit was organized before the close of the year.

It was with difficulty that Methodism gained a foothold in Marietta. In 1805 JACOB YOUNG, one of the famous frontier preachers, held a successful CAMP MEETING. A number of persons were converted and a class was formed under the leadership of Jones Johnson, who had been a follower of Thomas Paine before his conversion. This class marks the beginning of real growth of Methodism in Marietta.

In 1806, during the pastorate of the famous PETER CARTWRIGHT, a camp meeting was held and a number of influential persons converted. Marietta was at that time a part of the Marietta and Kanawha circuit which extended along the Ohio River for 150 miles and far into (West) Virginia. In 1808 the Marietta Circuit was formed. In 1816 JOHN STEWART, a dissipated black man, was converted and went out as a missionary to the Indians, thus inaugurating the great missionary movement of American Methodism.

For the ten years after their first organization, the Methodists worshiped in private homes and schoolhouses. In 1815 a church building was erected. It was twice enlarged before the erection of the Centenary church in 1839. In this new brick structure the society prospered greatly. In a revival held in 1842 there were 187 new members brought into the membership. The greatest revival in its history swept the church in 1856 when 210 persons were converted. In 1859 Whitney Chapel was formed, mainly from the membership of the Centenary Church. Two bishops, DAVID H. MOORE and EARL CRANSTON, were among the pastors of this church. In 1875 Whitney Chapel and Centenary Church were consolidated to form the First M. E. Church in Marietta. First Church today is still located on the site of the newly formed church and has a membership of 1,383.

Crawford Chapel was erected on the Fort Hammar side of the Muskingum River in 1833. This church and Centenary were a circuit until 1848 when both became stations. In 1895 Crawford Chapel was rebuilt and became the Gilman Avenue M. E. Church. It has sent two missionaries to the foreign field—Miss Carrie Jewell to CHINA, and Miss Esther Devine to INDIA. The Gilman Church today has a membership of 429.

The German Methodist Church was founded in 1839. Many of the early settlers in Marietta came from the northern part of Germany. A number were converted and joined the English Methodist church and organized a class within the church. In June 1839, a mission was organized for the German Methodists when Carl Best was sent to Marietta. The first German Methodist church building was purchased from the English church in 1840, services being held in private homes before this. The congregation continued to worship in this building until 1876 when they relocated and built a new building. The name was changed to Trinity Church during the first World War in 1918. In 1933 the Central German Conference was disbanded and Trinity Church became a part of the Zanesville District of the Ohio Conference.

Other churches in Marietta include the Norwood Church which has 568 members, the John Stewart Memorial Methodist Church with eight members (this is a Negro church which carries the name of Methodism's first missionary to the Indians); there is also a Wesleyan Methodist Church in Marietta.

MARION, OHIO, U.S.A. Epworth Church, the "mother church" of Methodism in Marion County, Ohio, traces its history back to 1820 when a sturdy group of eight devout pioneers organized the first Methodist class. The first building was erected in 1831, and, becoming speedily outgrown, was replaced in 1845 by a new building known as Centenary M. E. Church. The closeness of the railroad made this location undesirable, and in 1854 the congregation moved to another site where it remained for thirty-five years. In 1890, when the membership had grown to over 600, the present building was erected, which at that time was one of the largest and best church buildings in OHIO.

Four great revivals have made Epworth what it is today: 1854-55, 1869-70, 1893, and 1896. Literally hundreds of members were received into the church, making Epworth the largest church then in the conference. The longest pastorate was that of Jesse Swank, who endeared himself to the entire city. He served from 1915-25. Two former pastors became college presidents: Albert E. Smith, President of OHIO NORTHERN UNIVERSITY for twenty-five years, and JOHN L. HILLMAN, President of SIMPSON COLLEGE. Among the many outstanding laymen who have served Epworth, mention should be made of John H. Clark (1872-1960), for over fifty years a trustee of Ohio Northern University, a delegate to four GENERAL CONFERENCES, a member of the General BOARD OF MISSIONS, and of the Book Committee. He taught a Sunday school class for young men which grew to be one of the largest in the state. The membership of Epworth in 1970 was 2,013.

MARKEY, M. BELLE (1875-1961), American missionary to CUBA and MEXICO, was born at MacClenny, Fla., Dec. 8, 1875. Her education was at Polytechnic College, Fort Worth, Texas, SCARRITT COLLEGE and George Peabody College, Nashville, Tenn. After finishing college she taught for two years at Clarendon College, Clarendon, Texas.

In 1902 she was accepted by the Board of Missions (MES) and arrived in Cuba the same year. She was appointed teacher at Irene Toland School, Matanzas, where she remained until 1920 when she was transferred to Colegio Buenavista, Marianao. In 1926 she was transferred to the Centro Cristiano at Chihuahua, Mexico. After forty-one years of service she retired in 1943.

On a visit to Mexico in 1944 she decided to remain for another year as a helper in Chihuahua. Although retired and while living in California she assumed positions of responsibility as a leader and teacher in the local churches. She passed to her reward Feb. 1, 1961 at Pasadena, Calif.

Her work was always characterized by a faithful sense of duty and carefulness in all details.

MARKHAM, EDWIN (1852-1940), American poet, author of "The Man with the Hoe," was a teacher by profession. He was born in OREGON, but in early life moved to a CALIFORNIA farm. Here he developed his love of nature, and in an ungraded school had a teacher who introduced him to the world of poetry. After graduating from the San Jose Normal School he taught in Coloma, Calif., famous as the site of the discovery of gold. Placer mining had given out, but he, as he said, discovered spiritual gold through the visits of the Methodist presiding elder. It was in Coloma that he saw in a magazine a reproduction of Millet's picture and wrote the opening lines of his great poem. For a time he was licensed as a local preacher. His last teaching was as principal of an Oakland, Calif. school. Here he saw the original Millet canvas, and finished his poem.

"The Man with the Hoe" immediately caused nationwide—almost worldwide—controversy. His other best-known poem was "Lincoln, Man of the People." He continued to write and lecture until over eighty years of age.

He was the poet of the social awakening that stirred the church in the early years of the twentieth century. By pen and voice he did much to aid reform movements, as in legislation to prohibit child labor. He was the poet of social reform.

A large man physically, with rugged features crowned with ample white hair and beard, he was to the last an impassioned pleader for "Bread, Beauty, Brotherhood."

MARKSMAN, PETER (? -1892), a Chippewa Indian missionary in the nineteenth century in WISCONSIN and MICHIGAN, was a member of the MICHIGAN CONFERENCE. He grew up among the Chippewa, his father a medicine man, his mother a nominal Roman Catholic. Although little is known about his early life and conversion, he was brought into Methodist circles in 1833 by the Indian missionary John Sunday and JOHN CLARK, who in the 1830's was organizing work among the Indians, and was trained in mission work by ALFRED BRUNSON.

In 1835 he was sent by Clark to establish a mission at Lac Court Oreille in northwest Wisconsin. He accompanied Brunson on a project among the Sioux. From 1840 on he served under appointment in various missions in the Michigan and DETROIT CONFERENCES. He was ordained DEACON in the Michigan Conference in 1842 and ELDER in 1862. In 1844 he married a French-Indian woman, Hannah Morien. He served at various times at Sault Ste. Marie, Fond du Lac, Janesville, Kazier, Grand River, Pesahgening, Saginaw Bay, Iroquois Point, and Sugar Island.

One of the most successful enterprises was work with Indians at Kewawenon mission, a Methodist station at the head of Keweenaw Bay on Lake Superior. Between 1843 and 1847, owing to a mysterious lapse in his life, he was expelled from Michigan Conference, but restored, first on trial, then in 1850 into full connection. In his later years he was highly regarded as an able senior missionary for Indian work, and was recognized in a full obituary in the Conference Minutes when he died, May 28, 1892.

MARKWOOD, JACOB (1815-1873), American United Brethren bishop, son of John and Margaret (Durst) Markwood, was born Dec. 26, 1815, near Charleston, W. Va., and died Jan. 22, 1873, at Luray, Va. He attended public school about one year, but devoted his life to study, reading copiously, becoming scholarly in languages, logic, metaphysics, medicine, and the Bible. He married Arbeline Rodeffer on Sept. 3, 1837.

Converted at seventeen, he joined "Old Stone Church," a congregation of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST in Green Springs, Va. He was licensed to preach and received into the Virginia Annual Conference in 1837, ordained in 1841, and elected presiding elder in 1843, holding that office until he was elected bishop by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1861. Re-elected bishop in 1865, his ill-health prevented re-election in 1869. He was a member of every General Conference from 1841 to 1869. From 1855-1861, he was a member of the denomination's BOARD OF MISSIONS and was sometime Trustee of Mt. Pleasant College and OTTERBEIN UNIVERSITY.

Weak in health, he threw himself without reserve into the work of the Church and the causes he espoused. He was strongly opposed to slavery and this opposition made him persona non grata in his home state of VIRGINIA during the Civil War. An example of a man who burnt himself out for his Lord, he died with the conviction that the Lord had no more work for him to do.

MARLATT, WASHINGTON (1829-1909), American pioneer preacher of the western prairies, was born June 28, 1829, in Wayne County, Ind. He graduated at Asbury University (now DEPAUW) at Greencastle, Ind., in 1853. He studied theology at this university, was licensed to preach, and went to Manhattan, Kan., in 1856. It is said that he came the entire distance on foot and alone.

Marlatt was present at the first Methodist Conference held at Lawrence, KANSAS Territory, in November 1856. He was admitted on probation to the Kansas-Nebraska Conference at Nebraska City in April, 1857. He became a circuit preacher and was assigned to the Wabaunsee Circuit, which included that county, Davis County (later Geary County) and all of the territory west to Pike's Peak in COLORADO. His salary was $100 per year. He traveled over his circuit on horseback. When Bluemont Central College (now Kansas State University) was organized at MANHATTAN in 1859, Marlatt became the first principal. A building on the campus is named for him. Marlatt was instrumental in obtaining much of the land for the first college. He died in Manhattan, Kan., on Sept. 27, 1909, and is buried there.

MARRIAGE. As the foundation of both Church and State rests upon the family, and the family on marriage, it is easy to understand that the marriage relation everywhere should be regarded with the highest respect. In almost all tribes and nations marriage has been considered as a religious rite, and its celebration is universally accompanied by a social sanction and public observance which even among the most primitive peoples may be termed religious. Among the Hebrews this was especially true. In the first book of the Hebrew Scriptures, outlining this relation of man and woman, it is written: "For this cause shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave to his wife; and they shall become one flesh" (Genesis 2:24). This passage the Lord not only referred to, but sealed unto His people by adding to it, "What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder." By the creation of man and woman together in Eden; by the laws written (Levitical code) and unwritten which guard this estate; by the family relationships of our Lord and His Apostles; by His teaching respecting the matrimonial tie—the divine seal has been set on the marriage institution. With the growth of the priesthood this class always took over the celebration of this Rite.

Matrimony was raised to the dignity of a SACRAMENT by the Roman Church during medieval times, and is still so regarded by that Church. That marriage itself is a Sacrament was denied by the Reformers. In following the Church of England's teaching in this regard, Methodism in its ARTICLE ON RELIGION XVI, after explaining the two Sacraments ordained of God (BAPTISM and the LORD'S SUPPER) this Article goes on to name matrimony as an "allowable estate." However, marriage has been regarded among all Christian people as something more than a mere "allowable estate," and "it is not too much to say that after the convenanting together of man and woman in the sight of God and their solemn promise each to the other, the pronouncing them man and wife together in the Name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost approximates a sacramental act, in the old English sense of a 'making sacred.'" Bishop R. J. COOKE put it: "The solemnization of matrimony is a religious service, and levity or lightness of a manner of any description on the part of the minister should receive a severe rebuke."

Until those comparatively recent times when the Church and State became separate—certainly in America—the whole matter of marriage was left entirely in the hands of the Church, or its ministry. However, eventually the civil power took over and began to regulate the matter of marriage, since marriage is as necessary to its own existence as it is to the life of the Church. The relation of Church and State has nowhere come into stranger complexity than in the "concurrent" jurisdiction which they thus have over the marriage state. In the view of the State, the minister is empowered to authorize and execute a special type of contract between man and woman when they marry each other; and ministers are forbidden to marry persons unless, or until, they procure a civil license.

The Methodist Church for a time followed rather strictly the age-old Christian teaching which warned Christians against being united in marriage with unbelievers or irreligious persons. This was because of the influence which a married partner exercises over the whole of life. The following rules are found in early Methodist Disciplines: "Many of our members have been married with unwakened persons. This has produced bad effects; they have been either hindered for life or have turned back to perdition. To discourage such marriages, 1. Let every preacher publicly enforce the apostle's caution, 'Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers,' II Cor. vi.14. 2. Let all be exhorted to take no step in so weighty a matter without advising with the more serious of their brethren. In general women ought not to marry without the consent of their parents. Yet there may be exceptions. For if, 1, a woman believes it to be her duty to marry; if, 2, her parents absolutely refuse to let her marry any Christian; then she may, nay, ought to marry without their consent. Yet even then a Methodist preacher ought not to be married to her. We do not prohibit our people from marrying persons who are not of our church, provided such persons have the form and are seeking the power of godliness; but we are determined to discourage their marrying persons who do not come up to this description." (Discipline, M. E. Church, 1864, p. 35.)

These regulations were in time dropped from the Discipline, though the danger that prompted them is still felt by many a good pastor and parent.

Methodism has never raised any question concerning the ceremony or rite by which sincere persons marry each other. However, a "civil marriage," in the view of the Roman Catholic Church is no Christian or Sacramental marriage at all, since it is not celebrated by one of her priests, though it is an honorably binding social engagement. This standpoint, however, is not adopted by Protestants, and any properly licensed marriage, whether solemnized by a Justice of the Peace or a minister, is taken as fully valid spiritually in our connection.

Early American Methodist Disciplines, until as late as 1844, directed that the Banns or "ecclesiastical License" for any proposed marriage should be proclaimed in Methodist churches, as they were in the Church of England. But the power of the State to regulate and license the proposed relation of the parties soon superseded the Church's attempt to do so. At present properly ordained ministers who are empowered to solemnize matrimony are simply directed to see that the parties are "qualified according to Law."

Who May Celebrate. As marriage in view of the church has always been a religious rite or observance, its conduct has always been in the hands of the priestly class. In the Middle Ages, when marriage became a sacrament, the priest or bishop had charge of this matter, especially since he joined to it the service of the Mass. In the English Prayer Book, from which we borrowed our office, the officiating minister is commonly termed "the Priest," though there are places where he is termed "the Minister."

When the M. E. Church organized in 1784, the celebration of matrimony in the Sunday Service and Discipline was committed to DEACONS as well as to ELDERS. Within recent years, however, "supply" preachers, even though they may not be ordained, have been allowed to marry couples, but this must only be within their own pastoral charge. When a minister becomes fully ordained, he is entitled to conduct all rites of the church wherever he is.

The Position in Britain. Originally the only way in which it was possible legally to be married in England was in the Established Church, though Scottish law made some provision for "common law" marriages. This strictness was felt to be a disability and hardship by Nonconformists, particularly by Quakers, who professed conscientious scruple at going to the Parish Church, yet who found that their own ceremonies were not recognized by the law. Early Methodists as a matter of course were married in the Church of England, and this custom still continues to some extent, particularly in rural areas. During the last century legislation was passed for the relief of Nonconformity, to make provision for weddings in churches other than the Church of England, and also for purely civil ceremonies at which the law forbids prayers to be said. British Methodist marriages proceed under these Marriage Acts. The legal marriage consists in the presence in the legally registered building of the couple, duly qualified by Registrar's Certificate and by residence, who shall make the declarations required by law in the presence of the Authorized Responsible Person recognized for that building by the Registrar-General, and in the presence of two witnesses. The declaration is one of "no lawful impediment," and of consent to the marriage, and the Authorized Responsible Person must write up the record in the official marriage registers, which he and the witnesses must sign. The law takes no cognizance of what religious ceremonies may be performed, nor does it require that the Authorized Responsible Person be an ordained minister. It is, however, the almost universal custom for the local Trustees of the Church to nominate the minister to the Registrar-General as the Authorized Responsible Person. Thus at the normal Methodist wedding the minister stands in a distinct dual capacity, both as a public legal official performing a civil ceremony, and as a minister performing a Christian marriage at the same time. Yet he does not perform the legally-binding ceremony because he is an ordained minister, but because he is the Authorized Responsible Person under the Marriage Acts. A visiting minister who is not the Authorized Person can and often does come to take the religious service, but the Authorized Person (or a public Registrar), who does not as such have anything to say, must be present to hear the legal declarations, and make and sign the entry in the Registers.

Who May Be Married. From ancient times there have been certain degrees of blood kin which prevent the marriage relation, and in time the medieval church developed a body of canon law which set forth prescribed conditions preventing matrimony, or in case an actual ceremony was had, declaring that the marriage was invalid. The general principle of "forbidden degrees of consanguinity" followed the law of Leviticus, but extended by the sacramental principle that the man and his wife are "one flesh," with the effect that relations by marriage as well as blood relations are included within the "forbidden degrees." In particular, it was against the canon law to marry one's deceased husband's brother (one's "brother"), or one's deceased wife's sister (one's "sister"). The effect of this was to create a very various complication of technical impediments to marriage, which could if necessary be dispensed with by the ecclesiastical courts, or which could give rise to proceedings for nullity. So while there was technically no divorce there were ways of dissolving marriages in cases of pressing necessity. Methodists, with Protestants in general, do not proceed in this way, but follow the civil law. They feel that since the granting of a license now is in the hands of the State, that power can be looked to to follow its own laws, and will refuse a marriage license to persons who cannot be properly qualified. Furthermore, as is well known, the qualifications that the State does make for marriage and annulment, rest heavily upon the laws and customs the Christian Church has long inculcated.

Divorce. Persons who have been divorced present a special problem when they come and ask to be married again by their own minister. The traditional Christian standard from ancient time has been to forbid a second Church marriage to a person who has been party to a divorce, whether "innocent" or "guilty," on the ground that the sacramental union is in principle indissoluble (Mark x:2-9). Divorce is indeed allowable on the ground of adultery (Matthew xix:9), but it is only a legal permission to live apart, and does not bring the right to remarry, as the marriage still in principle exists (Mark x:11-12). However, in the modern period the Protestant Churches have tended to modify this discipline by accommodating it to the mores and laws of the civic community. They have in general been reluctant to call in question the validity of a divorce pronounced by the law of the state. The M. E. Church for many years forbade its ministers to marry any couple where a divorce was involved, unless this divorce was for adultery—"the one scriptural cause," as the M. E. Church, South (which had the same regulation) termed it in its Discipline. However, of recent years The Methodist Church recognized the fact that causes other than adultery may break a marriage, and present regulations in the Book of Discipline so indicate. "Divorce is not the answer to the problems that caused it. It is symptomatic of deeper difficulties,"—so states the 1964 Discipline in its paragraph 1821 dealing with the Christian family. Present regulations provide that "a minister may solemnize the marriage of a divorced person only when he has satisfied himself by careful counseling that (a) the divorced person is sufficiently aware of the factors leading to the failure of the previous marriage, (b) the divorced person is sincerely preparing to make the proposed marriage truly Christian, and (c) sufficient time has elapsed for adequate preparation and counseling. The usual minister endeavors to decide upon each case on its own merits when there is a divorce involved, sometimes refusing to perform the ceremony, sometimes judging that it is right and proper for him to do so after he has looked into the entire situation.

British Methodism. Cases where divorced persons seriously apply for marriage in a Methodist Church are not in general very numerous, for a common feeling is that a civil marriage is the appropriate step in such cases. This is probably the least unsatisfactory solution to a painful and compromised business, for the unfortunate in life are not forbidden to marry, but the Church is not asked publicly to compromise the admitted Christian ideal of life-long and indissoluble marriage. There is also the somewhat invidious problem that the Church of England, which nominally comprises the bulk of the nation, in general adheres to the traditional strict standard, and refuses to marry divorced persons. Thus some who are in fact not Methodist people may at times come making enquiry whether some other Church is more accommodat-ing. The rule is that if a minister is approached to marry a divorced person he shall communicate the matter to the Chairman of the District. If there is any doubt he shall consult with his colleagues in the Circuit, and if there is still doubt the Chairman shall call together a special advisory committee to consider the case. A reasonable interpretation of this procedure is that if there is some person of Christian integrity, well known, who has been the victim of wrongdoing by an erring partner, and who wishes for a second marriage in Church, he or she should not be refused by the Church. But other people, less known to us, and of whose understanding of Christ's marriage law we are less sure, ought not to be encouraged to come for Church weddings, particularly in cases where the divorced party has been guilty of the matrimonial offense. There must be special reason for confidence that the person in question has come to a real change of mind and life. There is on the one hand the possibility of the forgiveness and restoration of sinners, but the Church must be on guard against adjusting her standards to the conventional mores of society, or using her services to give an air of respectability to impenitent sinners against the Christian marriage law of a life-long union. The Church ought to give full moral support to the minister who undertakes the invidious and painful task of upholding the Church's standards in personal pastoral contact. Thus the Standing Orders rightly guarantee the position of a minister who has conscientious scruples against marrying divorced persons.

The Marriage Rite. The rite of matrimony as found in the Methodist Discipline and sent over to American Methodism by JOHN WESLEY himself is an abridgment of the Form of Solemnization of Matrimony in the English Prayer Book. It is a beautiful office, skillfully put together, so as to join devotion and liturgical excellence with a stately and yet gracious service. John Wesley did not change the matrimonial office of the Prayer Book in any way, except to leave out the "wedding"—commonly called the "ring ceremony." In omitting the ring, and all mention of it in the wedding prayer, Wesley followed the Puritan idea, as the Puritans objected bitterly to the wedding ring, which to them savored of the old unreformed ritual.

In American Methodism, however, in the middle of the nineteenth century, the M. E. Churches both put back the ring ceremony, and at present there is a provision for a double ring where the parties each desire to give the other such a token. The word "wed" in old English meant a pledge, or something given in pledge, and "with this ring I thee wed" meant that with this ring I thee pledge. John Wesley sent to American Methodism a marriage service, without a wedding!

In the revision of the marriage rite through the years, not too many changes have been made, though since 1940 the challenge to the parties ("If either of you know any reason why ye may not be lawfully joined together, ye do now confess it") has been omitted, since it is said the parties have already responded to that question before the clerk of the court in order to obtain their license, and satisfied him that they are ready to be married, and therefore, the Church need not stop to challenge them. The omission of this challenge, however, has been to the distaste of some, who feel that it not only belongs in the formal wedding drama, but that the church or minister ought not to pronounce a man and woman husband and wife in the name of the Holy Trinity unless and until he has publicly asked them himself, if they know any reason why they may not be lawfully joined.

A recent revision of the Ritual has clarified certain of the rubrics at the beginning of the wedding service, but no other great change has been made. The British Methodist marriage service has been less revised away from the Anglican original, and has never been without "the giving and receiving of a ring," though the continental custom of the bride also giving a ring to the bridegroom is uncommon. MARRIAGE OF MINISTERS. (See ARTICLES OF RELIGION, Article XXI.)

MARRIOTT, WILLIAM (1753-1815), one of JOHN WESLEY's executors, was born in LONDON on Dec. 16, 1753. Both his parents were among the earliest members of Wesley's society at the FOUNDERY. He was educated first at the school which Wesley started there, and then at Madeley by JOHN FLETCHER. Marriott entered his father's business as a baker but later became a wealthy stock-broker. In 1801 he was nominated as sheriff of London but declined the office. He was a generous philanthropist and a treasurer of the STRANGER'S FRIEND SOCIETY. He died in London on July 15, 1815.

MARSH, CHARLES FRANKLIN (1903-), American college president, was born at Antigo, Wis., Aug. 18, 1903, son of Charles O. and Mae (Barnett) Marsh. He was graduated from LAWRENCE COLLEGE, A.B., 1925; University of Illinois, M.A., 1926; Ph.D., 1928.

He was an examiner with the U.S. Civil Service Commission the summers of 1929-30; a member of the faculty of the College of William and Mary, 1930-58; chancellor, professor of economics and business administration, 1941-54; dean of the faculty, 1952-58. In 1958 he became president of WOFFORD COLLEGE, Spartanburg, S. C., serving in that capacity until retirement in 1968.

He has been active in educational, church, and civic affairs, serving as a member of the UNIVERSITY SENATE, on the Commission on Church Union, Commission on Ecumenical Affairs, and CONSULTATION ON CHURCH UNION. Also he was deputy administrator of the NRA, 1935-36, principal economist (Federal) Board of Investigation and Research, and was active in various councils of the Commonwealth of Virginia, being chairman of the Williamsburg Postwar Planning Commission, a member of the City Council, and president of the Williamsburg Chamber of Commerce. He has been president of the Council for Spartanburg County and chairman of the commission for long range planning of the City of Spartanburg. He has served as member of the American Economics Association, of state and regional education associations, as president of Phi Beta Kappa.

In The Methodist Church he has been a delegate to the JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE, 1960, and to the GENERAL and Jurisdictional CONFERENCES of 1964 and 1968.

He is author of various books and publications in the line of his own interests. Also he wrote "Contributions of Wofford College to Methodism," Methodist History, 1965.

He was married to Chloree Nancy Thurman, Sept. 8, 1928, and they have two children.

MARSH, DANIEL L. (1880-1968), American minister, church leader, and university president and chancellor, was born in West Newton, Pa., on April 12, 1880. He was the son of George W. and Mary (Lash) Marsh. He received the A.B. degree from NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY in 1906, the A.M. in 1907, and S.T.B. from BOSTON UNIVERSITY in 1908. Thereafter he studied at GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE, the University of Chicago, University of Pittsburgh, University of Geneva and at Oxford University. He received the Ph.D. from the University of Bologna in ITALY in 1931, and was the recipient of numerous honorary degrees.

On Aug. 22, 1906, he married Harriet Truxell, who died on July 15, 1937. Their children are Mary (Mrs. Ronald W. Ober); Marjorie (Mrs. Paul N. Otto); Madeline (Mrs. Harold DeWolf—wife of the Dean of Westminster Theological Seminary in Washington); and Harriett (Mrs. Robert H. Murray). He married Mrs. Arline Woodford McCormick on Nov. 24, 1938, and their adopted daughter Nancy Arline is Mrs. Mason N. Hartman.

Marsh served pastorates in the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE for a time and then became president of Boston University in 1925, where he served until 1951, when he became chancellor for life. He was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in 1916, '20, '24, '28, '32, '36; a member of the Uniting Conference of The Methodist Church in 1939, and of the General Conference of The Methodist Church in 1940, '44, '48. He was a member of the BOARD OF EDUCATION from 1929 to 1952, and belonged to various scientific and honorary groups. He was the author of numerous books including The House of Seven Pillars; Life's Most Arresting Question (1950); The True Church (1958); Religion in Education in a Time of Change (1962). He died May 20, 1968, and a funeral service was held for him in the Marsh

Chapel at Boston University on May 25. At his death Time magazine commented: "There was no argument about the near miracle he worked at Boston University where he took a moldering collection of brownstones for 9,600 students in 1926 and built a multiversity that today boasts 23,000 students and thirteen graduate schools."

MARSHALL, CHARLES KIMBALL (1811-1891), distinguished American minister and leader of Southern Methodism, was born in Durham, MAINE, of French Huguenot ancestry. His parents removed to BOSTON for several years where he was educated. Then later they moved to NEW ORLEANS, La., where he carried on his studies, and also began to hold religious meetings. In May 1832, he was licensed to preach by the Methodist Conference at New Orleans. In that year he went to NATCHEZ, Miss., to fill a vacated pulpit, and there became a member of the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE. Always handsome and eloquent, the young minister found himself famous at once and in demand for the best pulpits. Later he served in BATON ROUGE, La., and in JACKSON and VICKSBURG, Miss. He was known throughout the south and the nation as the "silver tongued orator" of Methodism.

In 1836 he married Miss Amanda Maria Vick, daughter of NEWITT and Elizabeth Clarke VICK. Newitt Vick was the founder of Vicksburg, and in this town Marshall and his wife made their home. Sargeant S. Prentiss, also a native of Maine, lived in Vicksburg, and he and Marshall became fast friends. Both known as great orators, they each ranked high in popular esteem throughout the nation.

Marshall continued his Methodist ministerial work with zeal and energy to the end of his life. Much of his time was spent in helping those in distress and danger. He went through thirteen yellow fever epidemics, ministering night and day to the ill and dying—especially in the dreadful one of 1878 in which Bishop CHARLES B. CALLOWAY came so near death when he was pastor at Vicksburg.

During the War Between the States, 1861-65, C. K. Marshall devoted his time and strength and finances to aiding the sick and wounded on the field. To him the Confederate government was greatly indebted for a system he provided, or planned for, of depots and hospitals, and its factory for making wooden legs, the model for which he drew up.

In 1880, Marshall gave especial attention to the Negro problem, and the future of the colored race in relation to the southern states. He wrote many pamphlets on the subject. He never refused to join in aggressively upon the issues of any day and time.

After an attack of pneumonia, he died at his home in Vicksburg, on Jan. 14, 1891. Bishop Charles B. Galloway, a close friend, conducted the funeral services.

MARSHALL, WILLIAM (1811-1846), was born in England and joined the Methodist ministry in 1838. From June, 1839, to May, 1842, he served on the Western Shore mission, which stretched for almost two hundred miles along the south coast of Newfoundland. During the first year he visited fifty-two coves and harbors, in some of which the people had not seen a minister before. In that year he baptized 150 children. In his second year on the mission he visited sixty places by boat. In June, 1842, he was appointed to the Green Bay mission with Twillingate as his headquarters. On this mission also, he travelled extensively. By his devotion and zealous labors he laid the foundation on which Methodism was built in the northern part of Newfoundland. Not surprisingly, he died at the early age of thirty-five.

MARSHALL SCHOLARSHIPS are offered, under the will of the late Miss Marshall of Glasgow, to ordained ministers of the Methodist Church of Great Britain who have completed not more than ten years of their ministry after ordination. The Major Scholarship is of the value of £20, and the Minor Scholarship is of £5. The Minor Scholarship is open only to those candidates who at the time of the examination possess no university degree; the Major Scholarship is open to all candidates without restriction. The scholarships are awarded on the results of an examination held each year in May. The papers are set on the language and exegesis of the New Testament, and on the history and criticism of the New Testament. The examination is concerned primarily with translation, grammar, and interpretation, but candidates are expected to show a general grasp of the critical questions involved.

L. R. MARSTON

MARSTON, LESLIE RAY (1894-), American ordained elder of the Central Illinois Conference and bishop-emeritus of the FREE METHODIST CHURCH, was born at Maple Ridge, Mich. He received the A.B. degree from GREENVILLE COLLEGE, 1916; the A.M. degree from the University of Illinois in 1917; and the Ph.D. degree from the University of Iowa, 1925. Houghton College conferred the LL.D. degree in 1939, and Greenville College the D.D. in 1942.

Dr. Marston is the author of The Emotions of Young Children, 1925; From Chaos to Character, 1935; Youth Speaks, 1939; and A Living Witness, 1960. He was Executive Secretary for the National Research Council's Committee on Child Development, 1926-28. He served as a member of the 1930 White House Conference on Child and Health Protection. He was president of the National Association of Evangelicals, 1944-46, and chairman of its World Relief Commission, 1950-59. He is a fellow of the America Association for Advancement of Science and the Society for Research in Child Development. As Dean and President of Greenville College, he served the institution a total of fifteen years. Bishop and Mrs. Marston make their residence at Greenville, Ill.

BYRON S. LAMSON

MARTHA'S VINEYARD CAMP MEETING ASSOCIATION, Oak Bluffs, Mass., U.S.A. For many years this Association sponsored an annual camp meeting which became an institution on this island off the Massachusetts coast. The first of these CAMP MEETINGS was held in 1835 in what was then called the Wesleyan Grove. Only a few hundred people were in attendance. By 1851 the congregation on the Sabbath of camp-meeting week numbered between 3,500 and 4,000; in 1858 there were some 12,000 Sabbath worshippers.

A feature of the camp ground was the appearance of small family tents which sprang up around the large church tents, and which were occupied year after year by certain families who made a habit of attending, and whose social life was largely dominated by camp-meeting occasions. In 1846 there were thirteen church tents and one family tent; by 1860 the number had increased to over 500 tents of all kinds. Gradually the family tents were replaced by cottages, which many of the families occupied for the entire summer. Cottage City, now Oak Bluffs, grew up around the camp grounds. In 1869 there were more than 30,000 visitors, many of them attracted by the Grand Illumination. This event traditionally climaxed the summer season, when parks, avenues, cottages and the camp grounds were decorated with Japanese lanterns. Elaborate fireworks were displayed at Ocean Park, in Oak Bluffs.

The camp-meeting program changed gradually from a type of revival service, but its religious usefulness did not diminish. In 1878 Trinity Church was built, and in 1879 the present steel Tabernacle was erected, to take the place of the large canvas circus tent, seating 4,000 people, which had been in use during the preceding years. Grace Chapel, in back of Trinity Church, was constructed in 1885.

During the summer services are held every Sunday morning in the Tabernacle, with a "Community Sing" every Wednesday evening. The delightful custom of "illumination" is still observed on the camp grounds and surrounding cottages one night a year, in August.

The unique character of the camp grounds, a heritage from quite a different day, has been wonderfully preserved by the many generations of cottage owners. To keep the outward appearance of serenity and charm, and at the same time to enjoy the modern conveniences of a mechanized age is the desire of those who have chosen this place for a summer retreat.

MARTIN, ISAAC PATTON (1867-1960), American preacher and historian, was born near Strawberry Plains, Tenn., on Dec. 11, 1867. He joined the HOLSTON CONFERENCE on trial in 1889, and was sent as a supply pastor to Lebanon, Ore., for one year. He then returned to Holston, where he spent the rest of his life.

His appointments there in order were Louisville, Maryville, Pocahontas, Tazewell, Lebanon, Sweetwater, Morristown, KNOXVILLE district, Church Street Church in Knoxville, Big Stone Gap district, Abingdon district, conference educational secretary, Morristown district, Knoxville district, Fountain City Church in Knoxville, agent for EMORY and HENRY COLLEGE. He retired in 1940.

On Jan. 1, 1890, he married Bettie Lee Trent and they had four children. He received the honorary D.D. degree from Emory and Henry College in 1911.

Martin was a delegate to seven GENERAL CONFERENCES (MES), including the Uniting Conference in 1939, and also to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCES in 1911 and 1931. He was co-author with JOHN STEWART FRENCH of legislation creating the JUDICIAL COUNCIL of first the M. E. Church, South, and then The Methodist Church.

Martin was the historian of the Holston Conference and wrote History of Methodism in The Holston Conference, (2 vols., 1944) and a biography of Bishop E. E. Hoss (1942). He died at Knoxville on March 9, 1960, and was buried in the conference cemetery at Emory, Va.

MARTIN, JOHN S. (1815-1888), American minister and Conference Secretary, was born at Alexandria, Va., Sept. 7, 1815. At the thorough school of Benjamin Hallowell he obtained a scholastic training which served as a sufficient basis for continuous study during the years of his ministry. He was converted at the age of sixteen, licensed to preach at the age of nineteen, and received into the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE in 1835. Recognizing his ability, his brethren sent him to General Conference in 1856 at Indianapolis, and in 1860 at Buffalo. Adhering to the South at the division of the Baltimore Conference, he became a commanding figure at every General Conference of the M. E. Church, South, from 1866 on. In 1882 and 1886 he was secretary of the General Conference. At the Methodist Centenary held in BALTIMORE in 1884 he was elected secretary by acclamation of all parties. He was systematic in his methods and a fine organizer, a faithful pastor and to the last a constant student. His intimate acquaintance with the Scriptures and his fine memory gave accuracy and beauty to his apt and frequent quotations. His burning zeal often swept the assemblies and brought multitudes to repentance and salvation. No place was too exalted, none too humble for him willingly and gladly to serve. He was appointed to his last charge at Saint Paul's in Baltimore, and although in his seventy-third year entered upon his work with an enthusiasm and activity that seemed to renew his youth. J. E. Armstrong said, "He preached to crowded houses as if his tongue had been touched with a live coal from off the Altar." He died July 8, 1888.

MARTIN, JOHN THOMAS (1816-1897), American capitalist, philanthropist, and churchman, was born in BALTIMORE, Md., on Oct. 2, 1816. He was the son of John and Maria (McConkey) Martin. His ancestors were natives of England. They settled in MARYLAND in 1633. The house built by Thomas Martin in the 1600's at Island Creek Neck, Talbot County was in the possession of the family until 1866.

John Martin received his education at St. Mary's School in Baltimore and then entered the mercantile house of Birckett & Pearce. At the age of sixteen he joined the Light Street M. E. Church in Baltimore.

In 1835, he moved to St. Louis, Mo., where, with his brother, he built up a large clothing business. He associated himself with the Fourth Street Church in St. Louis and served for fourteen years as its recording steward and secretary of the Sabbath school.

In 1844, Martin went to NEW YORK CITY to start a manufacturing branch of the company. He settled in BROOKLYN and became a member of the Pacific Street Methodist Church. He later served as president of its Board of Trustees for many years, and was instrumental in securing a larger building for the congregation when the former one became too small.

Ill health forced his retirement for a time, but in 1862, he returned to business and became the main supplier of clothing to the Federal government during the Civil War. It is reported that he sold over $50,000,000 worth of clothing to the government, and that there were times when the government owed him from $8,000,000 to $13,000,000. His success in business enabled him to buy up large tracts of water front property and to invest heavily in banks and railroads. Martin was one of the founders, and first treasurer, of the Brooklyn Polytechnic Institute, a member of the Brooklyn Historical Society and a Director of the Mercantile Library.

In 1866, the centennial year of American Methodism, Martin gave $25,000 for the erection of a building at the Theological Seminary at BREMEN, GERMANY. The school was under the direction of LUDWIG S. JACOBY, an American sent out by the Mission Board and supported by the German missions in America, whom Martin had gotten to know years before in St. Louis. Before the building was erected in Bremen, it was decided to move the school to FRANKFURT-ON-MAIN. At Frankfurt a building was erected with Martin's money, and, in honor of his gift the name of the school was changed to "Martin Missions Anstalt." It is today the PREDIGERSEMINAR der Methodisten Kirche, or Theological Seminary at Frankfurt.

In the later years of his life, Martin lost his interest in Brooklyn Methodism. This was due to the fact that his church, Pacific Street, found itself caught in urban change. Differences of opinion arose as to the best methods of maintaining the church. Martin apparently did not agree with the decisions which were made and, for nearly twenty years prior to his death, attended the "Church of Pilgrims." On April 10, 1897, John Thomas Martin died in New York City.

MARTIN, JOSEPH C. (1865-1939), fourteenth bishop of the C. M. E. Church, was born in Gibson County, Tenn., on Feb. 8, 1865. He attended Howe Institute in MEMPHIS, Tenn., and Roger Williams University in NASHVILLE, Tenn. Martin began preaching in 1887 and was pastor of churches in TENNESSEE, WASHINGTON, D. C., and SOUTH CAROLINA. In 1912, he was elected publishing agent and as such became noted as an organizer and financier. At the General Conference in 1922, he was elected to the office of bishop. He gained a reputation for his organizational and financial leadership. Bishop Martin died on Feb. 6, 1939.

MARTIN, PAUL ELLIOTT (1897-), American bishop, was born on Dec. 31, 1897, at Blossom, Texas, the son of Charles E. and Willie (Black) Martin. He received the following degrees: SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY, A.B., 1919; LL.D., 1945; SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, D.D., 1938; HENDRIX COLLEGE, D.D., 1945; OKLAHOMA CITY UNIVERSITY, S.T.D., 1968.

On June 29, 1920, he was united in marriage to Mildred Helen Frayar, who has accompanied him in all his church-wide activities.

During the first World War, he served as a lieutenant in the United States Army. For a time, he was principal of the Blossom High School, 1919, and then the Superintendent of Public Schools there from 1920 until 1922. Entering the ministry of the M. E. Church, South, in 1922, he was ordained DEACON in 1924, and an ELDER in 1926. All of his pastorates were in the NORTH TEXAS CONFERENCE: Cedar Hill Church, DALLAS, 1922-24; Maple Avenue, Dallas, 1924-27; Henrietta, 1927-29; Iowa Park, 1929-30; Kavanaugh Church, Greenville, 1930-35; district superintendent, Wichita Falls District, 1935-38;

PAUL E. MARTIN

First Church, Wichita Falls, 1938-44. He was elected a bishop at the South Central JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE in 1944 and assigned to the ARKANSAS-LOUISIANA Area, where he served until 1960, when he was assigned to the HOUSTON Area.

From 1960 to 1968 he was president of the Methodist Council on WORLD SERVICE AND FINANCE. He was chairman of the American Section of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, 1956-61. He was president of the Board of Temperance and vice-president of the BOARD OF EDUCATION, president of the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS, 1962. He was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South, in 1938, the Uniting Conference in 1939, and the General Conference of The Methodist Church in 1940 and 1944. He is a trustee of Southern Methodist University, Southwestern University, and Western Methodist Assembly.

Since 1949, Bishop and Mrs. Martin have visited the following mission fields: ALASKA, FORMOSA, JAPAN, the PHILIPPINES, MALAYA, INDIA, PAKISTAN, South America, and Africa. In Africa in 1957, they studied Methodist work in the CONGO, SOUTHERN RHODESIA, SOUTH AFRICA, ANGOLA, and LIBERIA. Bishop Martin has lectured at various colleges and elsewhere. He delivered the Fonden Lectures at Ministers' Week at Southern Methodist University, 1968; he was elected to serve as a professor at PERKINS SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, S.M.U., upon his retirement in 1968. He is the author of My Call to Preach, 1946, and of a booklet, Humanity Hath Need of Thee.

Bishop Martin at his formal retirement in 1968 was administering the work of The Methodist Church in the TEXAS and RIO GRANDE ANNUAL CONFERENCES, comprising about 730 churches with a total membership of more than 220,000. He resides in Dallas.

MARTIN COLLEGE, Pulaski, Tennessee, was founded in 1870 as Martin Female College. It was named for Thomas Martin, an attorney residing in Pulaski who made the original gift to found the institution. Ownership was transferred to the M. E. Church, South, in 1908. The junior college program began in 1914, and the school became coeducational in 1937. The governing board consists of thirty-two members elected by the TENNESSEE ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

MARTINDALE, WILLIAM J. (1841-1916), American minister, son of Moses and Margaret Martindale, was born Oct. 18, 1841, in Miami County, Ind. and died in Wichita, Kan., Aug. 18, 1916. His parents were devoted Methodists and under this influence he felt the call to the ministry early in life. He preached his first sermon as a local preacher Oct. 25, 1862, and joined the NORTHWEST INDIANA CONFERENCE in 1863. He transferred to the MISSOURI-ARKANSAS CONFERENCE in 1865, where he served as a pastor sixteen years and as presiding elder five years. He was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in 1876 and was reported as the youngest member of that body.

He transferred to the SOUTHWEST KANSAS CONFERENCE in 1887, where he served twenty-six years before retiring in 1913. He served as a presiding elder eighteen years, twelve of these years in western KANSAS where new settlers were coming in and where new churches were being organized. These districts were lands of great distances where in six years on the Dodge City District he travelled 83,000 miles by horseback, buggy, walking or train. Such men as Martindale made the Methodist Church strong in that part of Kansas.

His brethren honored him by electing him three times as a delegate to the General Conference. He was a delegate to the Centennial CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE in BALTIMORE in 1884, and to the World Sunday School Convention in Rome in May, 1907.

He was an evangelist, a builder of churches and a builder of men.

MARVIN, ENOCH MATHER (1823-1877), American bishop, was born near Wright City, Warren County, Mo., June 12, 1823, the son of Wells and Mary (Davis) Marvin. His parents came from New England. Marvin had little schooling other than instruction given him by his parents who had taught school in the east. His father belonged to no church; his mother was an unaffiliated Baptist; he himself attended Methodist services in the home of a neighbor and was converted in 1840. He married Harriet Brotherton Clark in October 1845, and they had five children. Their son Fielding became an itinerant in the MISSOURI CONFERENCE.

ENOCH M. MARVIN

Marvin joined the Missouri Conference in 1841, and was ordained deacon in 1843 and elder in 1845. In the latter year he adhered South as the M. E. Church divided. His appointments were: 1841, Grundy Mission; 1842, Oregon Circuit; 1843, Liberty Circuit; 1844, junior preacher, Fourth Street, St. Louis; 1845, Weston Circuit; 1846-47, Hannibal Station; 1848-49, Monticello Circuit; 1850, Palmyra Station; 1851, St. Charles Circuit; 1852-53, St. Charles District; 1854, agent, St. Charles College; 1855, transferred to the St. Louis Conference and stationed two years at Centenary, St. Louis; 1857-58, First, St. Louis; and 1859-61, Centenary, St. Louis.

Tall, angular, and dressed in homemade clothes, Marvin made less than a prepossessing appearance as a young preacher. After a year in the conference three of his brethren, believing him unsuited to the ministry, advised him to drop out. Fortunately he did not heed their advice. Ten years later, at the request of the conference, he preached the memorial sermon for one of those men, and twenty-five years afterward he returned to MISSOURI as the presiding bishop and made the appointment of another!

Notwithstanding his homely appearance, Marvin quickly won recognition as a pulpit preacher of great power. W. W. Redman, his presiding elder the first three years, said on the conference floor, "Bishop, he is a green looking boy, but I tell you he can preach, and if he lives he will be a star!" An assiduous student, an indefatigable worker, and endowed with what today is called charisma, Marvin was widely recognized as the premier preacher in Missouri Methodism before he was thirty. He was a delegate to the 1854-58 GENERAL CONFERENCES and led his delegation to the one that did not meet in 1862. Appointed presiding elder at twenty-nine, he constantly assisted his preachers in revivals, formed two new circuits, and at the end of his two years showed a net gain of fifteen percent in church members.

Marvin was notably successful in his St. Louis pastorates. A skilful debater, he used his pulpit to answer a Roman Catholic priest who delivered and published lectures critical of Protestantism. Marvin's twenty-three rebuttal messages appeared in the newspaper each week and then were brought out as a book, Errors of the Papacy. The volume had a good sale and made him widely known.

When the Civil War began, Marvin was unwilling to take the oath of allegiance required in St. Louis. Sending his family to his boyhood farm home, he slipped out of the city at night in February 1862, and made his way south. He supplied the Methodist church at Woodville, Miss., for some months, and then became unofficial chaplain to General Sterling Price's army, serving in MISSISSIPPI and ARKANSAS. He held revivals among the troops and organized an undenominational army church to conserve the results. Also, he conducted revivals in churches in the region in which Price's army maneuvered. For the last year and a half of the war he made the home of Rev. W. E. Doty, Greenwood, La., his headquarters. In February 1865, he began supplying the Methodist church at Marshall, Texas, and continued there until August 1866. His wife and children joined him in Marshall in March 1865, thanks to a pass provided by President Lincoln.

Though still a member of the ST. LOUIS CONFERENCE, Marvin was not elected a delegate to the 1866 General Conference which met in NEW ORLEANS. However, many if not most of the delegates knew him by reputation, and since there was talk that at least one of the new bishops to be elected would come from west of the Mississippi River, his name was prominently mentioned. Moreover, his friend Doty on his own motion went to New Orleans and advocated Marvin for the episcopacy. Therefore, it was not surprising that Marvin, though not a delegate and not even present at the General Conference, was elected a bishop on the first ballot. He appeared at the conference the next day; he had arranged his travel schedule so as not to arrive in New Orleans until the balloting for bishops was over.

Marvin's first episcopal assignment was the Indian Mission. Finding the preachers discouraged and ready to disband, he fired them with new enthusiasm, personally pledged $5,000 for their support, and then traveled over the church and raised it. Marvin probably did more than any other one man to rouse Southern Methodism from defeatism after the war. He opposed Methodist union at the time, saying amicable relations must first be established between the two churches. However, he believed that union would come in fifty years. He defended the right of the M. E. Church, South to expand in any geographical direction. Also, he supported the Southern view of the episcopacy, maintaining that the bishops in caring for all the churches had a pastoral function as well as administrative responsibility.

Moving back to St. Louis, Marvin gave strong leadership to Methodism in the city and the state. He led in collecting $100,000 to establish the influential St. John's Church in St. Louis in 1868, and he helped to raise a similar amount for the endowment of CENTRAL COLLEGE. He spent seventeen months on the west coast strengthening Southern Methodism in that region.

The 1874 General Conference voted that one of the bishops should visit the Orient. Chosen for the assignment, Marvin looked upon it as a means of dramatizing and inspiring support for the missionary movement. Sailing from San Francisco in November 1876, the ten months' journey took him around the world, and it was a productive success. His book, To the East by Way of the West, sold 20,000 copies.

Marvin began writing for the Western Christian Advocate as a young preacher, and in time he contributed to the St. Louis Christian Advocate and to every periodical in the church. His books in addition to those already mentioned were: The Work of Christ, The Life of William Goff Caples, Sermons, and The Doctrinal Integrity of Methodism.

Marvin's contemporaries declared that he had more than ordinary endowments. Certainly he had a quick, keen, and exceptionally retentive mind, and he was motivated by a strong inner drive to succeed at whatever he undertook. He was a powerful pulpiteer; D. R. McANALLY who heard him often believed that if he could have been accurately reported when at his best, the frame of his sermons would not have been surpassed in his day. Withal Marvin was dedicated and devout; he constantly practiced the presence of God. He died in St. Louis, Nov. 26, 1877, and was buried in Bellefontaine Cemetery there.

MARYLAND is a Middle Atlantic state south of the famous Mason and Dixon line boundary with Pennsylvania and north of the rambling Potomac River which separates it from the Virginias. Known as "America in miniature," Maryland's 10,577 square miles include most of the vast Chesapeake Bay, a drowned estuary, and extend from Atlantic beaches westward 235 miles over coastal plains and piedmont plateau into the Appalachian Mountains. Flora and fauna run the gamut from cypress swamps and aquatic bird refuges, to Frostburg's subarctic winters, with oyster fisheries and rich farmland in between. Megalopolis cuts a northeasterly swath from the national capital, but burgeoning high income bedroom suburbs are matched by declining highland and rural counties. Outside the latter areas, the populace has become a cross section of the ethnic, socio-economic melting pot which is America.

As an English colony settled in 1634 by the Catholic proprietor Lord Baltimore, Maryland's Assembly in 1649 became the first in America to enact religious toleration. However, Catholic worship was later proscribed, and in 1692 the Church of England was "established" and was supported until 1776 by levies from all taxables irrespective of religion. Non-Anglican Protestants found a haven in the colony, and both Quakers and Presbyterians trace some of their American origins to Maryland soil.

About 1760 an Irish Methodist local preacher, ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE, settled in what is now Carroll County near the present New Windsor and began to preach over a wide area, including much of northern Maryland. He built log meetinghouses near his home and at Bush now in Harford County. The body of his loyal followers included WILLIAM WATTERS and RICHARD OWINGS who became the first native American traveling and local preachers. JOHN KING preached in Baltimore in 1771, and on June 22, 1772, John Wesley's missionary, JOSEPH PUMORE, organized the first Methodist classes there. By 1773 some 500 of the 1,160 American Methodists were in Maryland, and four preachers were appointed to the Baltimore Circuit.

During the Revolutionary War an oath of fidelity was required in Maryland, and numerous nonjuring Methodist preachers suffered prosecution. Despite the turmoil, the withdrawal of Wesley's mission force, and the death of Strawbridge, the numbers in the Methodist societies greatly increased. By the first Federal census of 1790, 4.4 percent of Maryland's population were Methodist members, twice the 2.2 percent in Virginia, which was second. Circuit preachers found their greatest hearing on the "eastern shore" which has remained the "garden of Methodism" for two centuries. Methodism took a leading place among the churches in all but the southern part of the state.

The Methodist Episcopal Church was organized at BALTIMORE in 1784 and its quadrennial GENERAL CONFERENCES met there 1792 to 1808 and 1816 to 1824. COKEBURY, the first Methodist college in the world, was founded at Abingdon in 1787 and continued operation until 1795, when it was destroyed by fire. A second Cokesbury College was started in Baltimore in 1796, only to meet a like fiery fate within the year.

The United Brethren Church was formally organized at the Kemp home near Frederick in 1800 and flourished among German speaking Marylanders.

From the first, Negroes were objects of Methodist concern and great numbers became followers. Splits elsewhere in 1796 and 1816 gave rise to the A. M. E. and A. M. E. ZION CHURCHES, but despite the fact that DANIEL COKER, co-founder of the A. M. E. Church, was from Baltimore, most Maryland Negroes remained in the M. E. Church.

The MUTUAL RIGHTS controversy from 1820 to 1827 largely centered in Baltimore, and it was there that the ousted Reformers held their conventions of 1827, 1828, and 1830 which resulted in the organization of the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH. At Holly Run in Anne Arundel County the new denomination erected its first church building, while at Baltimore it sustained the secession of the mother church, St. John's, from the M. E. Church in 1843. From the beginning a portion of M. P. publishing was conducted at Baltimore. In 1867 the denomination founded WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE at Westminster, adding the Westminster Theological Seminary in 1882. A short-lived schism in the M. P. Church was healed at Baltimore on May 16, 1877, when the northern and western group of conferences known as "the Methodist Church," reunited with the M. P. Church. It was the first union of Methodist denominations in America.

When the slavery issue divided the M. E. Church in 1844, the part of the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE which extended into the nine eastern counties of Maryland, and the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE on the western side of Chesapeake Bay adhered North even though a majority of the general population in the region was proslavery. The sincerity of the historic Maryland Methodist proclamation that slavery was a "great evil" was attested by the financial support given by Maryland Methodists for the colonization of Negroes in LIBERIA and by the numerous manumissions of slaves, so many in fact that by 1860 the number of free Negroes in Maryland almost outnumbered the slaves.

Prior to the Civil War, the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South succeeded in organizing circuits at Potomac and Rock Creek in Montgomery County, Md., and the proslavery members of the Gatch Church near Baltimore organized Andrew Chapel.

The "new chapter" on slavery, adopted by the 1860 General Conference, urged preachers and laymen to seek the extirpation of slavery by all lawful and Christian means. Strongly opposed to such legislation, the Baltimore Conference in its 1861 session disowned the General Conference. Though not in favor of the "new chapter," the Philadelphia Conference and the East Baltimore Conference (the latter formed in northern Maryland and central Pennsylvania in 1857 by dividing the Baltimore Conference), remained relatively calm. The onset of the Civil War in April, 1861 forestalled the impending rupture in the Baltimore Conference, but the hostilities of four years utterly disorganized church life and work. Rival "original" Baltimore Conferences contended with each other, while a group of pastors who sympathized with the South but who were caught in Baltimore organized several independent churches. The "original" Baltimore Conference (which always called itself "Old Baltimore") which sympathized with the South, was visited in 1865 by Bishop JOHN EARLY of the Southern Church, and in 1866 it became the Baltimore Conference of the M. E. Church, South. Its territory included Maryland, except Garrett County, and northern Virginia, the District of Columbia, and a small part of WEST VIRGINIA.

Negro Methodists in Baltimore secured separate district conferences for their local preachers in 1856. In 1864, the DELAWARE CONFERENCE on the eastern shore and the WASHINGTON CONFERENCE west of Chesapeake Bay were organized for Negroes. White and Negro Methodists of Baltimore, assisted by the FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY, began Centenary Biblical Institute in 1867. It became MORGAN COLLEGE. Later a branch of the institution was started at Princess Anne.

Civil War losses to the economy and the church were never fully retrieved. The bitter aftermath of lawsuits and recrimination resulted in church extension which was more competitive than cooperative. However, by 1884 Methodists North and South came to Baltimore for the CENTENNIAL METHODIST CONFERENCE. Subsequent celebrations were held in the same city in 1934 and 1966 to mark the SESQUICENTENNIAL of the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE and the BICENTENNIAL of AMERICAN METHODISM.

Methodist institutions in Maryland included two homes for the aged at Baltimore begun in 1868 and 1870, and two at Westminster which opened in 1896 and 1926. The two latter institutions have since merged with the outstanding Asbury Home at GAITHERSBURG which was founded in 1926. The Kelso Home for Girls, started in 1873, and the Stravbridge Home for Boys, launched in 1923, merged to become the present Board of Child Care at Rockdale. Maryland General Hospital at Baltimore was acquired in 1911, and the Woman's College of Baltimore, now the front rank GOUCHER COLLEGE, was begun in 1884. Other institutions include two Baltimore homes for business girls, a deaconess home, and the Baltimore GOODWILL INDUSTRIES which was established in 1919.

In 1970 there were about 1,000 Methodist churches in Maryland with more than 284,000 members, as compared with 199,686 members in 1950, about eight per cent of the state's population in both periods.

MARYLAND CONFERENCE of the M. P. Church was the largest in the denomination. This was due to several factors. The M. E. Church was organized in BALTIMORE in 1784 and "the seed sown on Maryland soil reproduced in marvelous increase." Among advocates of lay rights—"Reform"—after 1820 were such prominent traveling preachers as NICHOLAS SNETHEN and ALEXANDER McCABE, not to mention several able Baltimore local preachers. These men became contributors to the Wesleyan Repository and its successor Mutual Rights through which they agitated effectively for lay representation. Also, "the first Union Society was formed in Baltimore, and the first to feel the prosecution encountered in the cause of reform was a Maryland minister, DENNIS B. DORSEY, who was denied appointment at the Baltimore Conference." Then the Baltimore Union Society which included eleven local preachers and twenty-two laymen was expelled from the M. E. Church for disturbing its peace. After their appeal was denied by the 1828 GENERAL CONFERENCE, widespread sympathy added to their ranks. Colhouer's Founders of the Methodist Protestant Church mentions thirty-one Marylanders who constituted more than one-third of the total. Seven of the first thirteen presidents of the M. P. General Conference were from Maryland. Finally, Baltimore had become a "storm center," and the three preliminary national conventions of the Reformers were held in the city in 1827, 1828, and 1830. In 1828 they organized as the Associated Methodist Churches, and in 1830 they took the METHODIST PROTESTANT name.

The Maryland Conference was organized in April, 1829 under the presidency of NICHOLAS SNETHEN. Admitted at that time were the first thirteen of the 611 traveling preachers who were enrolled in the 110-year history of the conference. By 1831 some 2,256 members were reported in eleven appointments. Largely as a result of CAMP MEETINGS and revivals, the number doubled by 1839 and doubled again by 1843.

Among early churches were St. John's, Baltimore, organized in December, 1828 in a former Protestant Episcopal Church on Liberty Street; Georgetown, D. C., begun by forty members on Dec. 2, 1828; Reisterstown Circuit and Centreville in December, 1828. Deer Creek and Pipe Creek Circuits, January, 1829. At Untown on the latter circuit the entire membership of the M. E. church joined. Holly Run Meetinghouse, still standing at LINTHICUM HEIGHTS, was finished in the spring of 1829 and is said to be the first church building erected by the new denomination. Savage, Brookeville, Gaothy and Union Chapel near Roxbury Mills, along with Kent Island, Chestertown and Easton were other pioneer societies. Ninth Street Church, Washington, was built in 1835 with aid from other churches throughout the connection.

The infant conference had sent missionaries to PENNSYLVANIA and NEW JERSEY by 1831, and had recorded itself as opposed to slaveholding and in favor of abstinence. THOMAS HAMILTON LEWIS, the conference historian from 1879 to 1929, chronicled only one controversy. It involved pastoral tenure, sought by St. John's Church, Baltimore, for August Webster beyond the two-year limit which obtained in the denomination at that time. The quarrel eventuated in 1844 in loss of control of St. John's and appointments in PHILADELPHIA, along with the withdrawal of Webster and THOMAS S. STOCKTON from the conference.

The Maryland Conference adopted many of the practices of the mother church. A full time conference president was elected annually. He visited the charges and made the appointments of the preachers subject to conference approval, and to appeal by any pastor to a committee on appeals.

In 1829, the conference started a fund for worn out preachers and widows. Within half a century the corpus had grown to $76,000 while some $90,000 had been distributed to claimants. A home missionary society was started in 1831, a foreign mission society in 1837, and a women's missionary society in 1881. The denomination's first missionary to the foreign field was sent out in the latter year. Institutions within the bounds of the conference were: WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE, WESTMINSTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, Aged Peoples Home, Working Girls Home, and Book Concern Property. The first three were established in 1867, 1882, and 1896, respectively.

At the time of Methodist union in 1939, JAMES H. STRAUGHN of the Maryland Conference was one of two bishops elected from the M. P. Church. The Maryland Conference brought into The Methodist Church in 1939 some 169 ministers, 240 Sunday schools with 35,946 pupils, 255 churches with 37,225 members, and property valued at $6,695,420. The benevolent giving of the conference in that year totaled $630,000.

MASER, FREDERICK ERNEST (1908-), American minister and historian, was born at Rochester, N. Y., Feb. 26, 1908. His parents were Herman A. and Clara M. L. (Krumm) Maser. In 1930 he received an A.B. degree from Union College, Schenectady, N. Y.; in 1933 a Th.B. from Princeton Theological Seminary, and also in 1933 an M.A. in English from Princeton University. DICKINSON COLLEGE awarded him an honorary D.D. degree in 1957 and MCKENDREE COLLEGE a LL.D. in 1964. He married Mary Louise Jarden on Dec. 25, 1959. He joined the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE on trial in 1933, and went into full connection in 1935. His appointments were Birdsboro, 1933-38; Central, Frankfurt, PHILADELPHIA, 1938-45; St. James Church, Philadelphia, 1945-53; District Superintendent of the Northwest Philadelphia District, 1953-58; Old St. GEORGE'S CHURCH, Philadelphia 1958-67; Sabbatical leave, 1967-68; Dean of Students and Assistant Professor of Homiletics, Conwell School of Theology, Philadelphia, 1968-.

He was Chairman of the Division of Evangelism of the Pennsylvania Council of Churches, 1950-58; a delegate to the Northeastern JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE, 1952, to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1956, and to the WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCES, 1956 and 1961. He has been a member of the Advisory Council of WESLEY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY since 1961. He served as a member of the executive committee of the Association of Methodist Historical Societies, 1956-68, and was Vice-President, 1960-68. He has been a member of the International Association of Methodist Historical Societies since 1966. He belongs to the Colonial Philadelphia Historical Society, Penn's Towne Historical Society, Academy of Fine Arts, the Pennsylvania Historical Society, Church History Society, and numerous other historical organizations. He wrote The Dramatic Story of Early American Methodism, 1965, and was a member of the editorial Board and a contributor to the three volume History of American Methodism, published in 1964. He was a member of the editorial board of the Methodist History magazine, editor of Discovery Magazine, 1960-64, editor of the Journal of Joseph Pilmore, 1969, and has contributed articles to various church publications. He has written extensively in the field of Methodist history. He was a consulting editor and a contributor to Corpus Dictionaries, 1967-68. He was cited by Temple University, Philadelphia, for his gift to the Sullivan Library of First Editions, signed copies and manuscripts of Joseph Conrad, and in 1967 he was the recipient of the St. George's Gold Medal Award for "distinguished service to the Methodist Church." He is a collector of rare Bibles, Prayer Books, Wesleyana, and Early American Book Bindings. He is a member of the supervisory board of the Encyclopedia of World Methodism. In 1971 he was elected the first executive secretary of the World Methodist Historical Society (formerly the INTERNATIONAL METHODIST HISTORICAL SOCIETY).

MASHABA, ROBERT, was born in the Tembe tribe in Portuguese East Africa, went to Durban as a youth to work in the sugar plantations, and then to Port Elizabeth in 1875. Here he was converted in the Wesleyan church and baptized by the Reverend Robert Lamplough, whose Christian name he adopted. He went to Lovedale Training Institution for three years and became fluent in English. In 1885 he returned to Lourenco Marques to preach. He worked for a time on the construction of the railway to the Transvaal, as he received no financial support from the church. The Roman Catholic Church, the Swiss Mission and the Anglican Church offered to take him and his converts into their work but Mashaba demurred. He wrote to the Wesleyans in the Cape Colony telling them that some 200 converts awaited baptism. This letter was brought to the attention of the Rev. EZRA NUTTALL and the Rev. William Mtembu was sent to establish the Society. The South African Conference recommended that the work be taken over by the Transvaal District. In 1892 the Rev. GEORGE WEAVIND, acting Chairman, went to Lourenco Marques. He found a day school with about fifty children, four local preachers, a congregation of 200, a church building three miles from the town and other preaching places. In 1893 Weavind opened a new church at Mabota, eight miles from Lourenco Marques. It seated 400 and cost £100 which was raised by the congregation. In the same year Mashaba was accepted as a candidate for the ministry. In October 1894 a rebellion against the Portuguese broke out in the neighborhood of Mashaba's church and he was accused of complicity with the rebels. Mashaba moved his church from the area in order to disassociate himself and his people from the rebels. Notwithstanding his plea of innocence, Mashaba was arrested on Jan. 7, 1896 and deported to Cape Verde. It was six years before he was released. The Portuguese authorities would not permit him to return to Lourenco Marques so he continued his ministry on the Witwatersrand and in Swaziland. Mashaba made a valuable contribution to Christian literature in his native tongue. He had two reading books printed for use in his school, translated the Gospel of Matthew into Sesotho and translated and composed ninety hymns. He retired in 1934 and was allowed to return to his birthplace, Nkasana, where he died on May 20, 1939.

MASIH, DAULAT (1872-1949) and MANOHAR (1906-), were father and son, both born in the village of Phatgali in the Katyur Valley of the Kumaun foothills of the Himalayas. Masih is a surname adopted after their conversion. Before they became Christians they, like all their neighbors, used the surname Singh. Daulat's older brother, Deb Singh, was the first convert of the family and suffered rough treatment at the hands of relatives and neighbors. But Daulat Singh was so much impressed by his brother's witness to Christ in words and behavior that he, a widower at the time, was converted and put his sons in the boarding school maintained by the London Missionary Society at Almora.

Daulat Masih was thirty-nine years old when converted in 1911. After more than a year of residence in Almora, he returned to his village, leaving the sons in Almora. He undertook to win to Christ his kinsmen and neighbors throughout the valley, and to that end he began preaching and composing Bhajans (Hindi religious lyrics) in Kumauni, the dialect of Hindi commonly spoken in villages of Almora District. He obtained help from a senior, well-educated Indian minister, U. S. Rawat, in editing the songs. Rawat lauded Daulat Masih as a man of faith and devotion. In Phatgali and in other villages, his relatives and friends turned to Christ.

On Jan. 1, 1926, the London Missionary Society officially withdrew from the Almora District and made their responsibilities and property over to the M. E. Church. The congregations and scattered Christians united with the Methodists, retaining strong love and respect for those who had brought them to Christ. Daulat Masih continued his work as a singing evangelist and personal witness.

Manohar Masih, the older son in the boarding school, made an excellent record there and afterward graduated from the government medical school at Agra, becoming a Licentiate of Medical Practice. He later took special training in the treatment of leprosy; and, shortly after the Methodist Church accepted responsibility in Almora, he was named as superintendent of the Almora leper asylum, which is believed to be the first institution in India established to help sufferers from Hansen's disease.

Henry Ramsey, commissioner of the Almora District when the Methodist Church began work in India, and a great benefactor of the church, had started this project at his own expense. Manohar Masih soon became one of India's most able leprologists. He has been superintendent of the Almora Home for more than forty years. In 1956, he was invited to help the mission to lepers and the United Mission to NEPAL in recommending to the Government of Nepal plans for opening leprosy work in that country.

After twenty years of work for sufferers in Almora and in a network of village clinics established to discover and treat cases of the disease in early stages, Masih decided that he could be more helpful as an ordained minister than as a layman. He took the conference course of study and joined the NORTH INDIA ANNUAL CONFERENCE. He was ordained deacon and elder by Bishop J. WASKOM PICKETT. More than a thousand people with leprosy have confessed faith in Christ and been baptized through the work of the Almora institution.

A protégé of Masih, also from a village home, is now associate superintendent of leprosy work in the North India Conference, and Masih serves as secretary to the medical council of the Methodist Church in Southern Asia. He gives three days each month to a primary school and a dispensary operated by the church in Phatgali. In that village there are now forty-four resident families. Thirty-eight of these families are active members of the church. The remaining six families cooperate in many church activities, though calling themselves Hindus. From Phatgali have come eight ordained ministers, two physicians, six nurses, eight teachers in Indian schools, a district woman evangelist, the wife of an Indian surgeon, a university lecturer in home economics, a college professor in the United States and more than a dozen men and women holding responsible positions in India's defense forces or in civilian government employment.

MASON, HAROLD CARLTON (1888-1964), American FREE METHODIST and an ordained elder of the Wabash Conference. He married Alta E. McFate in 1909. He received his education at Huntington College, B.S., 1907; A.B., 1913; honorary D.D., 1924; ADRIAN COLLEGE, A.B., 1916; University of Michigan, M.A., 1924; Indiana University, Ed.D., 1945. He was ordained in the CHURCH OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST in 1907. His teaching service included Chesbrough Seminary, North Chili, N. Y.; principal of schools, Whitmore Lake, Mich.; superintendent of schools, Horton, Mich. until 1911; pastor, Adrian, Mich., 1911-12; instructor, Huntington College and pastor, 1912-13; pastor, Blissfield, Mich., 1913-18; Central Church, Montpelier, Ohio, 1918-21; bishop, 1921-25; professor of philosophy and dean, Adrian College, 1925-29; superintendent of schools and Lenawee County Normal School, 1929-32; president, Huntington College, 1932-39; professor of philosophy, Winona Lake School of Theology; pastor, Winona Lake Free Methodist Church, 1939-43; special lecturer, Grace Theological Seminary, Winona Lake, 1943; professor, Northern Baptist Theological Seminary, 1943-48; professor, ASBURY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, 1948-1961.

He was a member of several learned societies and educational associations. He wrote The Teaching Task of the Local Church, 1960; Abiding Values in Christian Education; Reclaiming the Sunday School, and contributed to Light and Life Press Sunday school publications, and to the American Sunday School Union. He was an eloquent gospel preacher, a Christian gentleman with great capacity for friendship.

MASON, JOHN (1780?-1864), British Methodist, entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1811. He had a natural aptitude for business and finance, and was commercially trained before entering the ministry. In 1824 he was a general secretary of the Missionary Society. He was Book STEWARD from 1827 to 1864—the longest period of service so far. He faced an appalling debt, the business having been for years drained of its capital in the interests of Methodist work (an endemic Book Room disease). He laid the foundations of great prosperity and sought to create a distinctively Methodist literature. RICHARD WATSON wrote much of his work at Mason's request. In the 1832 Conference he declared, "I, as Book Steward, am not under the Book Committee"—a declaration of independence not infrequently occurring in Book Room politics. Mason preached twice a Sunday and led a society class at City Road Chapel. He died, age eighty-three, on March 1, 1864.

FRANK CUMBERS

MASON, WILLIAM (1790-1873), British BIBLE CHRISTIAN minister, was born at Stepleton, Cookbury, North Devon. A champion wrestler, he was converted through WILLIAM O'BRYAN in 1816 and opened missions in Kent, Northumberland, and West Somerset. In 1827 Mason married Mary Hewitt (1803-53), a maiden preacher of breeding and Quaker extraction from Milverton. Immensely strong, he could walk great distances and quell an interrupter; at the age of sixty-six he was called out of superannuation to reopen the Portland Mission, closed through persistent hooliganism, and was triumphantly successful. He died at Holsworthy May 30, 1874, and was buried in the Bible Christian Chapel Yard.

MASON CITY, IOWA, U.S.A. First Church, of colonial architecture, is the fourth largest United Methodist congregation in the state of IOWA. It was once served by WILLIAM H. SPENCE, whose son, Hartzell, wrote One Foot in Heaven and Get Thee Behind Me as memoirs of his life in a Methodist parsonage, part of which were experienced in Mason City.

Judge Elisha Randall, the pioneer Methodist in Mason City, came from NEW YORK in 1855, carrying a preacher's license from his home church. A man of clear vision, he erected a saw mill on the banks of the Winnebago. The winter of 1855-56, which is recorded as one of the worst on Iowa's prairies, left great choking white drifts which in springtime melted to carry havoc before them. The saw mill was swept away. Undaunted Elisha Randall and his neighbors built a new saw mill on the ruins of the old. Randall and ten companions soon afterward started a Methodist class on March 8, 1857, the first religious organization in the little settlement of Masonville.

In 1866 it was decided to build a church. The deed was in the name of the Congregational Society. All helped to build the stone structure, now a part of the Congregational Church.

The first Methodist church building was constructed in 1869, a flat-roof structure costing $3,000. The congregation is now worshipping in its third building, valued in excess of $1,000,000. A large cross-section of the city's populace, 3,000 persons in a city of 32,500 population, are members of the present-day church, and many others turn to it for spiritual help and guidance.

MASSACHUSETTS, one of the five smallest states in the Union with an area of 8,257 square miles and a population of 5,630,224 in 1970, has, from its Puritan beginning at Plymouth in 1620 to the present, made a distinctive imprint upon the character and culture of the United States. The nickname "Bay State" characterizes the eastern shoreline bordering the Atlantic Ocean. It suggests a great history of fishing, shipbuilding, and commerce. The Indian word "Massachusetts," meaning "near hills," characterizes the intervening 140 miles to the Berkshire Hills near New York State; it suggests small farms, diversified industry, and the tourist trade. Into this territory Methodism made a late organizational thrust in the final decade of the eighteenth century.

To be sure, GEORGE WHITEFIELD impressed thousands throughout Massachusetts with his preaching during the evangelical revival from 1740 onward. In Boston CHARLES WESLEY, stormbound en route from Georgia to England, had preached in 1736; there RICHARD BOARDMAN organized a class in 1772; there WILLIAM BLACK served Methodism briefly in 1784, and there FREEBORN GARRETSON did the same a few years later. But all of those early efforts were without permanent results.

To JESSE LEE history appropriately accords the title, "Apostle of New England Methodism." Having been appointed at JOHN STREET CHURCH in NEW YORK CITY on May 28, 1789 to "the Stamford Circuit," as yet without boundaries or organization, Lee began his New England work the following month in Norwalk, Conn. By the summer of 1790 he had penetrated Massachusetts, preaching in Wilbraham on May 3 and in Boston, July 9. His first organizational success was the establishment of a society in LYNN on Feb. 20, 1791. The following year a small society was organized in BOSTON. As time passed, Lynn became the stronghold of Massachusetts Methodism.

Bishop ASBURY made his first visit to Massachusetts in 1791. He was disappointed because Methodism was being so poorly received throughout New England. Methodism's difficulty in Massachusetts, as in other parts of New England, was threefold. (1) Congregationalism and Anglicanism were already well established; in many communities the established clergymen were supported by taxation; and the coming of itinerant enthusiasts threatened the social and economic status of the community. (2) The "experimental nature" of Methodism with field preaching, extempore prayers, and testimonies was viewed suspiciously by conservative Yankee Calvinists. (3) Methodist leaders, including Asbury, had deliberately postponed work in Massachusetts and the other New England states, concentrating first on the South and the West, erroneously believing there was no "dearth of religion" in New England because of the "Edwards-Whitefield evangelical revival."

In spite of difficulties Methodism moved forward. In 1796 the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE was created. Originally including all the New England states, the boundaries of this conference were altered several times. By 1840 the words "the New England Conference" were synonymous with Massachusetts Methodism alone, minus sections not only in the extreme west but also in the southeastern and northeastern portions of the state.

There were 824 Methodists in Massachusetts in 1796. Between 1800 and 1820 there were nearly 600 conversions a year in the New England Conference. In 1900 the conference reported 40,667 members. Still numerically few in comparison with the total population of the state (about two percent were members of The Methodist Church in 1968), Massachusetts Methodists have exerted a liberalizing influence on the Christian church in Massachusetts and beyond out of all proportion to their numbers. This claim is substantiated by the work of ORANGE SCOTT, Henry Helms, and LEWIS O. HARTMAN in the field of social concerns; by the service of WILLIAM BUTLER, CLEMENTINA BUTLER, and GILBERT HAVEN in missions; by the ministry of JOHN DEMPSTER, WILBUR FISKE, and JAMES PORTER in education; and by the contribution of ALBERT C. KNUDSON and EDGAR F. BRIGHTMAN in theology. At the present time Massachusetts Methodists are striving to relate the pragmatism and piety of the Wesleyan revival to urban renewal, church extension, and ecumenicity.

The Methodist Protestants organized a small Boston Conference in 1830. It became a mission conference in 1880 and disappeared soon after 1900.

The Methodists began the publication of Zion's Herald in Boston in 1823. It changed names and combined with other papers for brief periods. Now a monthly it has been published under the original name for more than 140 years.

In 1970 The United Methodist Church had about 100,000 members in Massachusetts.

MASSEY, ALABAMA, U.S.A. McKendree Church, located in the far southwestern corner of Morgan County, north ALABAMA, is an old historic Methodist church.

Named for an early Methodist leader, Bishop McKENDREE, the McKendree Church was established in the 1820's as a society, where meetings were held in an old threshing barn, on Crowabout Creek. The old barn, weatherproofed and renovated, was used as a house of worship, which was served by visiting circuit-riders, until 1840. In that year, land was donated by Augusta Hewlett, grandfather of the late Roy Hewlett, Methodist minister of the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE. On this land a log church was built and this remained in use until the need for a larger church necessitated the building of a third structure across the road in the year 1887.

This sanctuary was used until the present church was built in 1947. Throughout these years, the McKendree Methodist Church has remained a vibrant witness to a faith as strong as its pioneer founders.

MASTER, VIRJIBHAI KHOJABHAI (1892-1953), and ITHIELBHAI VIRJIBHAI (1912-), Gujarati Methodist ministers, were father and son.

Virjibhai, the father, was born at Uttarsanda, a village five miles from Nadiad. His education began in a Salvation Army primary school in his village. He came to the Methodist Boys' School at Nadiad when he was about nine years old. He passed the Vernacular Gujarati Final Examination, equivalent to the sixth grade, and then entered the Florence B. Nicholson School of Theology in Baroda, where he was known as an intelligent and studious young man and a fervent Christian. He served acceptably in rural appointments; and, while not neglecting any part of his pastoral duty, he continued his Bible study and acquired considerable freedom in the use of English.

He became a teacher in the school of theology, and a missionary colleague said of him, "He studies harder than any of his students." While teaching in the seminary, he began editing a Gujarati language paper. He translated into Gujarati the Methodist Book of Discipline and a number of English hymns. For a few years, he was principal of the school of theology. Other appointments were the pastorate of two strong city churches, the superintendency of three districts, and the chaplaincy of the Nadiad Methodist Hospital. He died on April 15, 1953, in Baroda.

Ithielbhai, his son, is a graduate of LEONARD THEOLOGICAL COLLEGE. AS A CRUSADE SCHOLAR he took advanced training in the United States, earning a Master's Degree from SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY at Georgetown, Texas, and a B.D. at ASBURY SEMINARY. He has served with distinction as a pastor and a district superintendent and has been prominent in interdenominational activities. For five years, he was vice-president of the India Christian Endeavor Union and was a delegate to the world convention of that body at London in 1950. For years he has been secretary of the Gujarat Regional Christian Council. He has represented his Annual Conference in the CENTRAL CONFERENCE OF SOUTHERN ASIA repeatedly, and has been delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE OF THE Methodist Church three times.

MASTERSON'S STATION, near Lexington, Ky., U.S.A., was the seat of the first Methodist Conference in KENTUCKY in 1790. Richard Masterson came from VIRGINIA and in 1784 built a log dwelling five miles northeast of Lexington. A Methodist class was organized in his home and soon a log meetinghouse was built, the first Methodist meetinghouse in Kentucky.

In the spring of 1790 FRANCIS ASBURY called the preachers who had come into Kentucky to meet him at this place in the first Methodist Conference to be held in the Kentucky territory. Bishop Asbury came through the wilderness from NORTH CAROLINA accompanied by RICHARD WHATCOAT (later Bishop), HOPE HULL, and John Sewell. At Masterson's Station they met with the six preachers, FRANCIS POYTHRESS, James Haw, WILSON LEE, Stephen Brooks, Barnabas McHenry, and Peter Massie. Thomas Wilkerson arrived later. The conference lasted for two days; Wilson Lee, Thomas Wilkerson and Barnabas McHenry were ordained elders. Bishop Asbury writes in his Journal: "We had preaching noon and night and souls were converted and the fallen restored."

There were no separate minutes taken of the conference. The only records we have are from the testimony of those who were present. To the two circuits in the state, two new circuits were added and four new preachers were assigned. Francis Poythress was appointed as presiding elder. The membership of the church was reported as 1,265 whites and 107 colored. Plans for BETHEL ACADEMY were adopted. No other church had at that time undertaken such an enterprise. A subscription of 300 pounds in land and money was taken and the preachers sent out with instructions to "Beg for Bethel Academy."

MASTERTON, New Zealand, Homeleigh Children's Home, sixty-four miles northeast of Wellington, was established in 1921 as a Methodist home for children denied normal home care. It serves the southern half of the North Island. The home is a single unit, three-story concrete building to which a recreation wing was added in 1959. Funds for the establishment and partial maintenance of the home were provided from income from trust lands granted to the Wesleyans in 1852 by the colonial governor, George Grey. The home stands on fourteen acres of ground that produce vegetables, milk, and eggs for home use.

The first matron was Sister May Moriarty, and James Cocker was secretary-manager until his death in 1935. N. H. Prior, a foundation member of the board of management and honorary physician to the home, served for a record term of forty-two years before retirement in 1962.

JOHN B. DAWSON

MATHABATHE, SAMUEL, was born in Secocoeni's tribe, went to Pietermaritzburg in Natal to look for work in 1866 and was converted through the Rev. JAMES ALLISON. In 1873 he returned to his own people with a Christian companion, Johannes. The chief, Pahlala, threatened to kill him if he preached, so he went from house to house teaching the Bible. Four years later the chief died and his successor, his chief wife, a sister to Secocoeni, granted permission for services and a school. The work prospered. A church was erected. Converts were baptized by Dr. Hofmeyr of the Dutch Reformed Church who honored their wish to remain Wesleyans, and even gave them the Holy Communion. Two men were sent to the French Mission in Basutoland for training as teachers and on their return, worked under the direction of Mathabathe. In 1882 Mathabathe resisted an order of the chieftainess that a twin child should be killed according to heathen custom. In consequence, the church was burned to the ground and 200 Christians were ordered to leave. Mathabathe arranged for some to go North with Johannes while he took the rest to a farm in the South called Good Hope. Watkins purchased this farm 165 miles north of Pretoria, on behalf of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in 1883 and it became an influential mission station.

MATHER, ALEXANDER (1733-1800), British Methodist, was born at Brechin, SCOTLAND, in February 1733. His account of his early life, written in 1780, includes the story of how as a boy he joined the rebellion of 1745 and was lucky to escape with his life. The autobiography also contains an important description of his experience of CHRISTIAN PERFECTION in the years 1757-60. He had been converted under JOHN WESLEY's own preaching in LONDON in 1754 and became an itinerant in 1757. He was one of Wesley's closest confidants and lieutenants during the last ten years of Wesley's life, and in 1788 became the first of the itinerants to be ordained by Wesley for the English work.

Mather believed that Wesley had intended him to assume a guiding role in the government of the Methodist societies after his death and, together with THOMAS COKE, to exercise some kind of episcopal oversight of the whole body. The Conference of 1791, however, did not want an episcopal system, and both Mather and Coke were passed over in the election of the first president of the Conference, though Mather was chosen in 1792 as the second president. In 1794 Mather was associated with other leading preachers in the LICHFIELD PLAN, another attempt to graft an episcopal order onto the connection, but this scheme was also rejected by the Conference of 1794.

Mather was personally involved in the dispute which led to the expulsion of ALEXANDER KILHAM in 1796, and published a pamphlet defending the action of the Conference. He was perhaps the leading figure in the group of itinerants who would have liked to mold the Methodist system more closely on the Anglican pattern, but he never won the full confidence of the preachers as a leader, though he was greatly respected as "a perfect master of all the minutiae of the doctrines and discipline of Methodists." He died on Aug. 22, 1800.

JOHN NEWTON

MATHEWS, GEORGE MARTIN (1848-1921), American United Brethren bishop, was born east of CINCINNATI, Ohio, on the Mathews' homestead, Aug. 22, 1848. He graduated from OTTERBEIN COLLEGE, anticipating a legal profession. In 1872, he married Clara Belle Hopper, and had one son, Milton. Without consulting him, his home church recommended him for license to preach in 1878. The next year he was licensed by the Miami Conference, UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, and ordained by the same Conference in 1882. He graduated from Union Biblical Seminary (now UNITED THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY) also in 1882. He was pastor of the Summit Street Church, DAYTON, Ohio, 1884-89; served as presiding elder of the Miami Conference, 1889-94; was pastor of the First Church, Dayton, Ohio, 1894-98; and was associate editor of the Religious Telescope, 1898-1902.

At age fifty-three, he was elected bishop in 1902 where first he had residence in Dayton, Ohio, then in Chicago, Ill., for twelve years, but was back in Dayton for the last quadrennium. During this time he wrote two books: Justification (1902) and Christ in the Life of Today (1916).

Bishop Mathews touched every part of the church. He served on the executive committee of the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. He was distinguished for the tenderness and strength of his emotional nature, at once genuinely human and thoroughly Christian.

He died after a short illness at Dayton, Ohio, April 3, 1921. Orville Wright, the famous inventor, served as one of the honorary pallbearers. Interment was in Woodland Cemetery, Dayton.

JAMES K. MATHEWS

MATHEWS, JAMES KENNETH (1913-), American missionary and bishop, was born on Feb. 10, 1913, at Breezewood, Pa., the son of James Davenport and Laura Mae Wilson Mathews. He grew up in Ohio and Texas.

He received his A.B. degree from Lincoln Memorial University in 1934; his S.T.B. in 1937 from the Biblical Seminary in New York. He did graduate work in 1937-38 at the BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY. In 1957 he received his Ph.D. from Columbia University, his thesis being a study of the religious teachings of Mahatma Gandhi. In 1955 he spent a four-month leave in special studies on India at Cambridge University in England. He holds honorary degrees from Lincoln Memorial University, D.D., 1954; WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, D.D., 1965; LYCOMING COLLEGE, L.H.D., 1966; OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, L.H.D., 1967.

Following a brief pastorate in NEW YORK CITY, he was commissioned a missionary of the M. E. Church in 1938 and assigned to service in India. He served as pastor of Bowen Memorial Church in the city of BOMBAY.

On June 1, 1940, in Naini Tal, Northern India, he was united in marriage to Eunice Treffry Jones, an only daughter of Dr. and Mrs. E. STANLEY JONES. They have three children, Anne Treffry, Janice Virginia and James Stanley.

In 1941 he was transferred to Dhulia, West Khandesh district, north of Bombay, where he was superintendent of the Dhulia-Pantamba district, until he volunteered for military service. He was a major with the American Army in India during World War II, 1942-46. In 1946 he was elected to the staff of the Methodist BOARD OF MISSIONS in New York City as Secretary for Southern Asia. In 1952 he became associate general secretary of the Division of World Missions of the Board. In that position, he shared general administrative responsibility for the denomination's missionary program in forty-four countries.

In 1956, he was elected a bishop of The Methodist Church by the SOUTHERN ASIA CENTRAL CONFERENCE (India), but resigned before consecration, believing that at that stage Indian Methodism was mature enough no longer to require non-Indians for its episcopacy. Two Indian national bishops were subsequently elected, MANGAL SINGH and GABRIEL SUNDARAM. In Washington, D. C., on June 17, 1960, he was elected a bishop of The Methodist Church by the Northeastern JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE and consecrated on June 19, 1960. He was assigned to residence in the BOSTON Area.

Bishop Mathews has been active in the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL and in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES; he is a member of its Central Committee and chairman of the Structure Committee. He has served as a member of the General Board of EVANGELISM; and of the General Board of EDUCATION of The Methodist Church and its Division of Higher Education, as well as chairman of the Department of College and University Religious Life. He has been chairman of the Interboard Committee on Missionary Education, the METHODIST COMMITTEE FOR OVERSEAS RELIEF, the Crusade Scholarship Committee, and the COORDINATING COUNCIL. He is a member of the General Board of Missions and of the Commission on Ecumenical Affairs of The United Methodist Church. He was chairman of the CONSULTATION ON CHURCH UNION, 1968-70. He was a member of the Executive Committee and of the Structure and Program Committee of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL and of the Advisory Committee for a World Conference on Religion and Peace. He has been a delegate to numerous international ecumenical gatherings of the World Council of Churches, the International Missionary Council and the World Methodist Council. He is a Vice-President of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES of Christ in the U.S.A., a member of its Executive Committee and General Board, as well as chairman of its Division of Christian Unity.

Bishop Mathews is chairman of the Board of Directors of North Conway Institute and of the Board of Trustees of SANTIAGO (Chile) College. He is also a Trustee of BOSTON UNIVERSITY, where he is a member of the Executive Committee; of the New England Deaconess Hospital; KENTS HILL SCHOOL; TILTON SCHOOL; CLAFLIN UNIVERSITY; and Bangor Theological Seminary.

Bishop Mathews is the author of South of the Himalayas, 1955, a popular study of India and Pakistan and the story of Methodism in those lands; To the Ends of the Earth, 1959; Eternal Values in a World of Change, 1960; A New Church for a New World (1968); and of many articles and papers for presentation.

MATHEWS, JOHN (1826-1907), colorful American pastor, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., June 13, 1826, the son of Scotch-Irish parents. As a youth he moved to Shelbyville, Tenn., where he joined the Presbyterian Church but soon transferred to the M.E. Church, South. He was licensed to preach in 1845 and was admitted to the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE in 1846.

In the spring of 1852, after serving several charges and while pastor at Andrew Chapel in NASHVILLE, Mathews responded to the call for volunteers for CALIFORNIA. Finding that the M. E. Church was already well entrenched in California, and perceiving that of necessity he would be compelled to defend the M. E. Church, South against the charge that it was a slave church, and knowing that in so doing he would have to say things that would not harmonize with his own convictions, he soon concluded that he had made a mistake. In the spring of 1853 he requested a transfer back to the States, but the bishop (JOSHUA SOULE) refused to grant it. Determined, Mathews boarded the next steamer out of SAN FRANCISCO and returned to Tennessee. That fall Bishop WILLIAM CAPERS broke church law and appointed him as supply preacher at Fayetteville, Tenn., even though he was still a member of the PACIFIC CONFERENCE. In 1854, that conference located Mathews and he was then readmitted to the Tennessee Conference. He married Mary A. Menefee, April 30, 1857, and they had five children.

Mathews soon gained recognition as an able pastor-evangelist. He preached to great audiences wherever he served and won thousands of converts in his long ministry. He was unique. He had the capacity to arouse enthusiasm for himself and the cause he represented. In the pulpit he used five or six sheets of paper filled with notes. Grasping the sheets at the lower lefthand corner, he would fan them out at the top as he preached. His hearers observed that when the sermon was well fanned out, so to speak, Mathews was through preaching. Mathews was so popular that at the end of his first pastorate at Centenary Church, St. Louis (1890), a testimonial was presented to him by the mayor of the city, the judges of the criminal courts, the prosecuting attorneys, and the heads of the police department. After three years at St. John's Church in St. Louis, Mathews returned as pastor at Centenary in 1893 and, contrary to the law of the church which limited pastorates to four years at that time, stayed five years. During the fifth year his appointment was listed in the conference journal as "Sunday school Agent and member of Centenary Quarterly Conference."

Mathews served about thirty charges in his long career. In addition to those already mentioned, some of his more important assignments were: Franklin, Decatur, Gallatin, Spring Hill, and McKendree (Nashville) in Tennessee; Auburn, Florence, MONTGOMERY, TUSCALOOSA, Tuskegee, and Wetumpka in ALABAMA; Carondelet Street, Felicite Street, and Rayne Memorial in NEW ORLEANS; and Walnut Street and Washington Street in KANSAS CITY, Mo. He was appointed to the important McKendree Church, Nashville, when seventy-two years of age. During his fourth year there his health suddenly failed and he retired at once.

Mathews' autobiography, Peeps Into Life, published in 1904, shows that he was a dedicated minister, a keen observer of life, an able preacher, and an interesting writer. He died in St. Louis, Sept. 1, 1907, and was buried there. A great crowd attended his funeral.

MATHIAS, REX (1907-), Australian church leader, was born at Maldon, Victoria on Jan. 9, 1907. He is a graduate of the University of Melbourne. He served for nine years as a journalist on the staffs of The Herald and The Argus, both of MELBOURNE. In 1932 he was accepted as a candidate for the ministry and entered the Theological Hall, Queens College, and secured his M.A. degree in 1934. He gained the Selly Oaks Colleges' Diploma of Religious Education and for two years was a lecturer in the Westhill Training College, Selly Oak, BIRMINGHAM, England. On his return he was appointed as a staff member to the VICTORIA AND TASMANIA Methodist Young People's Department and in 1940-44 was Chaplain at WESLEY COLLEGE.

He became the First Director of the Council for Christian Education in Schools (Victoria), 1944-46, followed by an appointment as First Director of the Methodist Federal Board of Education and Co-Director and Editor-in-Chief of the Joint Board of Graded Lessons of AUSTRALIA and NEW ZEALAND. Always interested in mass media, he was first Chairman of the Australian Religious Film Society, 1945-64. He was a popular and regular speaker on Melbourne's famous Yarra Bank on the "Voice of Methodism" platform, 1946-61. Deeply involved in Evangelism, he served as Secretary to "The Mission to the Nation," 1953-56.

Elected as Secretary of the Victoria and Tasmania Conference, he became President in 1962-63. In 1965-69 he was Superintendent of the Canberra Circuit, Australian Capital Territory, and is now Chairman of the Geelong Synod District, Victoria and Tasmania Conference.

He is the Secretary-General and President-General elect of the General Conference of the Methodist Church of Australasia, 1969-72.

MATIU and RIHIMONA, New Zealand Methodist Maori laymen, were the first martyrs for Christ among their people. During 1837, the two young men, accompanied by Wiremu Patene and Hohepa Otene went to preach the Gospel to a Chief Kaitoke, who lived near Mangamuka (Northland).

Kaitoke had threatened to kill anyone who dared to preach the Gospel to him and fired on the party, killing Matiu and Rihimona, and wounding the others. The relatives of the martyrs attacked and captured Kaitoke, who, after receiving instruction, professed a desire to become a Christian.

MATLACK, LUCIUS C. (1816-1883), American minister and organizer of the Wesleyan Methodist Connection in the United States, was born in BALTIMORE on April 28, 1816. Having been licensed to preach, he was recommended for reception into the PHILADELPHIA ANNUAL CONFERENCE in 1837. He was refused admission by a unanimous vote because of his abolitionist sentiment, and in 1838 he was rejected a second time for the same reason. In 1839 his license was withheld, whereupon he accepted an invitation from ORANGE SCOTT and went to New England. There he was relicensed by the Quarterly Conference at Lowell, Mass., and was received on trial into the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE in 1840. In protest against the ambiguous position of various Methodist conferences on the matter of slavery, Matlack in 1842 joined with Orange Scott, La Roy Sunderland, and Jothan Horton in a statement of withdrawal from the M. E. Church and agreed to call a convention to organize a new denomination, "free from episcopacy and slavery." Thus began the Wesleyan Methodist Church in America.

Matlack filled many offices of trust in the new organization, at one time serving both as Connectional Agent and Editor, and as president of the General Conference. In 1860 he was appointed chaplain of the 8th Illinois Cavalry but was soon transferred to the fighting ranks of the Union Army as a major, and for heroic services in the field he was breveted colonel of the 17th Illinois Cavalry.

In the fall of 1866, however, Matlack along with Luther Lee, John McEldowny, and Cyrus Prindle withdrew from the Wesleyan Connection in disappointment over the failure of merger considerations with the M. P. Church. Matlack reunited with the M. E. Church, being received by unanimous vote and with great cordiality into the Philadelphia Conference in 1867.

He served appointments on the Wilmington District until 1869, when he transferred to the LOUISIANA CONFERENCE. He was presiding elder of the NEW ORLEANS District until 1873, when he transferred to the WILMINGTON CONFERENCE which had been formed out of the Philadelphia Conference. Matlack continued to serve appointments in Wilmington and Easton Districts, with four years as presiding elder of the Wilmington District, until his death at Cambridge, Md., June 24, 1883.

Matlack was married twice. First to Miss Maria Ruhl of Philadelphia, who died in New Orleans; and in 1873 to Miss Roberta H. Stephenson, who, with a son, survived him.

MATTOON, ILLINOIS, U.S.A. (population 19,616). First Church is a large church in a small city with approximately ten percent of the people in its membership. As early as Jan. 5, 1856, there is a filed record naming "trustees of the M. E. Church of Mattoon, as of the 18th day of August last." In 1856 W. R. Howard, a circuit rider, gathered together eight people and organized the first Methodist Society of Mattoon. The first meetings were held in the homes of the people, and among the first members was Clemm Goar, who was the moving spirit of the group. The first resident pastor was Benjamin Newman, who came in 1857.

In 1859 the first church building, a brick edifice with ceiling eighteen feet high and costing $10,000, was dedicated at what is now 1318-1320 Campaign Avenue. A great storm did much damage to the church building in 1864.

By 1871 the town's population had shifted, so the congregation erected a larger brick church at the northwest corner of Charleston Avenue at First Street (now 17th). This cost $12,500. E. D. Wilkins was then pastor. In 1878-79 the membership was 463 and average Sunday school attendance was 321. Mr. and Mrs. Dudley Hopper deeded their home to the church for a parsonage, and it was used by J. B. Horney, 1900-03.

The second church building was completely destroyed by fire June 15, 1901, and the cornerstone for the present church was laid April 10, 1902. The new church on a new site was dedicated in February 1903. It cost $42,500, and had a membership of 750.

After some improvements, a rededication service was held in 1910 with Bishop WILLIAM A. QUAYLE preaching. Value of the property then was $60,000. Under G. W. Oliver, 1913-15, the membership reached 1,640. THOMAS B. LUGG was pastor from 1928 to 1931, and he later became general treasurer of WORLD SERVICE AND FINANCE of The Methodist Church.

During the pastorate of Leland L. Lawrence, 1946-49, remodeling and improvements were made costing $140,000. Under the present pastor, Clifford C. Brown, 1964- , remodeling for new classrooms was done. Also a building was purchased in the church block for educational purposes costing $63,000.

Forty-two pastors have served First Church. It has entertained three annual conferences, the first in September 1874. In 1970 First Church had 1,839 members and the property was valued at $651,066.

MAXEY, ELIZABETH (1846-1924), was a Methodist deaconess in CALCUTTA for many years. She was closely associated with the ministry of FRANCIS WESLEY WARNE while he was pastor of Thoburn Church, Calcutta. Before leaving for INDIA in 1888, she had taught in OHIO schools for twenty-one years.

Miss Maxey succeeded in helping a vast number of people, moving easily and often between the palaces of the wealthy and the hovels of the poor. Among those who bore witness to her helpfulness were the renowned merchants and their wives, Sir Thomas and Lady Lipton and Sir Robert and Lady Laidlaw. The former invited her, after she returned, to their home in Britain and provided the expenses of her return to India. The latter were members of Thoburn Church and conferred with her often about the needs of poor Anglo-Indians and Indian Christians.

Bishop Warne testified to her rare ability to move well-to-do people to assist the needy, and credited her with an influence upon Robert Laidlaw that contributed largely to his magnificent benefactions to Calcutta Boys' School and to other English-language schools in India.

Miss Maxey died in Urbana, Ohio, May 30, 1924.

THOMAS MAXFIELD

MAXFIELD, THOMAS (d.1784), British Methodist, was converted as a young man under JOHN WESLEY's preaching at BRISTOL on May 21, 1739, and was soon made the leader of a band there. The following year he accompanied CHARLES WESLEY to LONDON, where he was given pastoral responsibility as a trusted assistant leader. It was almost certainly in the winter of 1740-41 that John Wesley left him in pastoral charge of the FOUNDERY society while he went to Bristol. During that period Maxfield gradually progressed from speaking of his Christian experience and giving general exhortations to preaching, i.e. expounding a text from the Bible. In Wesley's view this was the prerogative of an ordained DEACON, to whom alone was committed the ministry of God's Word. When news of this indiscretion was relayed to him in Bristol, therefore, he hastened to London, complaining to his mother (who spent her last years at the Foundry), "Thomas Maxfield has turned preacher, I find."

She replied, "Take care what you do with respect to that young man, for he is as surely called of God to preach as you are. Examine what have been the fruits of his preaching, and hear him also yourself." Having followed her advice, Wesley's "prejudice bowed before the force of truth: and he could only say, 'It is the Lord: let him do what seemeth him good.'" (Coke and Moore, Life of the Rev. John Wesley, pp. 219-20.)

Maxfield made a similar deep impression upon Selina, COUNTESS OF HUNTINGDON. Thus convinced, in the early months of 1741, John Wesley began to employ Thomas Maxfield as a full time lay preacher, his first "son in the gospel," the forerunner of the many more without whose assistance it would have been impossible to extend and sustain the Methodist societies throughout the British Isles.

For many years Maxfield remained one of Wesley's most trusted itinerant preachers, present at many conferences, and from 1745 onwards named one of the ASSISTANTS, although the minutes for 1755 listed him for the time being as one of the chief LOCAL PREACHERS. At the 1758 conference his name followed immediately those of the Wesleys, a position which would have been especially appropriate if (as is likely) he had already been ordained priest by Dr. William Barnard, bishop of Derry 1747-68. This ordination was on Wesley's recommendation, and the bishop told Maxfield: "Mr. Maxfield, I ordain you to assist that good man, that he may not work himself to death."

Maxfield was an emotional preacher, and somewhat inclined to exaggeration. In the early 1760's he became the leader of a group of London visionaries (including GEORGE BELL) who rejected normal Methodist discipline. Disowned by Wesley (or disowning Wesley, depending on the point of view) in 1763 he set up as an independent minister in London. In 1766 he published for his congregation A Collection of Psalms and Hymns, with a companion Collection of Hymns for the Lord's Supper. The following year he issued A Vindication of the Rev. Mr. Maxfield's Conduct in not continuing with the Rev. Mr. John Wesley, and of his behaviour since that time, which Wesley belatedly answered in print in 1778.

Maxfield married a wealthy lady, Elizabeth Branford, one of GEORGE WHITEFIELD's converts, by whom he had a large family. She died in 1777. Maxfield himself was seized with a paralytic stroke on Dec. 21, 1782, and died March 18, 1784. His breach with Methodism was to some extent healed during his later years.

MAXWELL, D'ARCY, Lady Maxwell (?1742-1810), Scots Methodist, was the youngest daughter of Thomas Brisbane of Brisbane, Ayrshire, SCOTLAND. Educated in Edinburgh, at sixteen she went to live in London with her aunt the Marchioness of Lothian, by whom she was presented at court. Shortly afterwards she married Sir Walter Maxwell, fourth baronet of Pollok, Scotland, but at the age of nineteen lost both her husband and their baby son. Personal tragedy led to a deepened spiritual life, conversion, and an unceasing spiritual pilgrimage. Later she testified: "God brought me to himself by afflictions." In January 1762 she entered into a solemn covenant with God, which she put into writing in 1764 and frequently renewed, especially at Holy Communion.

Shortly after her husband's death Lady Maxwell had moved to Wariston's Close, Edinburgh, and became a member of the West Kirk (St. Cuthbert's). Although at first she employed a private chaplain of the Church of Scotland to care for the spiritual needs of her household, after a few years she herself conducted daily worship for them, a practice which she kept up for about forty years.

D'Arcy, Lady Maxwell, was much more sensitive and saintly than her friend, the somewhat imperious LADY GLENORCHY, yet she retained the attributes of Martha as well as of Mary. Named as Lady Glenorchy's executor, she faithfully prosecuted her friend's chapel-building and other religious projects. On her own account she also founded in 1770 and continued to maintain a charity school in Edinburgh, where by her death over 800 poor children had been trained. She was a keen advocate of SUNDAY SCHOOLS, of which she founded at least three, two in Scotland and one in England.

Membership of the Methodist Society was open to those who wished also to continue as churchmen or dissenters, and in 1764 Lady Maxwell seems officially to have become a Methodist, remaining such until her death, although her name does not appear in the earliest extant Society Book, dated 1806. The Society Book does record, however, that the Methodist preachers in Edinburgh were still holding a special CLASS MEETING in the evenings as at first. She also met in a Methodist BAND, and was one of the most generous and enthusiastic supporters of Methodist principles and causes. During the bitter Calvinistic controversy of the 1770's Lady Maxwell remained loyal to Wesley, even in a stronghold of Calvinism.

She had first become friendly with JOHN WESLEY in 1764, and maintained a regular correspondence with him until his death in 1791, when she inserted a notice of his death in the Edinburgh newspapers, pleading for belated justice "to one of the greatest characters that has appeared since the apostolic age." At least twenty-five of Wesley's letters to her are known. He constantly urged her to eke out her frail health by exercise and travel, advice which she followed. She died July 2, 1810, respected and beloved by Methodists and Presbyterians alike.

MAYFIELD, ROBERT GREENLEAF (1911-), American lay leader, was born at Lebanon, Mo., on July 31, 1911. He was educated at the University of Missouri where he got his LL.B. degree; he was given the honorary LL.D. from ILLINOIS WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, 1958. His wife was Frances Margaret Odom, whom he married on Jan. 12, 1943, and they have two children.

Dr. Mayfield was admitted to the MISSOURI bar in 1935, and practiced in his native town of Lebanon for some seven years, at which time he became associate secretary of the GENERAL BOARD OF LAY ACTIVITIES of The Methodist Church with offices in Evanston, Ill. He became General Secretary in 1952 and served in that capacity until 1968. He served with the Army of the United States, 1942-46, and again from 1950-52.

He was a member of the Board of Managers of the United Church Men during the period 1952-68, and was a lay member of the Third Assembly of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES at New Delhi, India, 1961, and of the Fourth Assembly at Uppsala, Sweden, in 1968. He was also a delegate to the WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCES of 1956, '61, and '66, and was a member of the executive committee of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL. He is presently Assistant to the President in stewardship at ASBURY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

MAYSVILLE, KENTUCKY, U.S.A. The area of Mason County, formerly Bourbon County before statehood was granted, was touched by Methodism after Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY at the 1786 Conference in BALTIMORE created a KENTUCKY Circuit. Two years later he visited the settlement of Limestone (now Maysville), and created the Limestone Circuit. BENJAMIN OGDEN and James Hav, said to be the first itinerant Methodist preachers to set foot on Kentucky soil, organized the second Methodist Church in Kentucky in 1786. This was in a cabin occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Stevenson. Mrs. Stevenson had united with a church in MARYLAND in 1768, and she became a member of this second Methodist church organized in Kentucky. This church was located within a few miles of Maysville, or Limestone. When Limestone was a trading post and Indians lingered in the area the first Methodist church was built in Maysville. Samuel Tucker and Joseph Lillard were the first pastors assigned to Limestone Circuit. Returning from a trip with friends, Tucker was the only person to survive an attack by Indians, but expired soon after reaching Maysville and was buried in an unmarked grave located in the area of Front and Market Streets.

In 1813 the first Methodist church, a small frame building, was erected on the south side of Second Street adjoining Graces Alley. Four different buildings occupied this site, the last of which was dedicated in 1891. This building was dismantled in 1966 and the site is now occupied by a car lot.

In 1844, pursuant to provisions of the PLAN OF SEPARATION for churches in the border states to the Mason-Dixon Line to determine whether they would identify with the M. E. Church or the M. E. Church, South, 109 members of the Maysville Church voted to go to the new church, and ninety-seven to remain with the M. E. Church. The group with the majority vote claimed possession of the building and the M. E. group brought suit for possession of the property. This became a test case and went to the Court of Appeals in Frankfort, Ky., which decided in favor of the M. E. Church, South. Maysville Methodism thus became bitterly divided.

In 1847, John Armstrong, a wealthy merchant and a strong supporter of the old church, bought a parcel of land on Third Street and the Third Street M. E. Church was erected thereon. In 1946, following the Uniting General Conference in Kansas City in 1939, these two churches were united and Trinity Methodist Church was born. In 1955 a new sanctuary was erected.

Methodism has traditionally been a vital religious movement in Maysville and in later years Seddon Church and Central Church were organized. Few other towns of comparable size have more than one Methodist church. The Seddon Church was organized in 1888 and the Central Church in 1886. Scott Church, which gets its name from Bishop LEVI SCOTT, was organized in 1864, by a Rev. Talbert, and the first active pastor, Adam Nunn, was appointed in 1869. The LEXINGTON ANNUAL CONFERENCE (ME) was entertained at the Scott Church in 1872, 1877, 1895 and 1910.

The total membership of the four churches in 1970 was 1,873.

MAZE, MATTHEW T. (1857-1940). American bishop of the EVANGELICAL CHURCH, was born near Lewisville, Ind., on Nov. 16, 1857. In 1881 he married Katie Goar. They farmed in NEBRASKA from 1883 until 1888, when he was licensed to preach by the Nebraska Conference of the Evangelical Association. In the subsequent denominational division, Maze joined the minority group, which created The UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH. He served his denomination as presiding elder in the Kansas Conference (1895-1903), pastor (1903-06), and presiding elder again (1906-14). He also served (1914-18) as Treasurer of Western Union College in LeMars, Iowa, of which he had been a founder. His episcopal tenure extended from 1918 to 1934. He died in Lincoln, Neb., on Oct. 28, 1940, survived by his wife and two children. An outstanding administrator, Maze gave prominent support to the reunion which, in 1922, created The Evangelical Church. He also served for a time as President of the PENNSYLVANIA Council of Churches and gave active support to the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

CHARLES L. MEAD

MEAD, CHARLES LAREW (1868-1941), American bishop, was born in Vienna, N. J., on July 20, 1868, the son of Joshua and Alice A. (Hough) Mead of the NEWARK CONFERENCE. Charles Mead was educated at the Centenary Boarding School in Hackettstown, N. J., and later took his B.A. degree at New York University in 1896. While attending school in Hackettstown he met Eleanor M. Smith of Mauch Chunk, Pa. They were married in June 1896, after he had been ordained by the Newark Conference in the year 1895. Five children were born to them.

Bishop Mead served the following churches as pastor before his election to the episcopacy: Rutherford (1895-99); Hoboken (1899-1904); NEWARK, Centenary (1904-08); Hoboken (1908-09); BALTIMORE, First (1909-13); NEW YORK CITY, Madison Avenue (1913-14); and DENVER, Trinity (1914-20). He was elected bishop May 20, 1920 at the GENERAL CONFERENCE in Des Moines, Iowa. He served as bishop of the Denver Area from 1920-32. He then moved to KANSAS CITY where he was the presiding bishop from 1932 to 1941. He was the resident bishop of the area at the time of the Uniting Conference of Methodism.

Bishop Mead during the First World War felt the responsibility of aiding American soldiers and thus served with the Y.M.C.A. for six months on the front lines in France.

His ministry was recognized far and wide, SYRACUSE awarding him a D.D. in 1907 and the UNIVERSITY OF DENVER awarding him an LL.D. in 1920. Never a great intellectual, Bishop Mead was one of the "pastoral bishops" of Methodism during this period. His sermons were brilliant with pertinent illustrations and he knew the secret of touching people where they lived. He closely identified himself with those pastors under his care, and many of them regarded him not only as their bishop but as their counsellor and friend.

Bishop Mead died May 17, 1941, and is buried in Denver, Colo.

CHARLES L. MEAD, JR.

MEAD, STITH (1767-1834?), American preacher, was born in Bedford County, Va., the son of wealthy Colonel William Mead, and was educated at Augusta Academy in GEORGIA. He was converted in 1789 and three years later entered the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE.

Mead in his journal set down the happenings at this conference, including his admission: "Monday, May 21, 1792. We rode over Peter's Mountain by the Sweet Springs, to brother Edward Keenan's at REHOBOTH CHAPEL, Sinks of Greenbrier county, where I was glad to meet with the bishop, REV. FRANCIS ASBURY; HOPE HULL, Philip Cox, Jeremiah Abel, elders; Salathiel Weeks, John Lindsey, Bennett Maxey and John Metcalf, deacons. . . . James Ward and Stith Mead admitted on trial, as probationers. . . . Bennett Maxey and JOHN KOBLER, by requests of the bishop, related to the Conference their religious experience, and then the Conference adjourned until Tuesday, at 8 o'clock A.M., at which time J. Kobler, Geo. Martin, S. Mead were examined by the bishop before the Conference, first, of our debts; secondly, of our faith in Christ; thirdly, of our pursuits after holiness" (Armstrong, pp. 108-9).

In 1797 Stith Mead, WILLIAM MCKENDREE and LeRoy Cole were harbingers of a great Gloucester Circuit revival with marked power. Along with 500 conversions came persecution and Mead was strongly opposed, as he was later by his own relatives while founding Methodism in Augusta, Ga., 1798. His revival preaching was greatly useful elsewhere in VIRGINIA and Georgia—one convert being JOHN EARLY. W. W. Sweet says that Stith Mead was "the father of the Virginia camp meeting."

Mead served six years on the Georgia and RICHMOND Districts as a presiding elder, and in the 1808 GENERAL CONFERENCE. He located in 1816 but was readmitted as a superannuate. His journal, which was unfortunately consumed in the burning of Richmond at the evacuation of the Confederate troops in 1865, was of considerable assistance to William W. Bennett when he was writing Methodism in Virginia.

MEADOWS, CLYDE WILLIAMSON (1901-), American United Brethren (Old Constitution) bishop and youth leader, was born at Pamplin, Appomattox Co., Va., Jan. 3, 1901. His parents were both ministers, serving home mission fields.

He began high school in VIRGINIA and was graduated with an A.B. (1925) from Huntington College. The Lutheran Theological Seminary, Gettysburg, Pa., conferred upon him the B.D. and S.T.M. degrees. He was awarded the D.D. (1940) by Huntington College.

He definitely answered the call to the ministry under the influence of Christian Endeavor at the age of nineteen. He was licensed to preach in 1920. He has served in the pastoral ministry for thirty-nine years in INDIANA, PENNSYLVANIA and Ontario. He also was pastor-conference superintendent for twenty-eight years.

His pastorate of thirty-three years at the King Street Church of Chambersburg, Pa., saw church membership increased from 450 to over 1,300.

He was elected to the bishopric and served his denomination from 1961 to 1969, when he was retired as bishop emeritus. He has served on general church boards and for many years has been a trustee of the Milton Wright Memorial Home, Inc., which operates two institutions, one serving children and the other elderly people.

He was president of the International Society for Christian Endeavor from 1959 to 1962 and was vice-president before his election to the presidency. He was elected president of the World's Christian Endeavor Union at the convention in SYDNEY, AUSTRALIA in 1962.

He is the author of the books, Why We Choose Christ, Music in Christian Education, and A Christian and His Church, and numerous pamphlets on evangelism. He served as editor of three editions of The United Brethren Hymnal.

He likes to fly, holds a private pilot's license and has been labeled the "flying pastor."

MEADVILLE, PENNSYLVANIA, U.S.A., the seat of Crawford County, the center of farm and oil producing land thirty-three miles south of Erie on French Creek, was settled about 1788 by Major David Mead as a Revolutionary outpost.

Steps to establish ALLEGHENY COLLEGE, located here, were first taken in 1815. On March 24, 1817 this college was incorporated. Later that year a Presbyterian minister, Thomas Alden, was inaugurated as its first president. Originally controlled by Presbyterians, the college later (1833) was managed by the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church and subsequently by additional affiliated conferences. With an enrollment (1970) of 1,634 and a faculty of 121, almost sixty percent of the students continue academic work in graduate and professional schools. Influential far beyond the community of Meadville, distinguished names associated with the college have been MARTIN RUTER, LUCIUS H. BUGBEE, Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON, Bishop CALVIN KINGSLEY and JAMES THOBURN.

In 1806 ROBERT R. ROBERTS brought Methodist preaching to Meadville. The first service was held in a hotel bar room. Strong opposition to Methodism delayed the establishment of Meadville as a regular appointment on the Erie Circuit until 1818. In 1824 a class was formed; in 1825, under Robert C. Hatton, religious interest was stimulated and a church formed. The congregation met first in the upper story of a blacksmith shop. Joseph S. Barris, the first stationed pastor, reported 155 members in 1832. In 1867, through the generosity of Allegheny College friends, as well as townspeople, a beautiful stone edifice was erected to house the Methodist congregation. Three years later another Methodist congregation built and occupied what was then known as the State Street Methodist Church. Today the Stone Methodist Church has a membership (1970) of 1,542 and a church school enrollment of 628. Two smaller groups, Bethany and Centerville, are associated with Stone Church. The other large congregation, Grace Church, has a membership (1970) of 663.

ERNEST R. CASE

MEANS OF GRACE is a theological expression which has been much used by Methodists and indicates those services through which spiritual influences usually reach a Christian heart. UMPHREY LEE explains in his book, Our Fathers and Us: "And WESLEY's notion, which persisted for many years in this country as well as in England, was that men should attempt to use the grace of God as it came to them through the means. The phrase 'means of grace' is an old ecclesiastical phrase"—coming, he explains, into the English Prayer Book in 1662 in the General Thanksgiving. There thanks are given "for the means of grace and for the hope of Glory." The expression was of common usage so far as Wesley was concerned, and in one of his standard sermons, Wesley preached on "The Means of Grace." He defines these as "outward signs, words, or actions, ordained of God, and appointed for this end, to be the ordinary channels whereby He might convey to men, preventing, justifying, or sanctifying Grace."

Methodists do not teach that Grace is limited to participants in particular services but believe that it is freely given to the obedient heart through the operation of the Holy Spirit. They do, however, attach great importance to the faithful observance of the Means of Grace as these have been prescribed in Scripture, and as they are emphasized in John Wesley's General Rules. In the General Rules are emphasized the attendance upon the public preaching of God's word; private, family and public prayers; Christian conversation and testimony, in class or social meetings; reading the Holy Scripture; Baptism, the Lord's Supper and certain of the ordinances.

The chief of these means are prayer, whether in secret or with the great congregation; searching the scriptures (which implies reading, hearing and meditating thereon); and receiving the Lord's Supper, eating bread and drinking wine in remembrance of Him; and these we believe to be ordained of God, as the ordinary channels of conveying His grace to the souls of men. (Wesley, Sermon)

John Wesley omitted BAPTISM in his sermon on the Means of Grace. Suggden thinks that was because those to whom Wesley was preaching the sermon had already been baptized in infancy. Wesley, however, put the greatest emphasis upon using the Means of Grace, and had no sympathy for those who thought that people might know what is in the Bible simply by some inspiration of the Spirit, or that they must "wait for the Spirit" to impel them before they begin to utilize the Means of Grace. This was his quarrel with the enthusiasts—those who said that it was not right to use the Means of Grace unless ones' heart felt "inclined" to use them.

Wesley reacted heatedly against this. He said that we "must trample under foot that enthusiastic doctrine of devils that we are not to do good unless our hearts be free to it" (Rules of the Society, 1743). That is to say, when one does not feel like using the Means of Grace, Wesley believed that one was the very person who ought to use them. If anyone did not feel like praying, Wesley said he, of all people, needed prayer. Methodists in part got their name from their regularity in going to Communion—no matter how they felt—and for meticulously observing habits and acts taught by Scripture and put into practice by Christian life.

Lee calls attention to the fact that Methodists believe that the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was a converting ordinance, and that SUSANNA WESLEY herself was said to have been converted during her reception of the Lord's Supper. The BOARD OF EVANGELISM of The Methodist Church within recent years referred to certain practices devolving on Christians as "the Holy habits," but this expression does not seem to have been generally adopted and cannot quite be equaled with the Means of Grace. It refers more to acts of personal participation, to the purely human regimen found helpful, rather than to the objective divinely established procedures which may properly be called God's Means of Grace. "Our Methodists do not believe that any special form of worship is absolutely prescribed," said Bishop SIMPSON. "They do believe that wherever there is a sincere desire to please God, the person will engage in these varied exercises; and where these are neglected, Methodists have always felt that delinquent members should be instructed, admonished and warned." Simpson with the stern authoritarianism of his day added, "If willfully and persistently negligent, they shall be expelled from the Church." Modern Methodism is not as strict as this last injunction seems to imply, but it can be asserted that wherever the Means of Grace are neglected and are persistently ignored, the result is always a forgotten Church and a forgotten God. Methodists gladly join the Church of England and the Protestant Episcopalians in formally thanking God for "the Means of Grace and the Hope of Glory."

MEARA, WILLIAM (1871-1959), Methodist minister and twice President of the SOUTH AFRICAN CONFERENCE, was the son of a small farmer and was born at Dunmanway, West Cork. His boyhood ambition to become a sailor was overruled by his conversion and call to the ministry. After theological training in BELFAST, Meara served in three Irish circuits before coming to the Transvaal in 1899. Soon after his arrival the Anglo-Boer War broke out, and he interrupted his ministry at Barberton to serve as a chaplain to the British forces. During the years that followed, he served with great acceptance in Pretoria and other towns of the Province. He once again served as a chaplain to the forces during World War 1, first in the South West Africa campaign, and later in France where he had a narrow escape from death on the day Armistice was declared.

William Meara's greatest ministry was at the Methodist Central Hall in the heart of Johannesburg, South Africa's largest city. Here for fifteen years he wielded a great influence upon the life of the brash, young and growing metropolis of the Witwatersrand Gold Reef, and again, as in previous ministries, many people were led to know Christ as Saviour through his preaching and pastoral work.

In 1936 he was appointed to the Trinity Methodist Church, East London, and at the same time assumed the Chairmanship of the Queenstown District. A thriving work in both European and African circuits brought many problems, and he proved a wise and efficient administrator and a father-in-God to his ministerial brethren. It was during his East London ministry that he was elected twice to the Presidency of the Methodist Conference, the first man to reach this high office on two occasions for over forty years.

After a year's furlough and a brief three-year ministry in Pietermaritzburg, William Meara retired to Umkomaas, Natal, where he died on May 5, 1959. He is remembered by many with respect and affection as one of the outstanding figures of South African Methodism in the twentieth century.

MEEK, ROBERT ABNER (1867-1949), American minister and editor, was born on Dec. 7, 1867, at Black Hawk, Miss. He was the son of Robert Drayton and Martha Anne (Johnson) Meek. He graduated from the University of Mississippi in 1888, and received the D.D. degree from EMORY AND HENRY COLLEGE in 1910. His wife was Cornelia C. Crippen (b. Dec. 10, 1868), whom he married on Dec. 7, 1893. They had one son, Robert Edwin Meek.

Meek entered the NORTH MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE in 1890 and served at Carrollton, Vaiden, Coldwater, Tupelo, Starkville, West Point, Greenville (all in MISSISSIPPI), and then in 1906 went on to the Greenville District as presiding elder, 1906-09. In 1910 he became editor of the New Orleans Christian Advocate, the organ of the LOUISIANA and the Mississippi and North Mississippi Conferences (MES) and served until 1918. On leaving the Advocate, he served for the next four years as presiding elder of the Sardis District, North Mississippi. Meek was a born editor, knowing not only what to publish but how to give guidance with strong editorials in which he set forth well reasoned convictions with great strength and ability. He was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE (MES) of 1910, '14, '18, and '22. Locating in 1922, he was subsequently elected a lay delegate from North Mississippi to the General Conferences of 1926 and 1930. After he retired from the editorship of the New Orleans Christian Advocate, in his later years (1922-30) Meek edited an independent paper, The Southern Methodist, devoted largely to fighting what he considered to be harmful, modernistic trends in the church. He never failed to attack by name church leaders whom he felt were leading the people amiss, and as a Southerner bitterly opposed union with the M. E. Church. When he died, the editor of the Baltimore Southern Methodist in commenting on his life said that no church editor dared to evaluate R. A. Meek "until they were sure he could not reply." He was, however, greatly respected by his brethren and had many devoted followers. He was a trustee of MILLSAPS COLLEGE, serving for a time as vice-president of the Board; and also a trustee of the Methodist Hospital in MEMPHIS. He died on Feb. 4, 1949 in Lexington, Miss.

MEHARRY, JESSE (1806-1881), American farmer and philanthropist, son of Alexander and Jane (Francis) Meharry, was born Aug. 15, 1806, near Manchester, Adams County, Ohio. In 1827 he came to INDIANA and took up 240 acres of land at Shawnee Mound in Tippecanoe County. He was a very successful farmer. He was converted in 1828 at a CAMP MEETING. He was a life member of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Church. In 1869 he offered his 394-acre farm at Shawnee Mound as a gift to the state if the new agricultural college were located there. In 1876 he made his first gift of $11,000 to Indiana Asbury University. Meharry Hall in East College at DEPAUW UNIVERSITY bears his name. He was a delegate to GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1876. He married Jane Love Francis Aug. 10, 1831. There were no children, but eight homeless children made this their home and received a good start in life. He died Aug. 20, 1881.

MEHARRY MEDICAL COLLEGE, Nashville, Tennessee, began as the medical department of Central Tennessee College in 1876, an institution founded by the FREEDMEN'S

MEHARRY MEDICAL COLLEGE

AID SOCIETY of the M. E. Church. In 1900, Central was reorganized as Walden University, and the medical department was named to honor the Meharry family of Illinois, substantial contributors toward the expansion of the school.

The institution is one of two medical schools in the United States dedicated to the education of Negroes as physicians, dentists, and nurses. Through the assistance of the General Education Board (Rockefeller), Carnegie Foundation, and other benevolent agencies, it has been able to erect a modern plant for medical education. Forty percent of all the Negro physicians and dentists in the United States are graduates of this institution. Hubbard Hospital is also owned and operated by Meharry Medical College. The governing board has thirty-two trustees, elected by the board. The charter requires representation from The United Methodist Church but does not specify the number of persons.

JOHN O. GROSS

MEISTER, KARL PHILIP (1886-1965), American pastor and executive, and the first full-time executive secretary of the Board of Hospitals and Homes of The Methodist Church following unification. Born in Caledonia, Ohio, on Oct. 31, 1886, he was the son of Philip and Georgetta (Boyles) Meister. He married Jessie Irene Kinnamon on June 24, 1909, and there was one son, Herbert H. Meister.

He was a student at Ohio Wesleyan Prep. School, 1912-14; B.A. Cum Laude, OHIO WESLEYAN, 1918; D.D., in 1942; a student at BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, 1919-23. He was admitted on trial in the NORTHWEST OHIO CONFERENCE in 1917; and into full connection in 1922; became a DEACON in 1920, ELDER 1922. He served as field secretary of the Ohio Methodist Children's Home, Worthington, Ohio, 1914-18; office manager, Cincinnati Area, Columbus, Ohio, 1919; as pastor of Centralville Church, Lowell, Mass., 1920-23; field secretary Board of Hospitals, Homes and Deaconess Work of the M.E. Church, Chicago, 1923-24; secretary, church relations of Ohio Wesleyan University, 1924-30; the superintendent of Elyria Methodist Home and Hospital for Aged, 1930-39; superintendent, Norwalk District, 1939-43; superintendent, St. Luke's Methodist Hospital, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, 1943-44; and executive secretary, Board of Hospitals and Homes, 1944-56.

He was an official delegate to the National Health

Assembly in 1948; a member of the Advisory Committee, Children's Bureau, 1948-52; member Advisory Committee, Division of Aid to Dependent Aged, 1948-52; Mid-Century Conference on Children and Youth, 1950; Delegate to the National Conference on Aged and Aging, 1958; a charter member of the National Committee on Aging; a writer of articles for church and other publications.

Meister was an undisputed leader in health and welfare matters. He promoted the highest standards of care and service in the spirit of Christian compassion. He won for the Board of Hospitals and Homes a recognized place in the Church and in the nation.

He died on Feb. 13, 1965, in Elyria, Ohio.

MELBOURNE, Australia, capital of Victoria, was founded by John Batman and is AUSTRALIA's second largest city, with a population of over 2,000,000. Since the second World War European migration has accounted for Melbourne's population increase. Today this city is looked upon as Australia's financial bastion in addition to being a center of culture and learning. (For the beginning and development of Methodist work in and about Melbourne see VICTORIA AND TASMANIA CONFERENCE.)

WESLEY CHAPEL, MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA

The Methodist Ladies' College in Melbourne was founded in 1882 by W. H. FITCHETT and is a primary and secondary school for girls. It began with sixteen pupils and now has an enrolment of 2,000 in the main school. Fitchett encountered much opposition to his plan for a church school, largely because the governments of the Australian states had their own systems of education, and because of the financial outlay involved. However, his commanding influence in the church, his reputation as an author, and his personality prevailed and the school was established. During his forty-six years at the school (where he died in 1928), he saw the school grow and achieve good academic rating.

Fitchett was succeeded as principal by the late J. W. Grove, and A. HAROLD WOOD was principal from 1939 until his retirement in 1966.

Buildings now include a very beautiful chapel, an assembly hall of modern design with a seating capacity of 1,100, laboratories and other special buildings. The school has won distinction for its music under the leadership of Miss Ruth Flockart. A branch of the school was established in the Melbourne suburb of Elsternwick in 1929. This has an enrolment of over 500 and became an independent school in 1961.

Wesley College is a well-known boys' school in Melbourne, and is one of a group of independent boys' schools in that city. It was founded at a time when the discovery of gold was bringing great prosperity to Victoria, and it owed a great deal to the planning and enthusiasm of two great Methodists of those early days in the state, DANIEL J. DRAPER and Walter Powell.

The college was opened in January 1866, with J. S. Waugh as president and James Corrigan as headmaster. Subsequent headmasters include M. H. Irving and H. M. Andrews, A. S. Way, L. A. Adamson, Harold Stewart, Neil McNeil, W. H. Frederick, and T. H. Coates.

In 1933 the college was entirely rebuilt and enlarged through the gift of two generous laymen, A. M. and C. R. Nicholas, and it became one of the best equipped schools in Australia. From an original enrolment of eighty boys, Wesley College now has 930. Because of increased enrolment, accommodation and playing fields have proved inadequate and a fine property has recently been purchased in an outer suburb of Melbourne on which further playing fields are to be developed and a junior section of the school opened. The college is governed by a council of ministers and laymen appointed by the Victorian and Tasmanian Conference of the Methodist Church. Now over a century old, Wesley has a splendid scholastic and sporting record and numbers many outstanding jurists, statesmen, teachers, scientists and leaders of the church among the "old boys."

MELLARD, JAMES HENRY (1778-1855), pioneer American minister and one of the four original presiding elders of the ALABAMA CONFERENCE, first joined the old SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE in 1801. He served as an itinerant in GEORGIA, SOUTH CAROLINA, and NORTH CAROLINA, and was one of the first two missionaries (1808) to the Negroes ever sent out by the M. E. Church. On June 1, 1809, he married Ann Rumph, and located the next year. In 1821 he was still a local preacher in Autauga County, Ala. Mellard contributed greatly to the spread of Methodism in MONTGOMERY, for he preached Aug. 26, 1821, in the Montgomery County Court House, and is said to have organized the FIRST METHODIST CHURCH in MONTGOMERY, Ala., on Sept. 25, 1829.

Mellard joined the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE in 1827 and was appointed to the Alabama Circuit. In 1828 he became presiding elder of the Alabama District. He was thus one of the original presiding elders in 1832 when the Alabama Conference was established. He was also appointed one of the first trustees of LA GRANGE COLLEGE, chartered in 1830 as the first college in Alabama.

In 1833 he located again, but he continued to labor as a local preacher for twenty-two years, while rearing a large family. By his first wife, Ann Rumph, he had five children. On Nov. 5, 1822, he married Mrs. Sophie Addison, and they had five children. By Mrs. Rachel M. Rumph, whom he married May 2, 1837, he had one child. He died Nov. 17, 1855, at the age of seventy-seven years, having been a preacher of the gospel in connection with the Methodist Church for fifty-six years. He was buried near Three Notch in Bullock County, Ala.

F. OTTO MELLE

MELLE, F. H. OTTO (1875-1947), German bishop, the first one to be so elected by the GERMANY Central Conference, was born at Liebhengruen (now East Germany). His parents were devoted Methodists, his father a lay preacher. After studying at Frankfurt Methodist Theological Seminary and one year as pastor at Dresden, he was appointed to serve in the then UNITED AUSTRIA and HUNGARY as missionary and superintendent (1900-20). Through his work missionary conferences were founded in these countries and in the YUGOSLAVIA of post World War I. He married Hanna Eckardt in 1907; they had one son and two daughters.

In 1920 he was elected President of Frankfurt Theological Seminary. As an able educator he trained men from the BALTICS, Germany, and SWITZERLAND to Southeast Europe; numerically the Seminary has never again reached the peaks of the twenties. His asset in dealing with young men was a heart full of understanding. When the 1936 GENERAL CONFERENCE consented to the formation of a Germany Central Conference, F. H. Otto Melle was elected its first bishop and served until 1946, when he retired.

Bishop Melle was a superb leader of men, an extremely versatile administrator, and a pastor of pastors. His vision of a worldwide Methodist family with special emphasis on the United States and of German Methodist Free Church life challenged his students and his pastors. He was one of the foremost leaders of the German Evangelical Alliance; his struggle for total abstinence and for local administrative control of breweries and saloons, when put to a nationwide popular vote, failed to win a majority of the German people but was indicative of what he stood for and how he would fight for matters he considered essential.

He was a very powerful speaker and a popular preacher. Evangelism was near to his heart. He was in charge of the Germany Central Conference in years of the most difficult home situation and of nearly six years of total warfare. In responsibility before God he undertook the precarious task of steering clear of the various cliffs that threatened church and society during the Nazi regime. He did better than has been accredited to him at times, and the Methodist Church in Germany owes him more than can be expressed.

MELLO, JOEL JORGE DE (1914-1963), Brazilian lay leader, engineer, and businessman, was born in SÃO PAULO on Nov. 1, 1914. Though poor, Joel was able to graduate in engineering from Mackenzie University, an evangelical school, in 1936. Before graduation, he had been working for the Ingersoll-Rand Corporation of BRAZIL, and through them he was given an opportunity to study in the United States. On his return to São Paulo, he taught for several years in the Mackenzie Engineering School, and later became a director of the E.B.E.—Brazilian Engineering Enterprises.

In 1943 he married Arcília Rocha, by whom he had seven children. Though he went through more than one financial crisis in his business, he always succeeded in rehabilitating himself.

He worked with great consecration in three different Methodist churches in São Paulo, one of which he founded. He later became a supply pastor and worked without salary.

He was for some years secretary of Missions in the Third Region Conference. Deeply impressed with the possibilities of Christian witness by radio and television, Mello initiated a television program, "Songs of my Faith," which became popular. Not long before his death, he headed a campaign for the acquisition of an evangelical broadcasting station in São Paulo, and in time bought the Radio Cometa. Because of his sudden death, he was unable to liquidate all his commitments; but interested persons carried on, and today, Radio Cometa is a reality.

On his farm in nearby Guararema, he built an adequate camping site for young people, whatever their denomination, for study and relaxation. Also into his large country home, he and his wife cared for abandoned children, paying the support of a couple engaged to look after them. On Nov. 11, 1963, while traveling to a church meeting in Resende, state of São Paulo, he suffered a heart attack, which led to his death. He was buried in the Campo Grande Cemetery in São Paulo.

Numberless tributes were paid to his character. The city council of São Paulo gave his name to the street on which stood the Vila Mariana Church, which he had shepherded for two years.

MEMBERSHIP IN METHODIST CHURCHES. When early Methodist Societies were formed, they made no claim to be churches, but simply associations of Christians which enabled persons who belonged to them to increase their piety and usefulness. JOHN WESLEY, in outlining his GENERAL RULES for the United Societies stated that there was only one condition "previously required" for those who desired admission into these Societies, "a desire to flee from the wrath to come, and to be saved from their sins." (Paragraph 95, Discipline, 1968.) Admission into the Society was gained by showing a proper spirit, and by being approved by a minister or class leader after undergoing a system of probationary trial. Under this method of probation, the person was allowed all the privileges of the meetings, though was not received into full fellowship until after a period of six months acquaintance—or some definite time of trial. Receiving a member into one of these Societies or dismissing him from it, did not affect his membership in the Church of England, or other Church, to which he may have belonged. Indeed, there were members of the Societies who did not belong to any church at all when they were admitted.

When the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized in the United States, and later when the Wesleyan Church in Britain was organized, what had been a group of Methodist Societies became a Methodist Church. This had an immediate bearing upon the life and discipline of individual members. For when a person was turned out of an early Methodist Society, he did not thereby lose his standing in his Church nor his claim upon the Sacraments of the Church. But when church membership was entirely in a Methodist church which administered the Sacraments, and this was his sole ecclesiasticism, it was soon found that the church could not be as strict in expelling people and cutting them off from all churchly ordinances as the societies had been in holding members to the original special Methodist disciplines. There are those who say today that yet the marks of a society are deeply ingrained in all the Methodist churches.

Reception of Members. In the early days of the Societies and indeed during the formative period of the M.E. Church in America and elsewhere, the manner of receiving members into the Church was exceedingly simple. Those who wished to unite with the church gave their names to the ministers and were placed in classes, and if at the end of six months these were recommended by the class leader or by the pastor who had charge of training them, they were eligible to be received by the church as full members. There was, however, in American Methodism no regular ritualistic Form for the Reception of Members (as it was later called) either in the M.E. Church, or its cognate branches until past the middle of the nineteenth century. This was largely due to the fact that Wesley did not send over any office for Confirmation in the SUNDAY SERVICE (Prayer Book) which he sent to American Methodism. Eventually in the M.E. Church and the M.E. Church, South, forms for the reception of members were drawn up, which forms were greatly influenced by the Office of Confirmation of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America. These forms were revised from time to time, and when the three Methodist Churches united in 1939, a new form was drawn up which was used until 1964 when a further revision of this office was ordered.

This form now in the Ritual (see Book of Worship) and known as "Order for Confirmation and Reception into the Church" is the first time the name "confirmation" has been given frankly to this office in the Methodist Church. Disciplinary regulations provide that a person must be baptized before he or she may be received into the Church, but quite often when a person has not been baptized, baptism may be administered to such person just previous to or sometimes as part of the Office for Confirmation. The office itself calls for a public profession of faith on the part of the applicant, an affirmation of belief in the teachings of the Church, and a promise to conform to its Discipline. The vows thus taken pledge the one being admitted to obey the rules and regulations of The United Methodist Church. Within recent years the congregation present is made to participate in the reception of members by expressing an intent to assist and help the person being received (see the Ritual, in loc).

Present regulations in The United Methodist Church insist that admission to the Church shall be "without regard to race, color, national origin or economic condition." The membership of a local church is defined as consisting of all persons who have been received into its fellowship on profession of their faith, by transfer from some other church or by restoration, and whose membership has not been terminated by death, transfer, withdrawal, expulsion, or action of the Quarterly Conference. A member of a local Methodist church is a member of The United Methodist Church anywhere in the connection. (Discipline, 1964, Paragraphs 107-111.)

Further regulations provide that when anyone offers himself for membership, it is the duty of the pastor, or proper persons appointed by him, to instruct such persons in the meaning of Christian Faith and the history, the organization and teaching of The United Methodist Church, to explain the baptismal and membership vows and to lead them to commit themselves to Jesus Christ as Lord and Savior. When the minister is convinced that such persons have given proof of the genuineness of their faith, and their desire and ability to assume the obligations and become faithful members of the church, he is to bring them before the congregation, administer the vows and receive them into the fellowship of the church, and enroll them as members.

Children, as members, should be brought by their parents for Baptism at an early age. A roll of baptized children of the church constitutes a "preparatory membership roll" of the church (Discipline, 1968, Paragraph 122). When children are received into full membership, of course their preparatory period ends.

Various disciplinary regulations give instruction regarding preparatory membership, and as such regulations change from time to time, it will not be possible here to set forth the various changes which have occurred in them. Regulations regarding "probationary members," as those on trial were formerly termed, have also been altered from time to time.

Affiliate Member is a member of The United Methodist Church who resides for an extended period in a city or community away from his home church, but does not wish to take (change) his membership from his home church. He may, however, on his request be enrolled as an Affiliate Member of a Methodist church located in the vicinity of his temporary residence. The Discipline provides that the home pastor shall be notified of such affiliate membership, and the membership itself entitles the person to the fellowship of the church he attends, and to its pastoral care and oversight, and to participation in its affairs. He must however continue to be counted as a member of his own home church. Persons of other denominations may become associate members of a local Methodist church under much the same conditions as these outlined above.

Associate Members are often nominal members of another denomination, usually of a State church in lands outside the United States, who under rules adopted by a Central Conference, have been permitted certain of the privileges and responsibilities of membership in a local Methodist church. Such associate membership came about in certain lands where the support and fellowship of members of other Churches who were willing to give needed support and fellowship were made welcome. Regulations provided by the former Discipline of The Methodist Church held that no action should be taken in this regard contrary to the Constitution and to the General Rules of The Methodist Church. (Discipline, 1964, Paragraph 562.) Certain JUDICIAL COUNCIL decisions were made within recent years defining more particularly the powers of the Central Conferences in this regard.

Termination of Membership. Membership in the Methodist Church is considered to be a precious possession not to be terminated except by death, transfer, withdrawal, expulsion or action of the Quarterly (Charge) Conference (in British Methodism by the LEADERS' MEETING). The pastor must report the loss of any members at each Quarterly (Charge) Conference, and indicate the reason for such. One of the RESTRICTIVE RULES binding upon the General Conference prevents that body from making any regulation which would deprive a person of church membership without a due trial "before the church, or by a committee, and of an appeal." (Restrictive Rule 4, Paragraph 18, Discipline 1968.) Rather minute directions are given today guiding and directing the pastor as to what he shall do when a member wishes to transfer to another denomination, or finds that such a person, without prior notice has united with another denomination. Pastors also are carefully directed as to how they may furnish a letter of transfer to a member wishing to move to another church.

The Charge (Quarterly) Conference of the Church has the right to remove from the roll the name of a person if such person cannot be located, and if the Commission on Evangelism of the local church together with the pastor so recommends.

The duty, power and privilege of receiving members according to the Discipline of The United Methodist Church is in the hands of the pastor of each charge and of him only. This has been the case since the beginning of American Methodism. No conference, no bishop, no official board may forbid the pastor to receive any person whom he feels is properly qualified. But while only the pastor may receive, he may not expel, once a member is admitted. Only by procedures carefully outlined in the Discipline, the processes of a church trial—if one be asked or by action of the Quarterly Conference when a person's whereabouts cannot be located, may a name be dropped from the roll, death or withdrawal of course excepted. MEMOIRS AND MEMORIAL SERVICES. A memoir, in common parlance, may be an official note or report, or something to be remembered, but in Methodist practical usage, the term usually has to do with the biographical material covering the life of a deceased minister and published in the official Journal of his Annual Conference. Formerly such memoirs were read one after another at the Annual Conference in a formal memorial service. However, the great growth of the Conferences in later years, and the time which the reading of such memoirs consumed, well nigh forced the abandonment of such time honored procedure.

Of late years it has become customary in the Conferences of The United Methodist Church to have a formal memorial service in charge of a Committee on Memoirs at each Annual session, and to have a single address given by some selected person. This deals in general terms with the life and effectiveness of those whose memoirs are being presented. The separate memoirs are usually prepared by persons who are formally requested to do so by the Committee on Memoirs, which usually consults beforehand the deceased minister's family. The names of the departed brethren are all read at the memorial service with special places reserved for the families of the deceased who may be able to attend. The written memoirs are later published in the Conference Journal. These memoirs may be referred to for many important matters in connection with the life of the men memorialized.

A listing of the memoirs of all deceased ministers of the M.E., M.E. South, and M.P. Churches is kept in the library of the Publishing House in Nashville, so that when the name of one memorialized is given, it is possible to ascertain at once the Conference Journal and year in which the memorial appeared.

MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE, U.S.A. The first Methodist to preach in Memphis was probably Uncle Harry Lawrence, a Negro who preached to his people. The first society was organized in February 1826, nine months before the town was chartered. This became in time the First Methodist Church. T. P. Davidson was the first pastor, and there were three charter members, Mrs. Pauline Perkins, Elijah Coffee, and a Portuguese named Dickens. The church was part of the Wolfe River charge, a six-week circuit. In 1831 Bishop ROBERTS, presiding over the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE, appointed Francis A. Owen to organize a station. For a time they met in the "Blue Ruin Tavern." In 1832 land was purchased and the first church building of any kind in Memphis was erected, a frame building with split benches for pews. A Sunday school was organized the following year. By 1843 there were 300 white and more than 200 Negro members.

In 1840 Davidson's Chapel was organized near Fort Pickering, two miles south of the city limits. Asbury began in 1843, Forest Chapel and Edgewood in 1853, Central (St. John's) in 1859. The Civil War touched Methodism heavily. Several churches were used as hospitals by Union troops, two were burned, and Wesley Chapel (First) was assigned a Union chaplain as pastor.

Yellow fever in 1878 almost destroyed Memphis, but by 1900 there were fourteen churches. During the next twenty years, six more were organized. Then came a drought with no new Methodist church for twenty-six years. In 1946 Grimes Memorial was begun with thirty members, named for C. C. Grimes, district superintendent at the time. By 1970 there were two districts and sixty-nine churches in the city and county. The statistics report 46,- 750 members in the Memphis and Memphis-Shelby Districts.

ROY D. WILLIAMS

Christ Church was organized in the Poplar Plaza Theatre on June 26, 1955, with 600 charter members. The present membership is 2,610. While located in the affluent East Memphis residential area, it draws members from all over the city. The church was organized under the leadership of Charles W. Grant. Three additional ministers are on the staff.

There are two educational buildings and a sanctuary, with a seating capacity of 1,510, located on more than ten acres of ground. The sanctuary contains stained glass windows, much admired, with Scriptural symbols. Presently, plans are being drawn for a fourth and final building with additional classrooms, a gymnasium, and another library.

Due to a vital interest in missions, supporting missionaries in Brazil, Japan, Africa and Borneo, Malaysia, Christ Church ranked third in American Methodism in Advance Special giving, 1966-67. Christ Church has sponsored two new churches—Scenic Hills and Good Shepherd. It also sponsors a week day school, comprised of junior kindergarten, kindergarten, and grades one through six. State standards are met.

Christ Church is deeply interested in and is generously contributing to a Memphis renewal program, presently giving full support to an "Inner-City Worker." Total giving for all purposes in 1969-70 Conference year was $450,335. Church property is valued at $2,773,913.

Methodist Hospital, located at 1265 Union Avenue, was founded in 1918. The institution has grown from sixty-five beds to 900 beds, but its purpose, to serve as a haven of rest and treatment for the sick and needy—usually those of the Mid-South—has remained the same.

Ownership of the vast enterprise rests with the NORTH MISSISSIPPI, NORTH ARKANSAS and MEMPHIS CONFERENCES of The United Methodist Church, and is held in trusteeship. Trustees (six from each of the three conferences) are elected annually. The trustees in turn elect a Board of Managers to handle (under delegated power only) the actual operation of the hospital.

Methodist Hospital was incorporated in the state of Tennessee as a non-profit institution in 1922. On Sept. 17, 1924, the hospital moved to its present location with a capacity of 120 beds. Two and a half years later, the Lucy Brinkley Annex was completed, increasing the patient capacity to 185.

The West Wing, opened in November 1940, raised patient occupancy to 300. Construction in 1950 included the North Wing, a new laundry and storeroom, and additions to the Doctor's Office Building and Pharmacy.

The hospital acquired and began operating Memphis Eye, Ear, Nose and Throat Hospital with a patient capacity of sixty on Jan. 1, 1943.

Another major addition to Methodist Hospital, the East Wing, opened in June 1958. Ten stories high, the East Wing houses 246 patient beds. Also completed in 1958 was a new service wing constructed in connection with the East Wing. This service wing houses, among other things, a surgical suite and obstetrical suite.

On Jan. 13, 1966, the fifteen-floor William Green Thomas Wing, providing an additional 364 beds, was opened. Three additional service wing floors were also added. This new service area affords new X-ray, laboratory, physical therapy, surgical and intensive care unit facilities.

Another new feature of the Thomas Wing is the teenage patient floor located on the thirteenth floor. This new unit is manned by specially trained staff to care for children between the ages of twelve and eighteen. The floor provides a special recreation room for use of ambulatory patients. With the opening of the Thomas Wing, all operation of the Memphis Eye, Ear, Nose and Throat Hospital was moved to Methodist Hospital.

The Hospital maintains several educational programs. The School of Nursing is probably best known, and maintains the reputation of being one of the finest schools in the land. Other programs include schools for X-ray technicians, medical technologists, and inhalation therapists. In addition to the educational programs for interns and residents, the Hospital also has intern programs for administrative residents and graduate students in pharmacy.

Probably the largest and most extensive home mission program is carried on at Methodist Hospital through the Golden Cross Service Program, with contributions coming from the three owning conferences.

Both the Women's Auxiliary and the Volunteer Pink Lady Program make major contributions of time and financial support.

FRED MUNSON

St. Luke's Church has for many years enjoyed a unique position among the churches of the city.

The growth of the City of Memphis and expansion of Memphis State University have combined to make St. Luke's the largest Methodist church in the city and one of the most significant in the state. It is a church that always gives special attention to education, mission and youth.

St. Luke's began as an unattached preaching point, and then as Bethel Church on the corner of Prescott and Barron, where shortly after the Civil War a small, one-room, frame church was built on a lot given by D. R. S. Rosebrough.

In 1888 the church moved to the population center of East Memphis, a community called Buntyn. For sixteen years the church was known as the Buntyn Methodist Church. From 1875-1911 this church, known first as Bethel and then as Buntyn, was a part of the Springdale circuit, which circuit was Methodism's attempt to keep step with the eastward movement of the city in these years.

In 1911 the church, with 200 members, became a new appointment known as "The Buntyn Station."

In 1925 the property, at the center of the community on which St. Luke's now stands, was given to the church by John T. Fisher, a prominent Memphis Methodist business man. During the months while the congregation worshipped at West Tennessee State College, a small brick church was erected. This building is now the center for a Boy Scout program that reaches about 500 boys. In 1930 the present sanctuary of the church was built and the name changed to St. Luke's.

Since 1930 the story has been one of expanding program and increased membership. The area once served by St. Luke's now has ten Methodist churches—some of the most impressive churches in the City of Memphis. St. Luke's, with 3,082 members, continues to make plans for growth in membership, budget and building. It has been served by some of the most distinguished ministers of the MEMPHIS CONFERENCE. The longest pastorates have been those of James D. Jenkins, William C. Aden and James A. Fisher.

ST. LUKE'S CHURCH, MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE

The goal assumed by the church and pursued vigorously centers in youth with a determination to make the service of St. Luke's Church relevant to college young people today and across the years.

MEMPHIS CONFERENCE (ME) was organized at Jackson, Tenn., Nov. 4, 1840, with Bishop J. O. ANDREW presiding. It was formed from portions of the TENNESSEE and MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCES. When organized its territory included west TENNESSEE, west KENTUCKY, and north MISSISSIPPI. At the beginning the conference had 12,680 white and 1,995 colored members. Named for the City of Memphis which, though on the west side of the conference territory, was about equidistant from its northern and southern ends, the conference included what was and still is an important cotton producing area. After the division of the church in 1844, the Memphis Conference adhered South under the PLAN OF SEPARATION.

The conference grew rapidly. Starting with three districts and twenty-eight charges, it had ten districts and some 29,000 white and 7,000 colored members in 1850. In 1869 there were about 40,000 white and 235 Negro members. Notwithstanding the loss of the Mississippi territory to the NORTH MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE in 1870, the Memphis Conference had grown to more than 58,000 members by 1900, and at unification in 1939 it had more than 98,000 members.

In 1939 there was a determined effort to place the Kentucky section of the Memphis Conference in the LOUISVILLE CONFERENCE, in accordance with the plan to make annual conference lines conform as nearly as possible with state lines. Objection on the part of the Memphis Conference and its Kentucky members thwarted the move. In 1964 the Memphis Conference, knowing that one new episcopal area would be created in the Southeastern Jurisdiction, asked that it be so designated with the provision that the bishop reside in Memphis. But the Jurisdictional Conference after some debate awarded area status to the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE, the bishop to reside in RALEIGH.

Notwithstanding its record of growth, the Memphis Conference has been somewhat straitened through the years by the fact that the City of Memphis is in the extreme southwest corner of Tennessee. The Mississippi River on the west and the Mississippi state line immediately on the south constrict the conference. In working for expansion and growth the conference cannot cross the river into Arkansas or the state line into Mississippi; it can work only in the wedge of Tennessee territory. It is to the credit of the conference that notwithstanding this geographical constriction, it has done well through the years.

The Memphis Conference gave The Methodist Church its first GENERAL CONFERENCE Secretary (1939-1956), LUD H. ESTES, who also served many years as secretary of his own conference and as Secretary of the General Conference (1930-1938) of the former M.E. Church, South. Bishop WILLIAM C. MARTIN, who was elevated to the episcopacy in 1935, the last bishop elected by the former M.E. Church, South, was born at Randolph, Tenn., within the bounds of the Memphis Conference.

The Memphis Conference supports LAMBETH COLLEGE at Jackson, and in 1965 it voted to endow a Methodist Chair in Memphis Theological Seminary (Cumberland Presbyterian), when and if that institution is accredited. The conference is justly proud of the great Methodist Hospital at Memphis. Plans for building a retirement home are in progress.

In 1970 the Memphis Conference had eight districts, 370 ministers, 294 charges, 119,696 members, and property valued at $63,024,619.

MENDENHALL, MARMADUKE H. (1836-1905), American preacher and philanthropist, was born in Guilford, N.C., May 13, 1836. Upon moving to Union City, Ind., he joined the NORTH INDIANA CONFERENCE in 1856. He is remembered as an effective preacher and pastor, being elected to the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1880. In addition to his pastoral work, he engaged in numerous business ventures which proved quite successful. He endowed the Mendenhall lectureship at DEPAUW UNIVERSITY. This lectureship has attracted some of the keenest minds and best known ministers and theologians in the country as the annual lecturers. Mendenhall died Oct. 9, 1905.

HAROLD THRASHER

MENDOZA, VINCENTE (1875-1955), one of the most brilliant men in Mexican Methodism, was born in Guadalajara, Dec. 24, 1875. He studied with the famous teacher Aurelio Ortega and was looked after by David F. Watkins, a Congregational missionary. He first entered work at a printing plant but heard the call for the ministry and entered the Presbyterian Seminary. It was closed temporarily, and he went to the School of Theology in Puebla. He entered the Annual Conference on trial in 1899, and served churches in Tezontepec, Pachuca, Puebla, and Gante. From 1915 to 1921, because of the revolution, he went to CALIFORNIA and became a member of the SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE. There he lost his first wife, by whom he had four children. Then he married Natalia García Bravo. From 1922-38 he was part-time pastor, and also teacher at Union Evangelical Seminary. Also he acted as a newspaper editor. From 1947-48 he devoted his time to the Seminary. He retired in 1949 but was active until illness and death came on June 14, 1955.

Mendoza was a strong speaker, good writer and poet, lecturer and teacher. Large congregations and numerous audiences outside the church gathered to listen to his interpretation of the Bible and to his prophetic word. At institutes, conventions, ministerial assemblies, and all kinds of gatherings, his Bible classes were enjoyed by both adults and young people. He served the same in small as well as in large churches.

He was successful in his pastorates but even more so with his pen. From 1910 to 1914 he was director of the Christian Advocate, from 1922-27 of El Mundo Cristiano (an interdenominational paper). He was director of El Evangelista Mexicano (1935-38), a new name for the Methodist official paper which is still published, and from there on he was a contributor to it until his death. His writings were strong, stimulating and controversial. Mendoza's memory will long live as the best hymn writer in Latin America. Throughout his life he assembled a growing collection of hymns for all occasions. Himnos Selectos finally appeared as a hymnal in which he included original works, words and music, or translations and selections of good music for church use in various departments. He enabled the Christians of MEXICO to sing their faith with joy and power.

GUSTAVO A. VELASCO C.

MENGEL, CHARLES H. (1879-1964), a bishop in the American Evangelical Congregational Church, was noted for his aggressive leadership. Born at Summit Station in Schuylkill County, Pa., May 8, 1879, he became a pastor in The United Evangelical Church in 1899. Starting as a "breaker boy" in the anthracite coal mines, his education had to be secured wherever possible with some studies at Temple University in PHILADELPHIA, and other studies by correspondence. However, he was greatly interested in education, and in time (1953) led the Board of Education of his church in starting the Evangelical Congregational School of Theology in Myerstown, Pa. He also helped found and was president of the trustees of the Burd and Rogers Home for aging people (first located at Herndon, Pa. [1924] and later at Myerstown).

He was elected a presiding elder in the East Pennsylvania Conference and served from 1922 to 1930, then served as bishop for eight years, 1934-42 (the limit in his church). He was a leader in opposing the merger of The UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH with the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION in 1922, and thus was a dominant figure in organizing the Evangelical Congregational Church. Bishop Mengel died Jan. 14, 1964, at Allentown, Pa. His body was laid to rest in the Greenwood Cemetery, Allentown.

ROBERT WILSON

MENTOR, OHIO, U.S.A., celebrated 150 years of Methodism in 1968. OHIO was visited by Methodist preachers as early as 1790, but credit for establishing Methodism in Mentor must be given to Ira Eddy who organized a society in 1818. He had eight charter members, four pioneer men and their wives. His circuit was called Grand River. It consisted of forty-three townships and appointments so arranged that he could preach in each of them every twenty-one days.

Eddy was a preacher and organizer of great ability, serving in time as pastor of almost every charge in Northeastern Ohio and one who doubtless accomplished as much for the beginnings of Methodism along the lake shore as any other man.

In the early years of the church's history services were held in homes and later in school houses. The pioneer preachers were men of great courage. Their exposure to storms and floods, wild beasts and Indians through the almost trackless forest that was then the Mentor community, made them all become heroes. One official board sent a petition to conference asking for "a preacher who could swim," as the one appointed to Mentor the year before had drowned in trying to cross a swollen stream.

An early example of Christian cooperation was the building of the first church in Mentor. This was a brick building erected in 1838 by the Methodist and Disciple congregations.

The first Board of Trustees was elected in April 1842, for the purpose of erecting a distinctly Methodist church. A frame building was completed in 1844 on a half acre of ground purchased for $50 at the site of the present church. The contractor accepted his pay in cattle due to the scarcity of cash. When the first services were conducted, the building had not been lathed or plastered. The worshippers brought in blocks of wood on which planks were laid for seats. The building was completed in 1848. In 1866 extensive repairs were made to the "audience room."

When Frank Dunbar was appointed to the Mentor Church in 1900, he was asked after his first service if he had been sent by the Lord to build a new church. He affirmed that he had. When a building fund had been raised and a plan selected, the old church was moved to the rear of the property, and worship continued to be held in it until the new building was completed. Farewell services in the frame church were held in January 1906, and the new church was dedicated the following Sunday. During the dedication service the small deficit in the building fund was subscribed, and the building dedicated free of debt. Its construction price was $11,000. Later improvements included installation of electric lights and a pipe organ.

Anticipating rapid growth—for Mentor is located in the center of one of Ohio's most rapidly growing counties—the congregation, in 1955, adopted an over-all plan providing that an education building be the first phase of the building program, with a new sanctuary the second phase. Other steps would include a new social hall and more educational facilities.

As soon as the Christian education center was constructed in 1957, it was necessary immediately to begin plans for a new sanctuary. The present sanctuary, completed in 1962, accommodates 1,200, not including the choir, and there are two services each Sunday. Duplicate sessions of the church school are also held. Present church membership is reported as 2,017.

MERIDIAN, MISSISSIPPI, U.S.A. Central Church. Organized Methodism began in Lauderdale County, Miss., in January 1839, when the ALABAMA CONFERENCE, of which the region was then a part, appointed William Howie to the Lauderdale Mission. A year later the mission reported 358 white and twenty-nine colored members, and in 1841 it became the Lauderdale Circuit.

Deerman Chapel, erected in 1852 on what is now Ninth Street near Eleventh Avenue, was the first Methodist church building in the Meridian community. In 1859 Meridian appeared for the first time in the conference appointments, JUNIUS E. NEWMAN preacher in charge. The next year the charge reported 150 white and fifty colored members. The Mobile Conference, formed in 1863 by dividing the Alabama Conference, met in Meridian in 1868.

The 1870 GENERAL CONFERENCE readjusted annual conference boundaries and placed Lauderdale and some other counties on the eastern edge of Mississippi in the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE. The Meridian District, formed in 1868, was continued. The Meridian church had 208 white and no colored members in 1870.

In 1886 a new church building, said to be "the best in the conference," was erected in Meridian. For a time it was called First Church, but in 1890 it was officially named Central Church. The building was destroyed by fire in 1913, and the congregation then relocated at Tenth Street and Twenty-Third Avenue. An impressive new sanctuary was erected in 1923. In 1951 an education building was added, and in 1960 the interior of the church edifice was remodeled.

A Woman's Missionary Society was organized in 1879, and in 1887 Central Church sent Betty Hughes as a missionary to China. The church claims to have had the first organized Adult Bible Class in the Mississippi Conference.

As the downtown church, Central is one of sixteen United Methodist congregations in a city of about 45,000. In 1970 it had 1,636 of the 7,186 members of The United Methodist Church in Meridian. The value of its property was $917,390, and it raised $10,539 for all purposes during the year.

MERITON, JOHN (1698-1753), British Anglican, hailed from East Anglia, where his father was an incumbent. He graduated from Caius College, Cambridge; and after serving as a curate at Oxburgh, moved to the Isle of Man, where he was converted. JOHN WESLEY met him in 1741 and invited him to join the Methodists. He accompanied Wesley on numerous preaching tours and acted as a secretary. He attended the first Conference in 1744.

MERKEL, HENRY M. (1889-1960), American minister and historian of UTAH Methodism, was born Feb. 14, 1889 at Tamaroa, Ill. He was educated in the schools of southern Illinois, the Academy of McKENDREE COLLEGE, the New Mexico State Normal University, and the ILIFF SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY.

He was ordained DEACON in 1917, and ELDER in 1920, at the SOUTHERN ILLINOIS CONFERENCE, transferring to the NEW MEXICO MISSION in 1920, and to the COLORADO CONFERENCE in 1925, after which he served in the Utah Mission from 1926-1935. Returning to the Colorado Conference, he retired in 1954.

Henry Merkel is best known for his authorship of the book, History of Methodism in Utah, which has become a source book of facts, not only on Methodism in Utah, but of much in the religious, social, economic and political development of the West.

His ministry was marked by deep friendships, an evangelistic message, and a warm heart. He died June 15, 1960, speaking to the ROCKY MOUNTAIN CONFERENCE meeting in Denver, Colo., on behalf of McKendree College, an institution which had conferred upon him the D.D. degree. He is buried in Wiley, Colo., near the ranch he owned and loved.

MERRIFIELD, GEORGE (1854-1929), American minister, was born in Sutton, County of Surrey, England, Aug. 13, 1854. He came to America with his brother in 1873, coming to DETROIT where he planned to secure employment. He later worked as a miner in the MINNESOTA iron range and in the coal fields of PENNSYLVANIA. He mined silver in COLORADO and there "made a strike" which enabled him to enter GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE to prepare for the ministry. Almost all of his ministry was spent in the WEST WISCONSIN CONFERENCE. Dodgeville, Darlington, Lake St. Eau Claire, and Trousdale in Madison were among his appointments. He was also superintendent of the Platteville District, 1903-1909. Death came on March 5, 1929, in Platteville.

He was an excellent preacher, having a fine literary style. An expression often used concerning him was, "a perfect Christian gentleman."

MERRILL, ANNIS (1810-1905?), American attorney at law and Methodist pioneer in CALIFORNIA. Son of a member of NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE, he graduated at WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in 1835, studied law, and practiced in BOSTON. Coming to SAN FRANCISCO in 1849, he was a member of the first board of trustees of First Church, and of the UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC. He drew up the charter for the university, and was president of its trustees for many years. He handled more legal cases for the church during its first half century than any other attorney in the state. A Sunday school teacher for forty years, at ninety he rode his bicycle in Golden Gate Park for his morning constitutional. He was regarded as one of the patriarchs of California Methodism, both in his local church and in the Conference. The date of his death is uncertain as it occurred shortly before the great earthquake and fire of 1906 in San Francisco which destroyed the official records.

MERRILL, STEPHEN MASON (1825-1905), American bishop, was born the fifth in a family of eleven children at Mount Pleasant, Ohio, on Sept. 16, 1825. The grandson of a Revolutionary Minuteman, he joined the church at seventeen and entered the OHIO CONFERENCE in 1846. His father was a farmer and shoemaker and his mother the daughter of a Revolutionary soldier, both strict Methodists.

After learning the shoemaker's trade and then teaching, he gave up both for the ministry. His first appointment was Georgetown, Ohio, a "hardscrabble" circuit with twenty-two preaching places. On July 18, 1848, he married Anna Bellmire, who survived him by only a few days. They had one son. Ordained DEACON, 1849, and ELDER, 1851, he rode hard circuits and read hard books for eleven years. Though without academic training, Indiana Asbury (now DEPAUW) University gave him an honorary A.M. in 1864. He had only a term or two in a rural academy.

For many years before receiving a station church, his salary was only $216 annually, and "table exercises". Before transferring to the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE in 1859, he was presiding elder in OHIO. Returning to the Ohio Conference in 1863, Merrill overcame a tendency to pulmonary disease and enjoyed good health. A close student of the doctrines and polity of Methodism, and having naturally a fine legal mind, he won recognition on the public forum and in the church press as a powerful speaker. Serving as presiding elder on the Marietta (Ohio) district, he was elected to GENERAL CONFERENCE, 1868.

Developing into a great church lawyer, Merrill won recognition in the General Conference for his wide knowledge of church constitutional law. Although he was a strong Union man and against slavery, he was not in the troubled post-Civil War-period a radical agitator. In the General Conference, with lay representation a key issue, he delivered a strong argument to the effect that laymen could not be admitted to that body without duly amending the constitution of the church. He so impressed the General Conference with his ability as a newcomer that he was at that session, 1868, elected editor of the Western Christian Advocate.

Four years later (in 1872) he was elected bishop, and assigned to the ST. PAUL, Minn. Area, 1872-80; and then to CHICAGO until he retired in 1904. He died suddenly while on a visit to Keyport, N. J., on Nov. 12, 1905. He was buried in Rose Hill, Chicago.

Bishop Merrill traveled widely over the United States and MEXICO. He wrote: Christian Baptism; A Digest of Methodist Law; The Organic Union of American Methodism (1892); Mary of Nazareth and Her Family, and eight other lesser known books.

Bishop Merrill was no revivalist or popular speaker—as is the case quite often with strictly legal minds. But in the forum of any great conference, his "massive argument, which his admirers likened to that of Daniel Webster, bore down all opposition." A walking encyclopedia on Methodist law, he was to his brethren a calm and useful counselor. He ranked next to Bishop JOSHUA SOULE in his knowledge of the Methodist Constitution and law. A great parliamentarian, his humor and calm made him a good presiding officer.

MERRITT, KINSEY NEWTON (1891-1967), American conference lay leader and business executive, was born in BALTIMORE, Md., June 5, 1891, the son of John J. and Mary Ellen (Nellie) Merritt. Educated in the public schools of Baltimore, he married Helen Brown Maynard Jan. 15, 1916. He worked for a time with what was then the Railway Express Company, and going to New York City, became vice president of that company in 1958.

Merritt joined the M. E. Church in 1900, and served in his local church faithfully as long as he lived. He was Sunday school superintendent of St. Mathew's Church in PHILADELPHIA, Pa.; president of the Sunday School Superintendents' Association, Philadelphia; and later on moving to northern NEW JERSEY, became lay leader of the NEWARK CONFERENCE, as the NORTHERN NEW JERSEY CONFERENCE was named then. He was president of the OCEAN GROVE CAMP MEETING ASSOCIATION, 1953-63, and contributed articles to various religious and business magazines. He was a lay delegate from his conference to the GENERAL CONFERENCE in his later years.

Kinsey N. Merritt was a dominant personage and proved to be an orator with unique talents. He is said to have been a public lecturer of power and persuasion, and exerted great influence in his whole section of The Methodist Church. In retirement he lived at Meadow Lakes, Hightstown, N. J. He died in June 1967.

MERRITT, TIMOTHY (1775-1845), American preacher and writer, was born in CONNECTICUT just prior to the Revolution and was directed into the ministry by ENOCH MUDGE. From 1797 to 1801 he was associated with Joshua Taylor, presiding elder of the district of MAINE lying between the Penobscot and Saco Rivers. In 1822 he had charge of a class of twenty-five members at Wood End, Lynn. From 1817 to 1819, and again from 1825 to 1827, he served the First Methodist Society in BOSTON.

The New England Methodist historian, JAMES MUDGE, writes of Timothy Merritt: "Christian perfection was his favorite theme, and he was a living exemplification of that Wesleyan doctrine. . . . His favorite topics were those which pertain to experimental and practical piety."

As a writer, Merritt was well known. For a time he was one of the editors of Zion's Herald; he was also an assistant editor of the Christian Advocate for a four-year period. He launched, in July 1839, a periodical called Guide to Christian Perfection. He was elected first vice-president of the third general convention of the Methodist anti-slavery movement which met in Lowell, Mass., in November 1838. This well-loved personality in the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE died in Lynn, Mass., on May 2, 1845.

MESSMORE, JAMES H. (1836-1911), was an early M. E. missionary in North India. A Canadian by birth, he was educated at ALLEGHENY COLLEGE, as were so many of the early Methodist missionaries to India. He arrived in India in 1860, and was married in 1861 to Elizabeth Husk, the first unmarried woman missionary sent to India by an organization of the M. E. Church. The Methodist Board of Foreign Missions sent three women to India early in the 1860's, in the expectation that they would be transferred to the proposed Woman's Missionary Society as soon as it was organized. The other women soon returned to America.

James Messmore made a distinguished record as a Hindustani scholar, seminary instructor, publisher, editor, English-church pastor and presiding elder. With JAMES M. THORURN, he founded The Lucknow Witness in 1871, and was its editor for years. Its name was changed to The Indian Witness, and it became the official organ of the Methodist Church in Southern Asia. Messmore spent many years in Garhwal and gave much to the principalship of the boys' school, the first high school in Garhwal. After his death, it was named the Messmore High School by public request. It is now an intermediate, or two-year, college. So much was the veteran missionary revered that the Brahman teachers, senior students, and community leaders, nearly all former students of the school, insisted on carrying his coffin to the cemetery for interment.

J. WASKOM PICKETT

METHODISM is a term usually applied to that system of doctrine and general plan of economy held and professed first by the Wesleyan Methodists in England and then by the organized Methodist Church bodies there and in America and now in almost all the nations on the earth. In its wider significance, it is applied to the religious movement which commenced under the labors of the WESLEYS and WHITEFIELD in the first half of the eighteenth century.

The origin and development of the movement may be found narrated in other parts of this Encyclopedia, in the biographies of its founder and his helpers, and in the story of Methodism as it has developed in the many lands where it is today at home. Although each one of these present-day organized Methodist bodies may have certain characteristics which may cause it to differ somewhat from the others, all are one in the idea and practice of a "connexion," as Wesley liked to call it.

"Methodism is a family of Churches." This statement by the nineteenth century Wesleyan, WILLIAM ARTHUR, goes to the root of the matter, for the ties that bind this world communion together are neither legal nor constitutional, but they are those of a common origin, a common growth, and above all they bind together churches which primarily consist not of institutions, but of persons. Despite all the differences which race and culture and geography impose, there is a recognizable Methodist character, and Methodists from ZAMBIA, CORNWALL, CALIFORNIA, GERMANY, CUBA, INDIA, HONG KONG would find that they had a common spiritual inheritance. That this bond is "in the spirit" is not a fact to be under-rated, for of all institutions, it is the family with its informalities and its personal relationships which proves to be tough and enduring when more pretentious entities have passed away. The family too is the place of growth and change; sons and daughters grow up, tensions develop between age groups, and one by one the members of families make their own lives, get married, settle down elsewhere, so that there is in the strict sense an "organic unity" between them, capable of constant modification. The rise and development of Methodism from a number of societies within the Church of England into a world-wide communion justifies and exemplifies this "family" analogy.

The eighteenth century was a century of reaction against a century and a half of religious zeal, intolerance and dogmatic strife. It was itself tolerant, almost indifferent to supernatural claims, preferring to appeal to reason, and expressing its religion in an accommodating moralism. It was a ferment too, of critical ideas, of dissolving certainties, with attacks on current orthodoxies, centering on the doctrines of the Trinity and of the Person of Christ. One notable feature of the Evangelical Revival and especially of the sermons of John Wesley and the hymns of his brother Charles is their kerygmatic character, their joyful and confident proclamation of the Holy Trinity and of the Nicene faith.

Modern historians emphasize that the brothers Wesley did not inaugurate an awakening which had already begun in America and in Wales before their conversion, and have drawn attention to the eminent and various Anglican Evangelicals, some but loosely associated with the Wesleys and some explicitly dissociated from them, in whose parishes there were the fruits of converted souls, and renewed Christian communities. Nonetheless, the work of the brothers Wesley is central to the revival, and to their efforts we owe the emergence of the Methodists, not as masses of converted individuals, but as societies with their own coherent pattern of discipline and worship.

The Wesleys brought with them their own spiritual heritage: several generations of clerical ancestors, who handed down to them through SAMUEL and SUSANNA WESLEY all that was richest in the English religious tradition, Puritan and Catholic, as well as the more recent awareness, through the Non-Jurors of the spirituality of Jansenism and of seventeenth century Catholic mysticism.

To a tired English religion John Wesley brought the blood transfusion of German Pietism and of Moravianism, a warm affective piety, closely linked to study of the Bible and finding expression in noble philanthropy. The rise of Methodism John Wesley was wont to trace to the HOLY CLUB originated by his brother and a few academic companions in the University of Oxford. It may be that it was from their programmed and patterned integrity of worship and study that the nickname "Methodist" arose. Their search after holiness was in the main along traditional high church lines. It was later and above all during their missionary experience in GEORGIA, that the Wesleys made first-hand contact with the exiled Lutherans and MORAVIANS at Ebenezer and SAVANNAH and drew from them lessons and clues for what they had so far sought in vain. Despite the comparative failure of their mission in Georgia, they had learned much in their own private and personal lives, and in an extraordinary way John Wesley had improvised means of growth in piety for his people which were later to become embodied in the structure of Methodism.

After their return to England, and especially in the summer of 1738, things began to happen quickly. Both brothers underwent conversion experiences. Both found their preaching unwelcome in the fashionable churches of LONDON. It was a turning point when their companion, George Whitefield, summoned Wesley to join him in preaching in the open air outside BRISTOL, and from this point on the revival became evident, as their preaching drew crowds who would not enter churches to hear them.

But Wesley's converts were not, like those of Whitefield, "ropes of sand," for from the beginning he organized them in BANDS, CLASSES, societies, a simple yet intricate discipline with their own means of grace, love feasts, vigils, fasts, etc. The sacramental services at the beginning of the Revival were a notable feature of the religious awakening, but these centered on the few occasions when the Wesleys and their small band of ordained clergy could assist them. For the most part the Methodists were driven to the sacramental and liturgical pattern of the Established church, and it was at such points that tension and hostility grew. By his constant travelling, and assisted by a splendid band of laymen, dedicated, tough, enduring all manner of hardness, he covered the land in constant journeys, though there were areas and places which he revisited more often than others, following his own injunction, "Go not only to those who need you, but to those who need you most."

In the 1740's the Methodists were often greeted with hostility from both mobs and magistrates, but by the end of their lives the Wesleys had become honored and respected national figures. It was among the uncared-for proletariat, the miners of Cornwall and WALES, the moving populations of the new industrial area that the Methodists found their strength. The Church of England was involved in its own past, and in an alliance with the State, politically fruitful, but paralyzing in the end to the pastoral machinery of the church. Its deliberative Synods, the Houses of Convocation, were in abeyance during this critical period, with the result, as Newman observed, that the Church of England as a whole never met Methodism as a whole, never made up its corporate mind about it, came to no decision about it. The result was that the growing difference in ethos between the Methodists and the Establishment was unchecked, and after the death of Wesley this led to the separation of the Methodists from the Church of England, a singularly painless schism.

In the nineteenth century the Methodists in England were driven to institute their own ordinances of Word and Sacrament, to introduce ordination (with laying on of hands after 1836) and to exist as a separate communion until the 1830's, rather self-consciously thinking of itself as "the Body" and distinct from either the Church of England or the older Dissent. The Catholic revival, the Oxford Movement and the renewal of Roman Catholicism in England drove the Methodists into the alliance with the historic Free Churches which marked the latter part of the nineteenth century. During that century other Methodist bodies arose—the BIBLE CHRISTIANS in the West of England, and the PRIMITIVE METHODISTS mainly in the midlands and north, themselves originating in revivals, but in their polity and discipline giving a larger place to the laity than the more clerical Wesleyan organization, and unattached by any tradition to the Church of England.

The famous four "Our's" of the first Methodists signify their characteristic ethos: "Our doctrines." These were the scriptural doctrines of JUSTIFICATION by Faith, ASSURANCE, NEW BIRTH, a combination known as "Evangelical Arminianism," but which had little to do with the theology of the Dutch ARMINIUS. It was rather the offer of free grace to all mankind, and the universal scope of the gospel which marked them off from the Calvinist evangelicals. None the less, it is probably best to see both sides of the Revival, Arminian and Calvinist, as within a common Augustinianism, and emphasis on the triumphant power of divine grace.

"Our hymns" were the hymns, in the main, of Charles Wesley which put into rousing, forthright, and unsentimental verse the doctrines of the gospel.

"Our literature" marks a whole educational revival, in which John Wesley took the lead, of which his schools at KINGSWOOD were a first fruit, and which educated his people by means of cheap tracts and pamphlets, as well as with the formidable library of classics, the CHRISTIAN LIBRARY in fifty volumes which he edited for his preachers.

"Our discipline" was the entirely characteristic polity, the result of a series of inspired improvisations by Wesley himself: wheels within wheels of Christian companies, from the band and class and society, to the district synod and the annual conference of preachers—this last, after Wesley's death becoming the sovereign body among the British Methodists; the itinerancy of the preachers, going back to Wesley's own incessant journeyings, resembling those of a judge on "circuit"; the use of lay preachers and the growing opportunities for lay ministries within the Church.

During Wesley's own lifetime the Revival had spilled overseas, and in North America and in the WEST INDIES, there were revivals of similar pattern and with similar fruits to those in England. In the early nineteenth century a series of heroic and costly missionary adventures resulted in Methodist communities in West and SOUTH AFRICA, and in AUSTRALIA and the Pacific Islands. It was in North America, however, that the greatest development took place. Following the liberation of the colonies from English rule, the new American nation found room for the Methodists with their flexible organization and enterprising spirit, and as the great extension of American life westward began, the Methodists were always in the van. The result was a great Church which in numbers and in extent, and in the size of its mission fields, greatly outnumbered the rest of Methodism. Here, too, as in Africa and INDIA and Australasia, the institutional pattern followed of orphanages and hospitals, and above all schools and colleges and universities. The size of the American church, the nature of its growth and its expansion, resulted in structural differences from British Methodism, above all in that the American Methodist churches are episcopal.

For the history and development of the separate Methodist Churches, see each one under its own name in this Encyclopedia. All are marked in their professed doctrinal statements by a general adherence to Arminian doctrine as opposed to Calvinism, and the feature of the polity of each one is the itinerant system for ministerial placement. This is almost universally practiced save in certain small Congregational Methodist bodies.

In the last half of the nineteenth century the size and diversity of the Methodist churches throughout the world called for some kind of explicit link between them, and from 1881 onwards ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCES have been held at regular intervals, where matters of common concern might be deliberated. In the most recent years this has been strengthened by regular meetings of a WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL.

Methodism across the world has been active in the Ecumenical Movement, and Methodists share in the work of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES at all levels. One of the effects of the Ecumenical Movement itself has been to throw back to the various communions questions about their own inheritance. They too, however, are conscious of the impulse towards a closer manifestation of Christian unity in a divided world. They are taking part, unilaterally and in company with other churches in dialogues and conversations with Roman Catholics, Orthodox and other Christian traditions. In many lands they too have been involved in discussions, plans and schemes for Christian unity, which in South India and in the United Church in CANADA have already come to fruition.

These, then, are the two marks of the last half century. The growth to autonomy and independence of churches in Australia, NEW ZEALAND, South Africa and in one African state after another, resulting in a new partnership between the churches of the Methodist family, the usefulness and fruit of which has still to be explored. And second, the call to unity, which faces Methodist churches in many lands and continents. Methodists are aware that this brings problems about their future relations with one another: they realize that it is important to take counsel with one another about these things, and to keep one another informed about common problems and opportunities. But they know that their loyalty to Christ and to His one Church, and their common dedication in mission to one world must always be the over-riding consideration. In His providence God raised up the Methodist people: He has greatly blessed them in their journeyings through two and a half centuries. They take heart from these things, and go forward on their providential way.

METHODISM IN THE UNITED STATES.

THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, 1784-1939

The beginning of American Methodism is closely associated with immigrants arriving shortly before the War for Independence. PHILIP EMBURY, an Irish exhorter and local preacher of German descent, preached in New York in 1766. In 1767 the New York Methodists formed a society, and in the same year they were joined by THOMAS WEBB, a British army captain then stationed in America who had been converted by JOHN WESLEY. Webb extended his preaching to PHILADELPHIA (1767 or 1768), Long Island and DELAWARE, and formed societies in New JERSEY. Embury and the generous Captain Webb are known, respectively, as the founders of Methodism in New York and Philadelphia. To come to the distinctive character of American Methodism, however, one has to appreciate the kind and extent of Methodist activity in the area south of Philadelphia.

Methodist work in America may well have been underway before 1766. ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE quite possibly had been preaching in MARYLAND before 1763. This independent-minded Irishman made preaching journeys into Delaware, VIRGINIA and PENNSYLVANIA. He organized societies, built a preaching house, raised up preachers, and in time administered the sacraments among his followers, who welcomed his ministrations and strongly supported him later when Wesley's assistants took him to task for his irregularities.

Three young men converted in the wave of evangelistic activity initiated under Strawbridge and his followers were outstanding among the first native Methodist preachers. These were PHILIP GATCH, WILLIAM WATERS, and FREEBORN CARRETTSON. Each was born and reared in the general vicinity of BALTIMORE, and each had been a communicant of the Church of England.

To the names of these independent lay preachers must be added that of the young Irish itinerant, ROBERT WILLIAMS, who came with the reluctant approval of Wesley. Wesley was irritated by Williams' preaching against the clergy and made him promise to work in subordination to the appointed missionaries. Williams' preaching in the parish of the friendly evangelical clergyman, DEVEREUX JARRATT in tidewater Virginia, was to mark the real beginning of the Methodist revival in that commonwealth. Even ASBURY was later to pay tribute to this "son of thunder," who came to be known as the founder of Virginia Methodism. But Williams, like Strawbridge, was to create problems for Wesley's assistants.

The Question of Discipline. Those who heard the Methodist itinerants probably found nothing strange in the continuation of a pattern of freelance preaching already made familiar by the revivals of the time. Wesley, however, would have no truck with freelance preaching which left nothing more behind than "a rope of sand." If there were to be Methodist converts in North America, Wesley held, they should be under the same rigid connectional discipline that he maintained in England.

Consequently, at the British conference of 1769 Wesley appointed RICHARD BOARDMAN and JOSEPH PILMORE as missionaries to America. Two years later Francis Asbury and RICHARD WRIGHT came out as missionaries. They were followed in 1773 by THOMAS RANKIN and GEORGE SHADFORD.

Wesley looked to Rankin to correct the defective discipline of his predecessors. Rankin's first conference, convened six weeks after his arrival in Philadelphia, laid bare the problems confronting the missionaries. Neither Strawbridge nor Williams was present. Moreover, of Methodists now reported "in society" (1,160), the preponderance were in those very areas to the south dominated by the two Irish preachers, Strawbridge and Williams, and their followers. However, the preachers attending Rankin's conference agreed that the American preachers and societies should be under the authority of Wesley, and that acceptance of the English Minutes (the LARGE MINUTES) as the standard of doctrines and discipline should be the basis of the connectional fellowship.

Rankin continued the yearly meeting of the preachers, but after the 1777 conference, with the War for Independence on, he returned to England, as had all the other missionaries save Asbury. With the outbreak of war, suspicion toward the Methodists had increased because of their relation to the church, and because of Wesley's Toryism and the pacifism of some of the preachers and members. Most Methodists, however, moved toward an alignment with the Baptists and the Presbyterians in opposition to the established Church.

By 1777 the number of Methodists in society had increased fivefold to 6,968, with the bulk of the membership still in the south. Only 488 members were reported from Pennsylvania, New Jersey and New York. When the preachers met in 1778 at LEESBURG, the first yearly conference on Virginia soil, Asbury was already in seclusion at THOMAS WHITE's in Delaware, and the young native preachers appeared in unquestioned control of the movement.

The Ordinance Controversy. The encounter between the sectarian native movement and the old-plan Methodism reached a crisis in the Fluvanna conference of 1779. Noting that the Episcopal establishment was now dissolved, the preachers established a presbytery from among their own number, accepted ordination from each other, and began to administer the sacraments. Meanwhile, Asbury, operating from his base in Delaware, undertook to win over the dissidents and preserve what he could of old-plan Methodism. Assuming de facto the office of "general assistant," he was able to muster sufficient support to heal the schism; and the Virginia preachers agreed to await further direction from Wesley. In the four years intervening before the arrival of Wesley's authoritative emissaries, Asbury not only assured the survival of much of the Wesleyan heritage but also laid foundations that, as it turned out, greatly facilitated the transition to an independent church. By 1784 the minutes showed 14,988 members and eighty-four itinerants, and Asbury had emerged as leader of the movement.

On Sept. 1, 1784, John Wesley, assisted by two other presbyters of the Church of England, THOMAS COKE and JAMES CREIGHTON, ordained as deacon RICHARD WHATCOAT and THOMAS VASEY. On the next day the two were ordained elders, and Wesley, assisted by Creighton and Whatcoat, "set apart" Thomas Coke as "superintendent" for America. The three emissaries, bearing Wesley's instructions, arrived in New York on November 3.

What Wesley envisaged for American Methodism is not clear. In his letter to "Our brethren in America" he mentioned "a little sketch" he had drawn up in response to the request of "some thousands of the inhabitants of these States" for his advice. (Apparently the "little sketch" was either lost or destroyed. A reasonable assumption is that what actually happened in the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE soon to be held did not conform altogether to Wesley's intentions.) "I conceive myself at full liberty," Wesley's letter continued, "as I violate no order and invade no man's right by appointing and sending labourers into the harvest. I have accordingly appointed Dr. Coke and Mr. Francis Asbury to be Joint Superintendents over our brethren in North America; as also Richard Whatcoat and Thomas Vasey to act as elders among them, by baptizing and administering the Lord's Supper. And I have prepared a Liturgy little differing from that of the Church of England (I think, the best constituted National Church in the world), which I advise all the travelling preachers to use on the Lord's Day in all the congregations, reading the Litany only on Wednesdays and Fridays and praying extempore on all other days. I also advise the elders to administer the Supper of the Lord on every Lord's Day." (J. Wesley, Letters, vii, 237-39.)

Wesley explained the difficulties attendant upon his further attempts to persuade the English bishops to ordain ministers for America. Even if the bishops should ordain, their action would entangle the Americans with both the state and the English hierarchy. Besides, Wesley had long been persuaded "that bishops and presbyters are the same order, and consequently have the same right to ordain." He considered, therefore, that the American Methodists were "now at full liberty simply to follow the Scriptures and the Primitive Church." (Ibid.)

A third document sent over by Wesley was his Letter Testimonial of Coke's ordination. (J. Wesley, Journal, vii, facing 16.) In it he referred to the desire of the Americans "to continue under my care and still adhere to the doctrines and discipline of the Church of England" and to receive the sacraments "according to the usage of the said Church." This document, which came to light only after Coke's death, does not in itself support the view that Wesley intended that the Americans form an independent church.

The Christmas Conference. Coke first met Asbury at BARRATT'S CHAPEL in Delaware on Sunday, Nov. 14, 1784. Asbury wrote in his Journal: "The design of organizing the Methodists into an Independent Episcopal Church was opened to the preachers present, and it was agreed to call a General Conference, to meet at Baltimore the ensuing Christmas." (F. Asbury, Journal and Letters, I, 471-72.) Freeborn Garrettson was dispatched to summon all the preachers. Some sixty or more were present when the conference convened at LOVELY LANE CHAPEL on December 24. Wesley could hardly have understood the mood of the Americans at the end of their long conflict with England, nor the extent to which the ties with English Methodism had been weakened. The American preachers were of a mind to make their own decisions. (See CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE.)

Asbury noted that all things were determined by majority vote. After the reading of Wesley's letter the preachers agreed to form themselves into an Episcopal Church and adopted the name proposed by JOHN DICKINS—The Methodist Episcopal Church. Asbury had declined to accept the office of Superintendent merely on the basis of Wesley's appointment, but both he and Coke were unanimously elected superintendents by the conference. Assisting in Asbury's consecration at Asbury's invitation, was PHILIP WILLIAM OTTERBEIN, later to become a founder of the UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH. Designation of the two superintendents by vote of the conference symbolized the new constitutional base, yet to be perfected, of the American church. It marked the transfer of the personal power of Mr. Wesley into the hands of the American preachers assembled in conference.

The form of Discipline adopted at Baltimore in 1784 was heavily dependent upon Wesley's Large Minutes, the alterations reflecting the changed situation of the American Methodists. The conference adopted twenty-four ARTICLES OF RELIGION which Wesley had adapted from the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion of the English Church, and added an Article entitled Of the Rulers of the United States of America. The conference also adopted The Sunday Service, the liturgy sent over by Wesley. Although The Sunday Service was, after a few years, to fall into desuetude, its importance as a bridge between American Methodism and the Church of England, not to mention the whole Western Latin tradition, cannot be overemphasized. In both doctrine and liturgy American Methodists were thus held in the great Christian tradition.

Other actions taken by the Christmas Conference included the decision to establish COKEBURY COLLEGE; a stringent rule prohibiting preachers from drinking intoxicating liquors (except as medicine); and the acceptance of a detailed plan "to extirpate the abomination of slavery."

There is evidence that not all the preachers were pleased with what was done at Baltimore. THOMAS HASKINS, for instance, felt that more consideration should have been given to the opinion of the mother church. Indeed, three leaders of the American clergy met with Coke and Asbury after the Christmas Conference had convened, and discussed with them a plan whereby the Methodists might retain organic relation with what was to be The Protestant Episcopal Church, plans for which were then only in the discussion stage. But the Methodist superintendents were not responsive to these informal overtures.

Organization Still Incomplete. With adjournment of the founding conference the preachers could present the new Methodist Episcopal Church to their constituency as apostolic in character, founded upon scripture, loosed from its questionable connections, no longer a group of "societies," but a church firmly dedicated to its divine vocation. In his sermon at the ordination of Asbury, Thomas Coke said to the new superintendent: "[God] will carry his gospel under thy direction from sea to sea, yea, perhaps, from one end of the Continent to the other." (T. Coke, Sermon . . . at Ordination of . . . Asbury, 22.)

The new church, however, was not yet able to give a clear definition of its corporate structure. Its organization remained tentative and partial. Its most distinctive structures were to emerge in the next generation as a means of controlling and extending the phenomenal expansion begun in the 1780's. Expansion was to push toward the West, the North and the South. In 1784 Asbury was traveling in southwest Pennsylvania, and by 1790 he was in KENTUCKY. In 1801 there were eight circuits in the PITTSBURGH District and nine in the Kentucky District.

In 1788 Freeborn Garrettson presided over six circuits between New Rochelle (New York) and Lake Champlain. In 1789 JESSE LEE had begun his work in New England, and WILLIAM LOSEE was ranging "at large" in CANADA. Three years later missionaries were at work on the New York frontiers and near what is now Kingston, Ontario.

Asbury appointed a preacher to "range" in GEORGIA in 1785, and the next year he sent HENRY WILLIS to "Holston." By 1787 three circuits had been formed in Georgia. Most often the conference itinerants probing the frontier found that they had been preceded by local preachers who had already organized societies. In its first quarter-century the new Church increased the number of circuits seven-fold, to 324, and the number of members eleven-fold, to over 163,000.

The office of PRESIDING ELDER took form in these early years of expansion. The duty of the twelve elders elected and ordained at the Christmas Conference was to be present at all the quarterly meetings of the circuits under their charge in order to administer the sacraments. In 1786 the Discipline added to the elder's duties the exercising "within his own district, during the absence of the superintendents, all the powers invested in them for the government of the Church." The first GENERAL CONFERENCE, in 1792, employed the term "presiding elder" for the first time, thus distinguishing between preachers, ordained ELDERS, and those of their number bearing special administrative responsibilities.

Conference System Develops. The ANNUAL CONFERENCE as such developed after considerable experimentation. The yearly meeting of the preachers was basic in the Methodist discipline, but the widening deployment of preachers made a single yearly meeting impracticable. Asbury met the preachers in three sections in 1786 and 1787. Thereafter the sections increased and varied in number from year to year. These "district" conferences, as they were called, "collectively, or in the final session, were competent to exercise in any year the full legislative powers of the Church." (J. J. Tigert, Constitutional History, 222.)

A brief experimentation with an administrative COUNCIL was an attempt to meet the need for a centralized structure to overcome the awkward problem of processing legislation through the several "district" conferences. Asbury wished to avoid calling or depending upon a general conference of the preachers. The Council failed to win general acceptance, however, and after only two sessions, in 1789 and 1790, it was quietly abandoned. Turning next to his less-favored alternative, Asbury called the preachers to meet in 1792 in what was to be the first General Conference. At its second meeting, in 1796, the General Conference fixed the boundaries of six Annual Conferences which were to take the place of the various sectional conferences. By 1804 the Annual Conference had assumed its distinctive features as the self-contained ecclesiastical unit in which the preachers held their membership, in which appointments were made, and in which the work of the denomination had its regional organization. The Annual Conference thus became basic to the whole organization of the church as the Discipline of the present United Methodist Church declares it to be. (Constitution of The United Methodist Church, Division Two, Section vii, Art. II.)

The first General Conference was composed of all the preachers in full connection and was regarded as holding in itself the full power of the church. It bound itself not to modify any received rule of Methodism without a majority of two-thirds. It resolved to meet every four years. When, four years later (in 1796), the General Conference defined the Annual Conference, the basic conference system of the Methodist Episcopal Church was complete.

Embraced within this system was the QUARTERLY CONFERENCE, which was the organizational focus of the connection on the circuit level. Even before the arrival of Wesley's missionaries, the lay preachers in the Chesapeake area had conducted "quarterly meeting conferences," and the first American Discipline assumed the continuation of the quarterly meeting as a part of the Methodist economy. More stable in operation than the local society, the Quarterly Conference consisted of the preacher in charge, all the local preachers and class leaders, and the circuit stewards. Presiding over its sessions was the Elder, who functioned as "eyes, ears and mouth" of the episcopacy. The Quarterly Conference was the occasion on which the Methodist people, especially in the newer sections, had opportunity to experience most completely their participation in the church. Inasmuch as the Presiding Elder then in charge was often the only ordained minister present, many Methodists found the HOLY COMMUNION only at the Quarterly Conferences. Since the Conferences were occasions of much preaching, they also became centers of revival activity, and, beginning about 1802, the summer quarterly conference often coincided with a CAMP MEETING. From time to time the Book of Discipline assigned additional administrative and judicial functions to the Quarterly Conference, but it was not until 1848 that a separate section of The Discipline was to deal with the conference.

Period of Controversy. Controversies during this period left their mark upon the church. JAMES O'KELLY challenged Asbury on his exercise of the episcopal power. Strongly imbued with revolutionary ideology and popular rationalism, O'Kelly appealed to scripture in his opposition to episcopacy. He vigorously opposed the Administrative Council, and gained the support of Coke and Jesse Lee in pressing Asbury to call the first General Conference. When the Conference met, O'Kelly introduced a proposal that a preacher dissatisfied with his appointment might appeal to the conference for another than the one fixed by the bishop. The conference failed to support this further attack upon the bishop's power, and O'Kelly with several followers withdrew from the church. Against the continued preaching and writing of O'Kelly, Asbury defended the episcopacy as essential to the unity of the church and as especially necessary for the preservation of the itinerant system.

Asbury sensed another threat in the constituting of The Protestant Episcopal Church in 1789. This event, a surprise to some in view of the weakened state of the Church of England parishes in America, put an end to the hope entertained by some that the Methodists might absorb the remnants of the Established Church. More serious in the view of Methodist leaders was the loss of some preachers who accepted orders from the Episcopal bishops. The threat was dramatized in 1791 with Asbury's discovery that Coke had privately approached Episcopalians relative to bringing the Methodists into The Protestant Episcopal Church (see COKE-WHITE CORRESPONDENCE). Asbury's response was to intensify that self-conscious differentiation from the Episcopalians which was to characterize much of American Methodism down to the present.

Against Protestant Episcopal claims of apostolic succession, the Methodists now began to emphasize their "succession" from John Wesley, "the most respectable divine since the primitive ages, if not since the time of the apostles." (R. Emory, History of Discipline, 282.) These words may seem strange in view of Wesley's known disapproval of the American Methodists' use of the designation "bishop" in the place of "superintendent" and in view also of American resentment toward Wesley's attempts in 1787 to have Richard Whatcoat and Freeborn Garrettson elected superintendents.

Because the American preachers did not fully trust Coke's administration, the whole burden of supervision had fallen upon Asbury. Coke spent little time in America, his function being restricted largely to presiding at conferences. (See THOMAS COKE AND AMERICAN METHODISM.) After his departure in 1806 he was not to return to America. Richard Whatcoat was elected bishop in 1800, in his sixty-fifth year. With Whatcoat's death in 1806 and the final departure of Coke in the same year, Asbury, himself now in declining health, became the sole episcopal administrator. The General Conference of 1808 provided some relief for Asbury by electing WILLIAM MCKENDREE to the episcopacy. McKendree, already prominent because of his work as Presiding Elder in the WESTERN CONFERENCE, became the first native-born bishop and was to carry on strongly the Asburian episcopacy.

The Delegated General Conference. The 1808 General Conference also adopted legislation that came to be regarded as the constitution of the Church. Until that year a simple majority in the General Conference might have radically altered or abolished any Methodist standard. Not only that, but factors of distance had made for unequal representation of the Annual Conferences in the General Conference. In 1804, for instance, three of the seven Annual Conferences—Philadelphia, Baltimore and Virginia—because of their proximity to the traditional seat of the General Conference, supplied over three-fourths of the conference membership.

To correct this imbalance and to provide for a safer center of power, it was determined that the General Conference should become a delegated body, operating under carefully defined restrictions. This was accomplished, and the delegated conference was forbidden to change the Articles of Religion or the GENERAL RULES; to do away with the episcopacy or the general itinerant superintendency; to do away with the right of trial and appeal; or to divert the profits of the BOOK CONCERN or CHARTERED FUND to other than the benevolent objects to which they had been devoted. Strict procedures were defined in time for altering these "RESTRICTIVE RULES," as they came to be called.

Bishop McKendree's election symbolized the new importance of the West. The great camp meetings of the first years of the new century soon became largely a Methodist enterprise, and a "harvest time" for the frontier preachers. The whole Methodist system was remarkably adapted for expansion in the new sections. The Methodist bishop, not a diocesan but a general superintendent, directed the deployment of a corps of itinerant preachers, establishing circuits, expanding circuits into districts and districts into new annual conferences. PETER CARTWRIGHT was typical of the rugged group of Presiding Elders, directly responsible to the bishops, commanding the cadres of itinerants, training young preachers on the job, and representing all the connexional interests of the church. ROBERT R. ROBERTS, elected bishop in 1816, the first married bishop of the church, established his home in INDIANA, thus becoming the first bishop to itinerate from a permanent base in the West.

The message of the itinerant preacher was congenial to the hardy character of the frontiersman; and Methodist literature (circulated by every preacher), and Methodist singing served the purposes of the expanding revival. For the Methodists the revivalism of America's Second Great Awakening was converted to a system of expansion, subservient to the hierarchical organization of the church. Camp meetings moved from the frontiers back to the older sections of the East, and, with the growth of towns and cities, became the "protracted meetings" of the settled communities. Philip Schaff, young German scholar who had migrated to America, observed at mid-century that the Methodist movement had "next to Puritanism, the greatest influence on the general religious life . . . It has uncommon energy and activity, and enjoys an organization eminently fitted for general enterprises and systematic, successful cooperation."

The Great Expansion. The years between the death of Asbury in 1816 and the outbreak of the Civil War marked the heyday of Methodist expansion in America. A new generation of circuit riders moved out in advance of the Pony Express, and before there was a solid line of states, Methodist conferences reached to the Pacific. JASON LEE preached the first Methodist sermon west of the Rockies in 1834. In 1837 MARTIN RUTER entered TEXAS. ISAAC OWEN was appointed to CALIFORNIA in 1853, and in the following year WILLIAM H. GOODE entered KANSAS. Annual Conferences already organized in the great central valley served as bases for the new drive into the Far West. This same period saw the beginnings of Methodist foreign mission work in AFRICA (1833), SOUTH AMERICA (1836), CHINA (1847), and INDIA (1856). There were also special appointments for work with Indians and immigrant groups. In 1864 three German conferences were organized, consolidating Methodist missions serving the many Germans who had come to America.

A wave of benevolent interest and activity, drawing support from the revivals and contributing to further expansion, now spread over America. Following Asbury's death, a new generation of younger preachers, including such men as NATHAN BANGS, WILBUR FISK and Martin Ruter, moved into the leadership of the various benevolent enterprises and contributed to the building of new institutions. The General Conference of 1820 officially committed the denomination to the support of education; and the two decades following came to be known as the great college building era of the church. By 1865 Methodists had started schools in thirty-three of the thirty-four states. In the 1840's and 1850's JOHN DEMPSTER, though encountering much opposition, stirred an interest in theological education. To Dempster belongs credit for the founding of two theological schools, the Methodist General Biblical Institute at Concord, NEW HAMPSHIRE, and GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE at Evanston, Illinois.

Zion's Herald, appearing in 1823, was the first of a distinguished line of weekly religious journals. By the opening of the Civil War the General Conference had authorized nine Advocates to serve various geographical areas from New York to California. (See ADVOCATES, CHRISTIAN.)

Methodists in general did not support the large number of interdenominational benevolent societies growing up in the first quarter of the century. They were apprehensive of the control of the so-called "benevolent empire" by the older churches, and suspicious of what they considered its Calvinist orientation. Moreover, Methodists shared with the frontier churches a certain resentment toward missionary and benevolent enterprises directed from the Eastern seaboard. Consequently, Methodists preferred their own benevolent societies. A Methodist Tract Society was founded in 1817, and in 1820 the General Conference endorsed the Methodist MISSIONARY SOCIETY. The Methodist SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION was established in 1827, and the Methodist Bible Society in 1828. DANIEL P. KIDDER, elected corresponding secretary of the Sunday School Union in 1844, laid the foundations for the Christian Education program of the Church.

Ferment and Division. The M. E. Church could not avoid the swell of religious and social ferment and the sectarian controversy that swept over the country in this period. Because of the structure of Methodist polity, most of the controversy within the church eventually took the form of criticism of the episcopal system. Agitation for the election of presiding elders and lay representation in the annual conferences eventuated in the schism of 1830 and the organization of THE METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH. Deep cultural differences contributed to the divisions involving the slavery question and racial attitudes. Discrimination against Negro Methodists in Philadelphia and New York led to the founding of the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL ZION CHURCH (1820). Radical anti-slavery Methodists founded the Wesleyan Connection (now designated the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH), in 1843; and the largest rupture in the history of American Methodism occurred with the constituting of the METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH, after the General Conference of 1844.

A revival of interest in the Wesleyan teaching on CHRISTIAN PERFECTION in the 1830's soon led to an unfortunate polarization in the church between ardent defenders of the renewed form of the doctrine, and those who considered the emphasis to be divisive. Defenders of HOLINESS teachings made common cause with a growing number who feared for the loss of old and familiar ways in the church. The FREE METHODIST CHURCH emerged (1860) out of the holiness controversy.

Factors other than the slavery question contributed to the tragic division of 1844. Chief among these was a difference in interpretation of the nature of the episcopal office. With the moderates in the church no longer able to set a course between the more extreme parties, deeply rooted hostilities flared into the open in the General Conference of 1844, which at length agreed upon a PLAN OF SEPARATION to be followed in the event of separation. Southern leaders moved at once to lay plans for a separate church, and in May 1846, the first General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, met in PETERSBURG, Virginia. Great bitterness ensued, particularly in the border conferences. The whole course of events subsequent to the 1844 General Conference gave rise to such a wave of revulsion in the Northern conferences that the 1848 General Conference voted to repudiate the Plan of Separation, which both sides had four years before considered fair and equitable. The act of repudiation added to the heritage of bitterness affecting relations between the two churches long after the conclusion of the Civil War.

The Civil War Years. At the outbreak of the Civil War, each of the two Churches produced by the division in 1844 was the largest and the wealthiest denomination in its own geographical area. Both churches now supported their governments and turned to the work of ministering to their troops, supplying chaplains and providing Bibles and tracts. The great revival fervor that had stirred the nation immediately before the war moved into the army camps in both North and South.

The Northern Church suffered far less dislocation from military operations. Its institutions were stronger and its resources more ample. Northern bishops, editors and preachers set about mobilizing public opinion, encouraging recruitment and raising funds to support both Methodist and interdenominational ministries in camp and field. The church's extensive wartime activity reflected and encouraged a growing sense of responsibility on the part of the church for the moral quality of the whole of public life. This understanding of the scope of the church's responsibility was not altogether new, but it found forceful expression in new leadership emerging during the war, represented by men such as Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON and the wartime denominational editors. Bishop Simpson, who enjoyed wide contact with political leaders, especially with Abraham Lincoln, and swayed multitudes with his oratory, also represented a new concern among Methodists that their church be fully recognized in the ecclesiastical affairs of the nation. Harper's Weekly referred to the Methodists in 1866 (Oct. 6) as "the predominant ecclesiastical fact of the nation." In contrast to the disorganization, demoralization and impoverishment of the Southern Church, the Northern Church came to the end of the war with its institutions intact and its leadership steering it into the mainstream of American political life.

Mission to the South. Cultural imperialism, ecclesiastical conquest and sincere motives of compassion were strangely mixed in the mission of the Northern Church to the South after the war. Bitterness, resentment and violence met the often heroic ministries of Northern Methodists entering the South to assist with the education of the emancipated Negro slaves. Northern bishops looked upon the South as missionary territory. Northern Methodist expansion began behind the Federal lines in 1863 and pressed forward as military operations opened the way, with Northern preachers proselyting freely and laying claim to church property. Ten new Annual Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church were organized in the South by 1869.

Work with freed slaves began in 1862. Methodists at first cooperated with various interdenominational organizations concerned with relief of the freedmen; but in 1866 the Society was supporting twenty-nine institutions for Negroes and sixteen academies for whites.

Changes in Methodism following the Civil War paralleled in many respects similar changes in the nation. Both the church and the nation responded to the movement and growth of the population, to radical alterations in social and political life, and to profound changes in the intellectual climate. The forces of industrialization and urbanization and the flood of immigrants, the rise of a boisterously competitive capitalism, the rapid increase of wealth, and the stirrings of labor brought sometimes violent social conflict, political corruption, social stratification, and the problems of the slum. There was need for the consolidation of institutions and the forming of new structures to cope with the growing complexities of life. The nation faced increasing involvement in foreign relations. All these developments had their parallels in the growth of Methodism after 1865. Young, aggressive, jealous of its new-found status and confident in its future, the Methodist Episcopal Church now entered into a period of "rugged denominationalism." The CENTENNIAL OF AMERICAN METHODISM celebrated in 1866, was the first church-wide program to raise funds for planned improvement and expansion, and appropriated Methodist experience gained in fund-raising for benevolent causes during the war. It symbolized the transition to a new way of doing things. The Centennial campaign raised nearly $9 million, a large part of which was directed toward education.

Missions and Church Extension. Both branches of the Church had continued their missionary interests following the division of 1844, but it was not until after the war that organization and financial support was provided for an expanding missionary enterprise. In the last decades of the century, missionary activity was integrated into the whole life of the church. Machinery for the administration of missionary endeavors followed roughly parallel lines in the Northern and Southern churches. Geographically speaking, American Methodism had for the most part completed its overseas expansion by the end of World War I. In the same period the church established a program of national missions to serve within the borders of the nation and its dependencies.

American Methodism committed half of its missionaries to its two largest mission fields, CHINA and INDIA, where work had begun before the war. Methodist missionaries entered JAPAN in 1873 and began work in KOREA in 1885. From its base in India the Church established missions in Southeast Asia. Methodist missions expanded steadily in Latin America after the Civil War and, after 1885, in various parts of Africa. By 1921 American-related Methodists in Europe outnumbered those in Latin America and Africa; but the earlier American missionaries in Europe were usually nationals who had returned to their homeland.

As expansion continued the Church developed new patterns of organization for overseas work. In 1858 the Northern Church elected FRANCIS BURNS the first of its missionary bishops. In 1868 the General Conference gave all former Mission Annual Conferences the status of Annual Conferences. Growing self-sufficiency of the overseas mission was registered in the rise of the CENTRAL CONFERENCES (authorized by General Conference in 1884), the affiliated autonomous churches (e.g., BRAZIL, 1930) and the independent Methodist churches (e.g., Japan, 1907).

Facing the surge of growth in newly opening areas in the West, the Northern Church organized in 1864 its General Extension Society, chiefly to raise capital funds to lend to new congregations. Under leadership of the colorful C. C. "Chaplain" McCABE, the Extension Society (see CHURCH EXTENSION) was an important factor in establishing Methodism in the prairie and Rocky Mountain states. In the wake of the swelling tide of immigration, work with various non-Anglo-Saxon groups rapidly increased. In 1907 the church created the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension. Organization of the Department of City Work (1912), and the Department of Rural Work (1916) reflected the growing importance of specialized ministries.

Language Conferences. Methodism was significantly enriched by its language conferences (as they were often called), ministering to Germans, Swedes, Norwegians and Danes in the United States. Most effective was the work among the Germans. An outstanding German leader, himself an immigrant, was WILLIAM NAST, who became the prototype of the Methodist leader engaged in language work. By 1915 there were ten M. E. German language conferences. The first of four Swedish language conferences was organized in 1877. The Norwegian Conference (later changed to NORWEGIAN-DANISH) was organized in 1880. Bilingual missions were developed also among Chinese, Japanese and Mexicans in the 1870's, and among Italians in the last decade of the century. By 1924 some 740 effective pastors were engaged in foreign language work. The last of the language conferences was dissolved in the early 1940's.

Women's agencies for the support of missions made their appearance shortly after the Civil War. The WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY was formed in BOSTON in 1869 to support women missionaries and national Christian teachers. The WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY was organized in 1880. The General Conference officially recognized the DEACONESS movement in 1888, and by 1920 the Northern Church had almost 900 deaconesses.

Christian Education. In 1858 the General Conference committed the Church to the religious instruction and nurture of children preparatory to reception into full membership. This official stand, taken after several years of debate over the significance of Christian nurture prior to conversion, led to more clarity of thought and consistency of practice in reference to the Church's task in the nurture of its children.

The most revolutionary development in Christian education began during the term (1868-1888) of JOHN H. VINCENT as secretary and editor of the Sunday School Union. Vincent's administration brought radical improvements in teacher training and the refinement of methods, and introduced such modern things as age grouping and building plans adapted for religious instruction. Vincent sought to introduce many of the standards and practices of public education. By 1876 almost every Methodist Church had a Sunday School, and the number of students was reported to exceed the number of church members. Contributing to this growth was the multiplication of printed materials furnished for teachers and students. Methodist literature constantly increased in diversity and adequacy, and in general was popular, well-balanced, and adapted to the needs of the churches.

The Methodist educational program also reflected the wide-spread interest in the development of youth leadership. Youth organizations appeared in various conferences. In 1889 several of these organizations were absorbed in the EPWORTH LEAGUE, which was to become the official youth organization in both the Northern and Southern churches. As Methodist work expanded among college students, WESLEY FOUNDATIONS appeared on the campuses of state and non-Methodist institutions. By 1920 student work at state colleges and universities had extended to fifty centers.

Publishing Interests. For a brief period after the war both the Publishing House of the M. E. Church, South and the BOOK CONCERN of the M. E. Church suffered from mismanagement and questionable business practices. However, with the appointment of more laymen to management positions, and the introduction of improved administrative practices, the publishing enterprises soon entered a period of prosperity. With the marked increase in demand for Sunday School materials, new sales records were established, additional buildings were acquired and modern equipment installed. In the early 1900's the Book Concern entered into cooperative projects with other Protestant publishers. The Graded Lesson Series, introduced in 1908, enjoyed surprising popularity. Of continuing significance for the health of the publishing venture as well as the moral and spiritual improvement of the Methodist people was the system of distribution, with every minister continuing to serve as local agent of the Book Concern.

Methodist editors in the latter half of the nineteenth century rose to high places of influence in the life of the church. Most of them plain and self-made men, they were fiercely loyal to the denomination. Three war-time editors were elected bishops in 1864. After the war Methodist editors wrestled with most of the social problems of their day. Repeated attempts were made to merge the various Advocates. Merger was finally accomplished in 1932 with the establishing of a single national weekly (see ADVOCATE, CHRISTIAN) with six regional editions.

With the founding of the COKEBURY PRESS by the Southern Church and the ABINGDON PRESS in the Northern Church, the two larger churches countered a decline in the sale of strictly denominational books with expansion into the general religious field.

Higher Education. Of some 200 colleges established by Methodists before 1865, only thirty-four continued to exist up to 1939. Limited finances, poor location and internal dissensions contributed to this high mortality. Methodist colleges founded after the Civil War reflected, on the whole, a much sounder condition. Although enrollments were greatly reduced in the war years, none of the Northern colleges closed. Postwar expansion was confined largely to the North and the West. Methodist schools were established in some western states before the admission of these states into the union. This period also saw the beginning of the Methodist universities, only NORTH-WESTERN having started before the war.

Many of the Negro institutions established in the South were at first hardly more than primary schools or academies. The Negro schools of collegiate grade, strengthened by the gifts of philanthropists and later by foundation grants, pioneered in training ministers, teachers, physicians and other leaders. Efforts to upgrade Methodist institutions serving Negro youth were intensified after 1920. Although educational work among white people in the South was more limited, four colleges had been firmly established by the time of Union in 1939. Contributing immeasurably to the improvement of academic and business practices of Methodist schools was the work of the UNIVERSITY SENATE, organized in 1892.

The scope of educational and professional concern in the Methodist institutions was constantly broadened even as their strictly Methodist character tended to diminish. In certain cases there was a loosening of ties between the church and its institutions. At the time of unification, however, Methodism's list of schools was considered the strongest of all the Protestant groups. The three Methodist branches brought into their union in 1939 nine universities, nine theological schools, sixty-seven colleges and twenty-seven junior colleges. (See EDUCATION IN METHODISM.)

The creation of theological schools had profound implications for the changing character of the church and its ministry. It was only after the founding of two such schools that the General Conference, in 1856, gave formal approval to theological education of its ministers. In these earlier years no formal academic training was required of candidates for the traveling ministry. The historic four-year Conference COURSE OF STUDY was considered adequate preparation. Although theological education was theoretically the concern of the whole church, the theological schools resulted from efforts independent of the General Conference. As the church matured there was increasing demand for a ministry equipped with broad theological training. Even so, as late as 1939 less than half the ministers entering Annual Conferences on trial had professional training in theological schools.

A Changing Constituency. The story of Methodism after the Civil War was, in the popular sense of the term, a success story. Success led to considerable complacency. There was little evidence before 1880, either in the church press or in official pronouncements, of the questioning of conventional attitudes toward economic and social questions. This was Methodism's age of affluence, and affluence was generally taken as confirmation of the rightness of the social order that produced it. The system magnified the traditional virtues of thrift, sobriety and hard work, the same virtues that enabled Methodists to climb up the economic and educational ladder.

Theodore Roosevelt, then the running mate of President WILLIAM MCKINLEY, a Methodist, and later President himself, spoke "these warning words" of "the most representative church in America. . ." at the M. E. General Conference in 1900: "The Methodist Church plays a great part in many lands; and yet I think I can say that in none other has it played so great and peculiar a part as here in the United States. Its history is indissolubly interwoven with the history of our country for the six score years since the constitutional convention made us really a nation. Methodism in America entered on its period of rapid growth just about the time of Washington's first presidency. Its essential democracy, its fiery and restless energy of spirit, and the wide play that it gave to individual initiative, all tended to make it peculiarly congenial to a hardy and virile folk, democratic to the core, prizing individual independence above all earthly possessions, and engaged in the rough and stern work of conquering a continent."

All the while, the constituency of the church was rapidly changing. Their increasing middle-class orientation made Methodists less able to understand and identify with the poor. The church found itself more and more alienated from the working classes and especially from those immigrant groups that were not responsive to Methodism's standards of conduct. Moreover, the style of Methodist piety was also undergoing alteration. Among the old familiar ways abandoned in many places were the class meeting, probationary membership, the enforcement of discipline, revivals and camp meetings, and simplicity in dress, worship and congregational life.

A revival of the Holiness movement had followed the war, and many conservatives in the church, including some bishops and editors, supported that movement, thinking that its teachings and the earnestness that it inspired might preserve Methodism against the erosion of affluence, urban culture and theological liberalism. The Holiness movement, which possessed some affinity with the romantic idealism of the period, turned many of its converts into evangelistic and missionary work and various forms of social service. Unfortunately, however, a more radical wing of the Holiness revival introduced fanatical and divisive tendencies which by 1900 resulted in the loss of many preachers and members to scores of independent Holiness congregations and various sectarian groups. The chief complaint against the more radical Holiness leaders was their criticism of episcopal authority, and their determination to keep their widespread activities independent of the bishops' control.

During the 1880's there were increasing signs that the church was awakening to its responsibility toward the larger social, economic and political problems. The episcopal address of 1888 devoted a long section to the problems of labor. If the Methodist interest was tardy, its growth was to be vigorous and extensive. The SOCIAL CREED, adopted in 1908, gave expression to the Methodist conscience for the ills of modern society. Shortly, the social emphasis was registered in the teaching materials of the Sunday schools, in the Conference Course of Study and the seminary curricula.

Methodist confrontation with social change was encouraged by many of the church's teachers of theology, who sought to understand the new intellectual currents influencing the mind of the nation, and to state the faith in terms more relevant to the times. The questioning of old formulations brought inevitable criticism and controversy, and two professors in BOSTON UNIVERSITY were accused of heresy. However, the charges were not sustained. Neither heresy charges nor the fundamentalist-modernist controversy was to bring the disruption in Methodism that troubled some other churches. Methodist fundamentalists in the 1920's launched an attack on the books listed in the Course of Study, but the General Conference declined to act upon the charges.

Lay Representation. Laymen were first seated in the Northern and Southern General Conferences in the 1870's. After the great controversy that led to the Methodist Protestant division, "lay delegation" ideas were generally under suspicion; but by mid-century prominent laymen were supporting the cause of more democratic representation. An independent paper, The Methodist, championed the cause, and among the sympathizers was Bishop Matthew Simpson. The Southern Church seated an equal number of laymen and preachers in their 1870 General Conference. Two years later the Northern General Conference seated laymen on the basis of two from each Annual Conference. It was not until 1900 that laymen were admitted to the Northern General Conference in equal number with ministers.

Lay representation in the Annual Conferences came more slowly. The Southern Church introduced legislation in 1866 to seat four laymen from each district in the Annual Conferences. The Northern Church established a "Lay Conference" at the Annual Conference level in 1900, and finally admitted laymen into the Annual Conference in 1932. (See LAY DELEGATION AND LAY MOVEMENT IN METHODISM.)

The Road to Union. "The long road to Methodist union" began before the wounds of war were healed. When Bishops JAMES and Simpson met with the Southern bishops in ST. LOUIS in 1869, it became clear that organic union could not be discussed until full fraternal relations had been established. The two churches exchanged fraternal delegates in 1874 and 1876, and in the latter year a Joint Commission on Fraternal Relations meeting at Cape May, N. J. (The CAPE MAY COMMISSION), drew up a "Declaration and Basis of Fraternity," which acknowledged each church as a legitimate branch of episcopal Methodism. In effect the Cape May Declaration put an end to the discussion of the Plan of Separation. It stands as the first great milestone on the road to union.

Twenty years were to pass before discussion of actual steps toward union, but other events were to make the question of union inescapable. The First and Second ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCES in 1881 and 1891 raised the question of Methodist federation. Leaders of both the Northern and the Southern churches participated in the planning for the Centennial Methodist Conference in Baltimore in 1884. Methodists in other countries were discussing union, and in 1883 the four Canadian Methodist groups united to form The Methodist Church in Canada.

A "period of federation" was initiated in 1898 with a joint meeting of commissions appointed by the Southern and Northern General Conferences. Resulting from the work of the Joint Commission on Federation were a common hymnal, catechism and order of worship.

The three churches actually came to grips with the possibility of organic union in 1910, when a commission of Methodist Protestants met with the Joint Commission on Federation. This enlarged group produced a proposal plan of union, the so-called "Chattanooga Report" of 1911, which was to be the real basis upon which unification was eventually accomplished. Methodist Protestants, feeling now that the union question was at this stage a matter to be settled by the two larger groups, stood aside to await the outcome. The two General Conferences set up a Joint Committee on Unification, which got down to work in 1916. Its first proposed constitution was turned down by both General Conferences. This plan called for six white Jurisdictional or Regional Conferences and one embracing "the work among colored people in the United States," with each Regional Conference retaining full power over distinctly regional affairs within its jurisdiction. (See JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCES.)

Returning to its work, the Joint Commission next offered a proposal establishing one General Conference with two Regional or Jurisdictional Conferences, one composed of the Annual Conferences of the Northern Church and the other composed of the Annual Conferences of the Southern Church. Although both General Conferences in 1924 (there was a called session of the M. E. South Conference) gave approval to the plan, it failed to carry the required three-fourths of all votes cast in the Southern Annual Conferences. The final count was 4,528 in favor and 4,108 against.

But union was really closer than the disappointing vote of 1925 seemed to indicate. A younger generation, impatient with inherited resentments and more objective in their assessment of history, demanded union. The three churches, never differing in basic doctrines, had now drawn closer together in spirit and practice and in various cooperative enterprises. Above all, the men who had gained much experience and insight in long discussions in the union commissions refused to resign their hopes.

Methodist Protestant leaders, catalysts from the beginning in the union discussions, initiated the final drive toward union. After each of the three churches had authorized a commission for union, the Joint Commission met in August 1934, and a year later completed work on the PLAN OF UNION. The Plan passed all three General Conferences and their Annual Conferences by tremendous majorities. The UNITING CONFERENCE convened in KANSAS CITY, Mo., on April 26, 1939. (For a more detailed account of the above moves, see UNIFICATION OF AMERICAN METHODISM.)

THE METHODIST CHURCH, 1939-1968

The Methodist Church born in the Uniting Conference of 1939 found itself in a world unbelievably changed, not only from that of the early Methodist fathers, but also from that in which the separated branches had come to maturity. For one thing, the population of the United States had, between 1845 and 1940, increased over sevenfold. What was more, the new problems that had challenged the churches after the Civil War seemed almost simple in comparison with the crises, convulsive and worldwide in scope, that the two decades after 1940 were to bring. Moreover, the whole Christian enterprise was in the midst of a re-examination of the statement of its message and the understanding of its mission. Therefore, the new church faced the dual task of consolidating its inherited structures and of girding itself for mission in the radically altered environment to which it would become increasingly sensitive.

The reorganization, and in some cases relocation, of general church boards and agencies called for much discussion and compromise. The new structures were more complicated and sophisticated, requiring expansion in personnel. Understandably, the early changes were in general conservative. The new jurisdictional system was a source of uneasiness. Although it offered the possibility of a desirable regional diversity, the jurisdictional system carried within it—at least in the eyes of its critics—the threat of division into regional churches. The existence of the Central Jurisdiction, which symbolized the whole struggle of the church with the problem of racial segregation, evoked a controversy that mounted in intensity until the dissolution of that structure in 1968.

Responding to growing criticism of duplication and overlapping of programs, the General Conference of 1948 ordered a comprehensive survey by a management consulting firm. Although the 1952 Conference largely rejected the Church Survey Report, several important changes resulted either directly or indirectly, from the recommendations of the survey commission. These included the establishment of a COORDINATING COUNCIL, charged with the task of review and coordination of the work of the general boards and agencies; and a COMMISSION ON PROMOTION AND CULTIVATION to promote and interpret the programs of the benevolence agencies. The emerging administrative structure placed long-term church-wide program planning under the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS, the COUNCIL OF SECRETARIES (organized in 1940) and the Coordinating Council, with the Commission on Promotion and Cultivation responsible for general promotion of the unified program. In view of the achievement of the quadrennial programs instituted in 1944 and 1948, the 1952 General Conference wrote into the law of the church a provision for continuation of these programs. The quadrennial emphases brought direction and stimulation to the work of the church and contributed to the increase in benevolent giving.

In its first two decades after unification The Methodist Church registered steady if not dramatic expansion in all areas of its work. This was a period of unprecedented mobility in the American population, of rapid growth in the metropolitan areas and acceleration of the movement from the inner city to the suburbs. By 1960 Methodist membership had increased by a fifth, although the general population had grown by a third. The number of pastoral charges increased from approximately 21,000 to over 24,000. Most of the new congregations were in the rapidly growing suburbs. With the merger or closing of many small churches, the number of preaching places declined, but the average membership per congregation increased from 174 to 252. In these twenty years the value of local church and parsonage property quadrupled, and the overall per capita giving to benevolences increased by 136 percent.

The Ministry. Expansion of its organizational structure after 1940 tended to magnify the connexional character of Methodism. This was reflected in developments in the offices of bishop and district superintendent—as the presiding elder of earlier days was now called. With more and more administrative involvement, the bishop was increasingly judged in terms of his administrative skills. Although the constitutional description of the episcopal office had not been altered, the traditional authority of the bishop faced subtle challenge by other power centers. The large coordinating bodies, for instance, were exercising prerogatives in program planning formerly claimed exclusively by the bishops. More and more the district superintendent became the key person in the connexional program. An extensive amount of administrative detail was added to his responsibilities.

The rising educational level of the general population emphasized more than ever the importance of adequate professional training for the minister. Pressure increased to set uniform minimum standards for admission to the Annual Conferences. The General Conference in 1944 placed the church on record as normally expecting a Bachelor of Arts degree or its equivalent as the minimum academic qualification of a candidate for the ministry. The Commission on Ministerial Training made available a variety of opportunities for ministers to study for professional advancement. In the meantime, a study ordered at the time of unification to investigate the whole program of ministerial supply revealed disturbing facts about the age of ministers, the rate of retirement and the adequacy of new recruits. One result of this continuing study was the provision of more liberal financial support for theological education. In 1956 the General Conference authorized two new theological seminaries, bringing the total number then to twelve.

The Local Church. Perhaps at no point was progress more notable after unification than in the organization and work of the local church. Responding to the report of its Commission on the Local Church, the 1952 General Conference provided for a more functional organization to include required program commissions in EVANGELISM, EDUCATION, MISSIONS, and FINANCE. In 1960 a fifth required local church commission, on CHRISTIAN SOCIAL CONCERNS, was added. The new plan for the local church did away with much overlapping of interests and responsibilities, increased lay initiative, and at the same time bound the work of the local church to the general program of the denomination.

The years following unification brought a reorganization of all aspects of the church's Christian education program.

Beginning in 1947 the CURRICULUM COMMITTEE initiated intensive studies leading to the revision of all Church school curriculum materials. The new materials were characterized by firm grounding in the teaching of the church, and by employment of sound educational procedures. With facilities crowded and leadership taxed in the wake of the high birth rate after World War II, the Board of Education of the Church devoted much attention to leadership training. New programs were developed in weekday education, family life, camping, and work with older persons. Programs for youth, sponsored by various agencies in the church, were gradually co-ordinated, and emphasis placed upon guiding youth and their counselors in developing their own programs and projects. A Board of Missions program of short-term assignments for youth opened challenging new avenues of service for young people. The great interest in the use of audio-visual facilities and techniques led eventually to the establishing of an independent agency, the TELEVISION, RADIO AND FILM COMMISSION (TRAFICO), to produce motion pictures and filmstrips for use on television and in the local church.

Lay Activities. Laymen moved into wider participation in all areas of the life of the church. In time, lay delegates were given full membership in the Annual Conferences, a status they had not achieved in the former M. E. Church. Lay representation on the general boards was approximately equal to that of ministers, and laymen were increasingly elected to major staff positions. The General Board of Lay Activities sponsored work with Methodist Men's organizations and gave special emphasis to STEWARDSHIP and FINANCE. The Board was not as successful in reaching its special constituency, however, as was the WOMAN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE. A complete realignment of the church's work and the interests of women, far beyond the traditional limits of the LADIES AID and the missionary societies in the uniting churches, brought great numbers of women into broad participation in the church's work.

Reinforcing the work of these organizations charged specifically with development of lay programs was a deepening understanding of the ministry of the laity. This new interest in "lay Christianity," which revived a distinctive emphasis of early Methodism, was inspired in part by ecumenical emphases upon Christian vocation and church renewal, and in part by a deeper appreciation among Methodists of the meaning of church membership. Methodist churches had a wider and more varied program of evangelism in 1960 than in 1940, and in most instances laymen assumed the major responsibility for recruitment. "Joining the church" was to be taken far less casually than before 1940, and pastors were more insistent that new members be adequately instructed. An abundance of devotional literature, such as The Upper Room, circulated in the churches, and groups for the cultivation of spiritual life stimulated fresh and serious interest.

Theological Renewal. Supporting this new seriousness and affecting the witness of the church in all areas of its work, both at home and abroad, was the theological renewal that had begun in the years leading up to Methodist reunion. Some Methodist leaders in the mid-1930's were sensitive to the theological revival in Europe and were growing more critical of the evangelical liberalism which at that time was perhaps dominant among Methodist theologians. Issues raised by these men were sharpened in the next decade. Moreover, the impact of ecumenical conversations was leading Methodists to recapture Wesley's theological orientation and to re-examine the theological heritage of American Methodism. The work of a younger generation of theologians led to a theological renaissance which penetrated the seminaries and began to reach laymen as well. Coextensive with the theological revival was a new interest in biblical studies, which also flourished in the seminaries and found expression in the preaching and teaching of the church. (See the Doctrinal articles in this Encyclopedia; and also ETHICAL TRADITIONS IN AMERICAN METHODISM.)

Its deeper theological interest helped Methodism to think more critically about the church and its mission, about the relation of faith to culture, and the meaning of Christian vocation.

Christian Social Concerns. After the adoption of its Social Creed in 1908 American Methodism wrote an enviable chapter of compassion and persistent courage in social witness. The wide-ranging social justice program advocated in 1908 still seemed radical a quarter-century later when much of it was written into law. Other problems—race relations, peace and world order—which had claimed less attention in earlier years, moved into the center of the church's concerns. All the while the METHODIST FEDERATION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE, an unofficial organization founded in 1907, guarded the church against complacency. Bishops of the church, such as HERBERT WELCH, FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL and FREDERIC B. FISHER, were prominent in the leadership of the social movement.

Even as it moved toward greater social responsibility, however, Methodism, like most of American Protestantism, was disturbed by anxieties. At the beginning of the century the Methodist Episcopal Church, successful, numerous and relatively wealthy, enjoyed the favored position of senior partner, so to speak, in the national culture. With its middle-class, rural and Anglo-Saxon orientation it lent sanctity to the traditional values of the older America. When the church did move to champion the cause of labor and to defend the Negro and the immigrant, it created for itself a disturbing problem of identity. As the "new Americans" began to claim a place of their own in the national life, Methodists saw their former position of influence eroding. The story of the prohibition crusade and Methodist involvement in the 1928 presidential election, illustrated both the changing character of American culture and the declining power of the older Protestantism. Almost at the moment of its triumph over the "wets," Methodists found that they no longer were senior partners. The experience of the 30's and 40's would make clearer what the failure of the prohibition crusade had implied: Methodism (indeed, all of Protestantism) must function in a plural society; it must distinguish carefully between the standards of its culture and the ethical demands of its inherited faith; and its social witness would be no less demanding, but more wisely and realistically conceived.

When the wave of conservative reaction after World War II directed fierce attacks on Methodist social teachings in general, and the Methodist Federation for Social Action (its new name) in particular, the church's response was not to surrender its position, but to bring the program of social education and action more completely under the oversight of the General Conference. The Conference in 1952 set up a Board of Social and Economic Relations to deal with questions in the areas of economic life, race relations and civic and social welfare. Early in the following year Bishop G. BROMLEY OXNAM, on his own request and with unanimous support of the Council of Bishops, appeared before the House Un-American Activities Committee in Washington to answer charges that he was "soft" on Communism. Although the charges were not formally withdrawn, Bishop Oxnam's brilliant defense blunted the point of much of the irrational attack upon the churches. In 1960 the General Conference further strengthened its base for social witness by consolidating the work of the Board of Social and Economic Relations with that of two older agencies, the Board of Temperance and the Board of World Peace, under a single agency, the Board of Christian Social Concerns. For the first time the Church now had strong and effective co-ordination of its social concerns at the highest level and auxiliary means to bring these concerns to the attention of every member. Methodists did not speak with one voice on the crucial social issues of the mid-20th century, but the church was prepared to guide its people in the study, discussion and action required of responsible Christians.

Higher Education. Methodist institutions for higher education underwent considerable change after unification because of a phenomenal increase of tax-supported institutions and radical changes in what the public expected of education. Church institutions placed heavy emphasis upon improvement of standards and strengthening of faculty and endowments. The number of unaccredited senior colleges was reduced from thirty-four in 1940 to two in 1960. A few Methodist-founded institutions, in their search for funds, broke their ties with the denomination. However, in 1960 eight universities, twelve schools of theology, seventy-seven senior colleges, and twenty-one junior colleges retained their Methodist ties. Although higher education was then receiving a larger proportion of the Methodist benevolence dollar than ever before, concerted emphasis was placed on developing within the Annual Conferences increased support for institutions in their areas. A Department of College and University Religious Life in the Division of Educational Institutions of the Board of Education was maintaining contact with students in non-Methodist as well as in Methodist schools, and was instrumental in raising the standards of work with students.

New Publishing Ventures. Of all the enterprises inherited by the united church in 1939 none expanded more effectively in service than did the publishing interests. Six printing and manufacturing plants were consolidated into two plants, and the administrative and organizational structure was completely revamped. By 1960 sales had grown fivefold, and capital assets had increased to $21 million. By 1967 the Publishing House had seventeen retail outlets in major metropolitan areas. Abingdon Press had become one of the major book publishers of the nation. Publication of The Interpreter's Bible, completed in 1957 at a cost of $2 million, was the most notable achievement of its kind in the church's history. Another impressive publishing venture was a new periodical for the Christian family, called Together, which by 1960 reached a circulation of a million. Other general church periodicals were the bi-weekly Christian Advocate for Methodist leaders; and Religion in Life, a quarterly published for the Christian scholar. The Publishing House, in cooperation with the Editorial Division of the Board of Education, coordinated the church school literature of the three uniting churches and continued work on improvement of these materials.

Social Services. Changes in other Methodist institutions reflected shifts in population patterns and the marked growth in federally-assisted welfare services. The number of homes for the elderly increased from the thirty-seven established before union to ninety-six in 1960. This growth stood in contrast with the small increase in hospitals, and that in homes for children. The number of hospitals increased from sixty-eight to seventy-six. Of the forty-four homes maintained for children in 1960, only one had been opened since unification. More of the Methodist homes were adapting their programs to serve troubled children and children from broken families. The church also sponsored several residences for business women and two homes for unmarried mothers. GOODWILL INDUSTRIES, devoted to employment and rehabilitation of handicapped workers, were in 1960 operating in 141 cities. Some of these centers were maintained on an interdenominational basis.

Hardly had the Uniting Conference adjourned when the churches received urgent calls for CHAPLAINS to serve in the armed forces. In 1942 the Council of Bishops established the Commission on Chaplains to develop standards and recruit candidates. By 1944 over 1,300 Methodists were serving as military chaplains. The Commission, established as a permanent agency in 1948, continued to maintain liaison with Methodist chaplains during the Korean War and in the enlarged peace-time military services. In 1956 the Commission was authorized to recruit and endorse chaplains to serve in industry and in certain public and private institutions. (See CHAPLAIN AND COMMISSION ON CHAPLAINS.)

The Inner City. In the area of national missions the problems overshadowing all others as Americans moved past mid-century were those associated with the inner core of the large cities and industrial areas. The church entered a variety of ventures, many of them on an interdenominational basis, in the inner city. Assisting in the development of new strategies for national missions, urban and rural, were research personnel in the various boards and the seminaries, whose work was co-ordinated by an Interagency Committee on Research established in 1960.

The urban ghettos, created at least in part by the flight of the middle classes to the suburbs, caused Protestants to look afresh at the social stratification of their churches. A new urgency had now entered the picture, too, in the wake of America's Negro revolution; and white churchmen began to recognize that they could no longer think in terms of ministering "to" Negroes. Symbolizing this change in perspective was the dropping of the Department of Negro Work from the organizational structure of the Division of National Missions. Yet the task of building a racially inclusive church was hardly more than begun.

Meanwhile, the Department of Town and Country Work continued its interest in the small church and rural communities, as the nation was becoming more sensitive to the presence of rural poverty. The Woman's Division also continued to work in rural areas, particularly in the maintenance of schools, and in providing Christian education workers in rural areas.

Boards and agencies of the church found themselves intricately involved in the work of interdenominational agencies which had grown steadily in number since the beginning of the century. From the time of its organization in 1908, Methodist leaders were actively engaged in the life of the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES of Christ in America. In 1950 the Federal Council joined with a number of other interdenominational agencies in which Methodists had participated to form the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES of Christ in the United States of America. The comprehensive program of united work and witness launched by the National Council drew frequently from Methodist leadership for officers and staff. Countless other Methodists worked in state and local councils and in special conferences related to the National Council.

World Outreach. Nowhere were Methodists made more aware of the passing of the world of their fathers than in the area of world mission. Not only had the world changed. The church itself was gaining a new understanding of its mission and learning that mission had to be undertaken in cooperation with other denominations. If World War II disrupted the usual work of the missionaries in every field, it also accelerated a whole range of world-wide developments, long since underway, but now intensified with inescapable urgency. Administrators of the missionary enterprise had to confront the rise of a new nationalism and the end of western colonialism, the revival of non-Christian faiths and the insistence upon cultural integrity, the extension of Communism and the evolution of socialistic political and economic systems, the explosion of population and the impact of new communications media.

The church's mission required new strategies, new policies of recruitment and deployment of personnel, new ways of assisting indigeneous leadership, and new relations between the overhead agencies and the workers in the field. Of no less urgency was the need to help members of the local churches gain a better understanding of "the church in mission." The quadrennial programs of the General Conference emphasized more personal contact between the missionary on the field and the members of the home congregation. Response to the promotion of "mission specials" was so extensive that by 1960 over half of the receipts by the Division of World Missions was from this source. Two decades after unification, despite the vast changes that had intervened, the number of missionaries representing the Division of World Missions and the Woman's Division of Christian Service in the Christian enterprise outside the United States and its territories had increased by approximately thirty percent.

Closely related to mission in the twentieth century was Methodist involvement in the ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT. It was a Methodist layman, JOHN R. MOTT, who more than any other one man, laid the groundwork for this movement. Mott in 1910 presided over the first WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE at Edinburgh, which is often called the fountainhead of the Ecumenical Movement. Methodist missionary leaders helped guide the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL, organized to follow up the Edinburgh Conference. American Methodist theologians and ecclesiastical leaders also participated in the Faith and Order and Life and Work Movements prior to the founding of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES; but it was really at the first assembly of the World Council in Amsterdam in 1948 that Methodist leadership began to appear in strength. American Methodists had a closer view of ecumenical conversations in 1954 when the second assembly of the World Council met on the campus of Northwestern University of Evanston. Since 1954 an increasing number of Methodists have participated in World Council assemblies, in various ecumenical study commissions and in writing and teaching in the field of ecumenics.

One of the fruits of Vatican Council II has been the friendly discussions and positive relationships between Protestants and Roman Catholics. Methodists were among the official observers at the Council in Rome, and the Methodist Council of Bishops when in session dispatched a letter of greetings to the Council.

Changes in Worship. As the Methodist Church broadened its participation in the ecumenical movement and increased in its own self-understanding it was also influenced by the liturgical renewal that moved through many of the churches. Too long accustomed to the ways of free worship to give way to radical changes or imposed uniformity, Methodists had nevertheless, since the Civil War, manifested growing interests in church architecture, in the improvement of its resources in music, and in achieving greater dignity in its services. At times this interest proved more cultural and esthetic than distinctively religious. With the rediscovery of its theological heritage, however, the church was moved to give more deliberate consideration to the meaning and use of historic forms of worship. Interest developed especially among youth and student groups. A department of Ministry of Music under the Board of Education, the National Fellowship of Methodist Musicians, the Department of Architecture of the Board of Missions, and the general Commission on Worship offered guidance and provided resources. Courses in worship found place in the seminary curricula. A revision of The Hymnal, prepared by the Commission on Worship and officially adopted in 1964, drew more extensively than its predecessor upon both the Wesleyan hymnody and the heritage of ecumenical hymnody, while retaining many of the hymns long cherished in various sections of the church. New services prepared by the Commission and placed in The Hymnal and The Book of Worship brought contemporary Methodist worship more fully into the tradition of its own Wesleyan heritage as well as that of Western Christianity in general.

On the eve of the General Conference of 1968 The Methodist Church made ready to merge its relatively brief institutional life into a larger union. It then joined hands with the EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH and formed The United Methodist Church. In its twenty-nine years The Methodist Church had labored in one of the most critical periods in the life of the nation and perhaps of the world. With all the changes in its exterior life, however, and despite a humbling awareness of unfinished tasks, one may fairly claim that it had not been unfaithful to its heritage. That heritage had been shared by the Evangelical United Brethren. To the United Methodist Church has been handed not only the stewardship of a common heritage, but also a parish reaching to the ends of the earth in which Christians of many heritages will—one devoutly hopes—discover their unity as disciples of one Lord.

THE UNITED METHODIST CHURCH (1968-)

In late November of 1946, just seven years after the 1939 union which formed The Methodist Church, and just a few days after the union which formed the Evangelical United Brethren Church, a definite move toward the union of these two churches began. Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam of The Methodist Church brought a fraternal address to the first General Conference of The Evangelical United Brethren Church. In it he mentioned the naturalness and possibility of such a union.

First Moves Toward Union. Prior to the Evangelical United Brethren General Conference of 1958 several persons sent petitions to the conference asking that E.U.B. leaders explore the possibility of union with The Methodist Church. That 1958 conference, meeting in Harrisburg, Pa., directed its Commission on Church Federation and Union "to further study and explore the possible advantages and the potential problems involved in organic union with The Methodist Church, and "to continue exploratory conversations with the Commission on Church Union of The Methodist Church."

Bishop REUBEN H. MUELLER of the Evangelical United Brethren Church went as fraternal delegate to the 1960 General Conference of The Methodist Church in DENVER, and spoke there about the possibility of union. That conference authorized The Methodist Commission on Union to negotiate a PLAN of UNION with a similar commission from the Evangelical United Brethren Church. It was not until 1962, however, that the E.U.B. Commission was authorized by the Grand Rapids General Conference of that church to negotiate such a plan. Union was the dominant theme of the Grand Rapids meeting where the subject was literally prayed through the legislative committee first and later through the plenary session.

By early 1964 the Joint Commission on Union had negotiated a proposed Constitution for The United Methodist Church. The preamble to that Constitution said,

The prayers and intentions of The Methodist Church and The Evangelical United Brethren Church have been and are for obedience to the will of our Lord that His people be one, in humility for the present brokenness of the church, and in gratitude that opportunities for reunion have been given. In harmony with these prayers and intentions these churches do now propose to unite, in the confident assurance that this act is an expression of the oneness of Christ's people.

Conversations concerning union between the two churches and their constituent members have taken place over a long period of years, and the churches have a long and impressive history of fellowship and cooperation.

Therefore, we, the Commissions on Church Union of The Methodist Church, and of The Evangelical United Brethren Church, holding that these churches are essentially one in origin, in belief, in spirit, and in purpose, and desiring that this essential unity be made actual in organization and administration in the United States of America and throughout the world, do hereby propose and transmit to our respective General Conferences the following Plan of Union and recommend to the two churches its adoption by the processes which they respectively require.

This Plan of Union or constitution was presented to the General Conference of The Methodist Church at PITTSBURGH, Pa., in April of 1964. That conference did not adopt or approve the constitution, but it did approve the union in principle and voted to hold an adjourned session of the Methodist General Conference at the same time and in the same city as the 1966 General Conference of the E.U.B. church. This proved to be CHICAGO.

Following this affirmative Methodist action of 1964, seventeen joint committees involving almost 200 persons were appointed to share in the work of negotiating a total Plan of Union. At that time Bishop LLOYD C. WICKE of The Methodist Church and Bishop Reuben H. Mueller of The Evangelical United Brethren Church were co-chairmen of The Joint Commission on Union, and Mr. CHARLES C. PARLIN of The Methodist Church and Bishop J. GORDON HOWARD of The Evangelical United Brethren Church were co-secretaries. In November of 1964 Dr. PAUL WASHBURN was called from a pastorate at First Evangelical United Brethren Church in Naperville, Illinois, to become executive secretary of the E.U.B. Commission.

Early in 1966 The Plan of Union, a book of 361 pages, was mailed to delegates to The General Conferences of the two churches which were to meet in Chicago, Illinois, in early November. The book included a Letter of Transmittal, an Historical Statement, The Constitution, Doctrinal Statements and The General Rules, Social Principles and Organization and Administration. It was in reality the Plan of Union lacking only The Enabling Legislation.

The Chicago Conferences. At Chicago, the two conferences meeting Nov. 8-12, 1966, in back-to-back ballrooms of the Conrad Hilton Hotel, elected an Inter-Conference Committee to negotiate different positions held by the two conferences regarding the published plan. By Friday morning, November 11, the negotiating was ended and the two conferences were ready to vote. The Methodist conference needed a two-thirds majority, and the Evangelical United Brethren conference needed a three-fourths majority to adopt the Constitution and The Enabling Legislation. At high noon, an hour after the conferences had paused to honor America's military men who died in wars, it was announced that both conferences had voted and cast the required number of affirmative votes to send the Constitution and Enabling Legislation on to the Annual Conferences for their approval. On the afternoon of that day the two conferences met together for a Service of Thanksgiving. Bishops Mueller, RAINES and Wicke spoke, and the joint conference sang "Blest be the Tie That Binds."

During the following months The Plan of Union was republished as it had been amended at Chicago. An editorial committee—EMORY S. BUCKE, CURTIS A. CHAMBERS, Charles C. Parlin and Paul Washburn—had responsibility for this republication.

By June 26, 1967 enough affirmative votes had been cast in the Annual Conferences of the two churches to assure the union. On that day Bishop DONALD TIPPETT, President of the Methodist Council of Bishops, and Bishop Reuben Mueller, President of The Evangelical United Brethren Board of Bishops, made formal public announcement that the union had been approved.

The Uniting Conference. The celebration of the union took place in DALLAS, Texas on April 23, 1968. During the service of worship Dr. ALBERT OUTLER preached on "The Unfinished Business of an Unfinished Church." Some of his poignant lines follow:

The essence of the event is self-evident: it is the accomplished fact of The United Methodist Church. Where once, scarcely a generation ago, there were five churches, now there is one. Where once our differences kept us apart—with different languages and folkways—now they are overcome or else at least contained within a larger circle of committed fellowship. We have been Christian brethren, after a fashion, for the better part of two centuries—but separated brethren. Now our memberships and ministries have been mingled without compromise or indignity; our separate traditions have been sublated and made one.

... This, then, is our birthday—a day to celebrate, a day to remember, a day for high hopes and renewed commitments. This is a day when the eyes of the whole Christian community are focused on us and especially those of our Methodist brethren in Britain who are with us in spirit. This is the day that the Lord has made. Let us really rejoice and be glad in it—glad for the new chance God now gives us: to be a church united in order to be uniting, a church repentant in order to be a church redemptive, a church cruciform in order to manifest God's triumphant agony for mankind.

Till sons of men shall learn his love
And follow where his feet have trod
Till glorious from the heavens above
Shall come the city of our God!

Following the sermon Bishop Mueller and Bishop Wicke made declaration of the union in the following words:

I, Reuben H. Mueller, a bishop of The Evangelical United Brethren Church, hereby announce that the Plan of Union with The Methodist Church has been adopted by The Evangelical United Brethren Church in accordance with the procedures prescribed in its constitutional law, namely, by an affirmative vote of more than three-fourths of the members of the Chicago General Conference present and voting on November 11, 1966, and by more than a two-thirds affirmative vote of the aggregate number of members of all the annual conferences in North America present and voting thereon.

I, Lloyd C. Wicke, a bishop of The Methodist Church, hereby announce that the Plan of Union with The Evangelical United Brethren Church has been adopted by The Methodist Church in accordance with the procedures prescribed in its constitution, namely, by vote of more than a two-thirds majority of the members of the Chicago General Conference present and voting on November 11, 1966, and by more than a two-thirds majority of all members of the several annual conferences present and voting thereon.

We now jointly declare that the Plan of Union between The Evangelical United Brethren Church and The Methodist Church has, by its terms and by the terms of the Enabling Legislation, become effective and henceforth The Evangelical United Brethren Church and The Methodist Church shall go forward as a single entity to be known as The United Methodist Church.

After the Declaration of Union the two bishops, then two children, then two youths, then two adults, then six ordained ministers from five continents, then two church officers, and finally all the 10,000 persons present joined hands and said, Lord of the Church, we are united in thee, in thy Church, and now in The United Methodist Church. Amen.

and the union was a fact.

Near the close of the celebration Bishop Tippettd led the congregation in an impressive Covenant.

We are no longer our own, but thine. Put us to what thou wilt, rank us with whom thou wilt; put us to doing, put us to suffering; let us be employed for thee or laid aside for thee, exalted for thee or brought low for thee; let us be full, let us be empty; let us have all things, let us have nothing; we freely and heartily yield all things to thy pleasure and disposal.

And now, O glorious and blessed God, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, thou art ours, and we are thine. So be it. And the covenant which we have made on earth, let it be ratified in heaven. Amen.

Following the act of union, the Uniting Conference turned to the work of perfecting The Discipline for the new United Methodist Church. While such perfecting was accomplished, it could not be said that the conference was totally occupied with the new church's structure. It was much more concerned about the situation in the United States, and focused its attention again and again upon how to be a church on relevant mission to the world of 1968 and beyond. It therefore established a new Commission on Religion and Race. It adopted a Quadrennial Program under the theme, "A New Church for a New World"; it voted to secure $20,000,000 to be used in ministering to the crisis in the nation. Bishop JAMES K. MATHEWS, who was elected to head the Quadrennial Program said, "The Uniting Conference was a renewal conference and will be known as one of the great Christian gatherings of this century."

PAUL WASHBURN

METHODIST, THE, was an independent church paper, published weekly in New York beginning June 14, 1860. Often called "The New York Methodist," it was at first the organ of conservatives in the M.E. Church who protested a new disciplinary provision against slavery passed at the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1860. Earlier, leading members of the NEW YORK EAST CONFERENCE had formed a Laymen's and Ministers' Union to lobby against revisions in the chapter on slavery in the Discipline, which had been unchanged since 1816. At the General Conference the Union sided with border Methodists, some of whom, clergy and laity, were slaveholders. They threatened to secede from the church because of attacks from antislavery Methodists. After the passage of the new legislation, and with the defeat of ABEL STEVENS, the incumbent editor of the Christian Advocate and Journal in New York, the Union no longer had direct access to the official church press. Its members decided to issue The Methodist in order to prevent a disruption of border Methodism and to provide a journal of conservative opinion for the church.

The leading supporters of the new paper included Stevens, later an eminent historian of Methodism; Oliver Hoyt, a New York banker; Daniel Ross, a New York leather merchant; and its first editors, JOHN M'CLINTOCK, a professor and former editor of the Methodist Quarterly Review, and GEORGE R. CROOKS, later a professor at DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY. Crooks went to work immediately to keep the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE in the northern church. He argued that the new antislavery rule was merely advisory, and not prohibitory. Crooks' campaign was partially successful, despite the withdrawal of sixty-six ministers and twenty-five thousand members in MARYLAND and VIRGINIA who formed an independent Central Methodist Episcopal Church which merged with southern Methodism after the war. While southern states were forming their confederacy in 1860 and 1861, Crooks cultivated Union sentiment in Maryland and western Virginia to support a loyal Methodist church on the border.

During the war The Methodist abandoned its toleration of slavery and supported President Abraham Lincoln's policies, including the edict of emancipation. Its editorial position was a barometer of northern public opinion, which, at first, backed the war as necessary to preserve the union, and only later supported it as a means to end slavery. Editorial correspondent M'Clintock, who was pastor of the American Church in Paris from 1861 to 1864, published a regular series of articles on European political and public attitudes toward the American war. His reports were informative documents about the competition for foreign support between the Confederacy and the United States.

Early in the war The Methodist took up a new cause. Its offices became headquarters for the lay representation movement in northern Methodism. Crooks sent out lecturers to promote the cause and published 250,000 tracts urging Methodists to end clerical domination of church conferences. The final success of lay representation in 1872, was due, in large measure, to the work of Crooks and his associates.

After the Civil War, The Methodist promoted the reunion of northern and southern Methodism. Throughout the reconstruction period, the paper was the leading voice in the North calling for fraternal relations which were finally consummated between the M.E. Church and the M.E. Church, South, in 1876. Crooks and his successor, David H. Wheeler, who became editor in 1875, opposed radical reconstruction in the South and consistently criticized racial equalitarians in the northern church.

Even though it was not an official paper supported by the GENERAL CONFERENCE, many outstanding Methodists wrote for and subscribed to this journal. Weekly circulation grew to nearly 22,000 by 1873. Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON, nationally known orator and preacher, regularly published sermons in The Methodist. After the bishop's death, Crooks edited a volume of his selected sermons which were first published in the paper. Simpson's Lyman Beecher lectures on preaching at Yale University also appeared in the columns of The Methodist during the fall and winter of 1878-1879.

In 1881, DANIEL CURRY, former editor of the Christian Advocate in New York, became Wheeler's associate, but the paper's future was doubtful. It no longer had any special cause to promote. On Oct. 7, 1882, therefore, the final issue appeared, after which time The Methodist consolidated with the New York Advocate.

METHODIST ADVOCATE, THE, a weekly periodical published in 1868 and for some years afterward in ATLANTA, Ga., under the controlling patronage of the M.E. Church, when that Church was enlarging its work strongly in the Southern States following the Civil War. The GENERAL CONFERENCE (ME) of 1868 authorized the BOOK AGENTS at CINCINNATI to publish such a periodical, either at KNOXVILLE, Atlanta, or NASHVILLE, with the editor to be appointed by the bishops of the Church with the concurrence of the Book Agents. It was understood that these were at liberty to discontinue the paper if its publication should involve a greater loss to the concern than $2,000 per annum. After a time the Book Agents selected Atlanta, and the first number of the paper appeared on Jan. 6, 1869, E. Q. Fuller having been appointed editor by the bishops. The subscription list, however, averaged a little less than 3,000 per year, and as there was considerable tension between the "Northern Methodists," as the M.E. Church was called in the deep South, and the reorganized M.E. Church, South, the Methodist Advocate did not grow rapidly.

At the General Conference of 1872, N. E. Cobleigh was elected editor, and upon his death in 1874, E. Q. Fuller was again appointed to fill the place, and he was duly elected to it by the General Conference of 1876. The circulation as reported to that General Conference was 3,102.

The Methodist Advocate did not prosper and was discontinued at the direction of the Book Committee, the last number being issued on Feb. 24, 1883. At the 1884 General Conference, it was reported that T. C. Carter, former missionary to China, had purchased the printing plant and furnishings and had reestablished the paper in Chattanooga, Tenn., under the same name.

The Book Concern at the General Conference of 1888, secured the adoption of a resolution to subsidize Methodist Advocate and to recognize it as "the official organ of the Church in its patronizing territory in the Southern States," the subsidy not to exceed $500 per quarter. The resolution provided for church control over the "general tone and editorial conduct" of the paper, but denied any responsibility for its financial obligations.

At the 1892 General Conference the Book Committee reported that the obligations of the paper were too great for its resources, even including the subsidy, and the Publishing and Book Committees had deemed it wise to purchase the property and franchises. After negotiating for two years, the Book Committee closed a contract with T. C. Carter on Nov. 15, 1891, securing his resignation as editor. The agreement included filling the unexpired subscriptions of Methodist Advocate with the Western Christian Advocate.

METHODIST BOOK AND PUBLISHING HOUSE, THE (1829-1925), at Toronto, CANADA, was organized on authority granted by the Canada Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church meeting at Ancaster, Upper Canada, Ontario, in August 1829. It was resolved:

That a weekly paper should be established under the direction of the Conference, of a religious and moral character, to be entitled The Christian Guardian. That the place of its location be the Town of York (now Toronto). That the sum of $700 is sufficient to purchase all the apparatus for a printing establishment. That the sum of $2,050 will meet the annual expence of such a paper. . . . That the stock to the amount of $2,000 be raised by dividing it into 100 shares of $20 each, half of which to be paid immediately, and the remainder subject to the call of the persons who may be appointed to superintend the publishing of the paper; the said stock to be repaid with interest as soon as the avails of the concern will admit of it. That . . . the members of the Conference . . . take up the shares among themselves, but if all be not disposed of in that way, that they use their influence with their friends to have the remainder taken up immediately. That a committee of 5 persons be appointed annually by the Conference to superintend the publishing of the paper and other printing that may be done in the office. (Canada Conference, Ms. Minutes, 1829.)

EGERTON RYERSON was elected book steward and editor, and was furnished with the following handwritten certificate which is still preserved in the offices of the Publishing House: "This may certify that the Bearer, Rev. Egerton Ryerson, is appointed Agent for procuring a printing Establishment for The Canada Conference, and is hereby commended to the Christian confidence of all, on whom he may have occasion to call for advice and assistance for the above purpose." It is signed, "William Case, Superintendent, Ancaster, Upper Canada, Sept. 4, 1829."

The first publication of the church press was entitled The Doctrines and Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada (1829). This was followed in 1835 by the first book, a Canadian edition of The Village Blacksmith, or Piety and Usefulness Exemplified, a memoir of the life of SAMUEL HICK, by JAMES EVERETT, published by Matthew Lang for The Wesleyan Methodist Church in Canada. Minutes of Conferences, special reports, a few sermons and addresses, an early book of poems, pamphlets on temperance, a cookbook entitled The Frugal Housewife's Manual, by A. B. of Grimsby (1840), and a variety of writings by Egerton Ryerson himself mark the lists of the early years of the Publishing House. In 1860 there was an experiment in publishing a missionary biography, The Life and Journals of Rev. Peter Jones.

During the last quarter of the nineteenth century The Canadian Methodist Magazine, edited by W. H. WITTHROW, which ranked with the best literary publications of that period, was issued by the Publishing House. In addition, it began to prepare Sunday school publications for Canadian church schools. The Sunday School Banner made its first appearance as a teacher's assistant in 1868 (editor, ALEXANDER SUTHERLAND). Illustrated story papers for recreational reading began with The Sunday School Guardian (1846), The Sunbeam (1880), Pleasant Hours (1880), Onward (1891). These have been revised, enlarged, succeeded by new publications, until today the Publishing House issues four such story papers with a total weekly circulation of more than 300,000.

The name of WILLIAM BRIGGS is important in the record of the development of the Methodist Publishing House. He served as book steward from 1879 until 1918, and during this time the volume of business increased enormously. He acquired printing contracts, notably from the provincial government, which enabled the plant to enlarge its equipment, until it became the largest printing as well as publishing concern in Canada. Briggs acquired Canadian publishing rights from a number of British authors and publishers, and began to import books from the United States. The Methodist Book Room, as it was popularly called, became a depository and a publishing house for books of all kinds. William Briggs used his own name as publisher. A trade name was adopted shortly afterward.

General book publishing, in the modern sense of the term, in addition to official church publishing, began with the appointment of a book editor in 1920. Lorne Pierce (1890-1962), who came into the office as literary adviser to the book steward, was to review books and periodicals for the official church paper. But his passion for Canadian literature, born out of his studies at Queen's University, Kingston, and fed by a simultaneous flowering of Canadian literary expression after the First World War, compelled him to think of building a publishing program which was destined to make a great house greater. The house adopted as its trade name The Ryerson Press, in honor of its founder, and under that imprint undertook seriously to publish the best by Canadian authors, artists, poets and historians. Some of the significant items published in the twenties were: Our Canadian Literature; Representative Prose and Verse by Albert Durrant Watson (1859-1926); Methodism and the New Catholicism, by Lorne Pierce; Makers of Canadian Literature, a series of thirteen volumes of biographical and critical studies of early Canadian authors; Ryerson Essays, a series of pamphlets written by Canadian churchmen on religious topics and heresies; Canadian History Readers, a series of brief biographies of Canadian pioneers; and the Ryerson Poetry Chapbooks, a series of inexpensive publications to record the current output of verse.

When the Methodist, Presbyterian, and Congregational Churches of Canada united in 1925 to form The United Church of Canada, the Methodist Book and Publishing House became The United Church Publishing House (The Ryerson Press). The original church paper, The Christian Guardian, published without interruption for ninety-six years, became successively The New Outlook (1926) and The United Church Observer (1939), which is still being published. The Sunday school publications have become The New Curriculum, a series of annual study books for teachers and pupils of all grades. Book publishing, including a full range of educational text books for elementary and secondary schools and trade books in all categories, continues to give the church Publishing House a unique place among its counterparts in other countries. Through the medium of publishing, Methodism in Canada produced a lively and imaginative mission to the church and the nation. (See also THE CHRISTIAN GUARDIAN.)

METHODIST COLLEGE, Belfast, Ireland, was opened in 1868 as a school providing higher education leading to university entrance, and as a theological college for the Methodist Church in IRELAND. From the beginning the school was open to boys and girls of all denominations, and a boarding department for boys was an integral part of the institution. One special feature was to provide for the education of the children of Methodist ministers. A boarding department for girls was established in 1891 in McArthur Hall, provided by the munificence of Sir WILLIAM MCARTHUR. The school pioneered in developments in secondary education, particularly after the creation of the Ministry of Education in Northern Ireland, following the Government of Ireland Act, 1920. In 1919 the theological department was transferred to Edgehill, and an Act of Parliament in 1926 completed the legal separation. The original site of about fourteen acres is now almost wholly occupied by the new buildings modern developments have made necessary, especially in science laboratories, but in 1932 a site of almost forty acres was obtained at Pirrie Park, Belfast, for playing fields. One of the two junior schools, Downey House, was established there; the other, Fullerton House, is beside the main college. Methodist College now has 2,149 pupils—1,288 boys and 846 girls—of whom 1,609 are in the secondary grammar department, eleven to eighteen years of age, while there are 301 in Fullerton House and 239 in Downey House in the two preparatory departments, five to eleven years of age. Of the total number there are 203 boarders. Principals and Heads of the Theological Department have been WILLIAM ARTHUR, 1868-71; Robert Crook, 1871-73; Robinson Scott, 1873-80; Joseph McKay, 1880-91; Oliver McCutcheon, 1891-95; William Nicholas, 1895-1908; Joseph Campbell, 1908-20; then see Edgehill College. Headmasters have been Robert Crook, 1868-71; Henry R. Parker, 1871-90; Henry S. McIntosh, 1890-1912; Ernest I. Lewis, 1912-17; John W. Henderson, 1917-43; John Falconer, 1943-48; Albert H. R. Ball, 1948-60; and A. Stanley Worrall, 1961-.

METHODIST COLLEGE, Fayetteville, N. C., was chartered Nov. 1, 1956, as an institution of higher education under the auspices of the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE. The citizens of Fayetteville and Cumberland County assumed responsibility for providing a campus and for contributing $2,000,000 to match a like amount from the conference, plus $50,000 annually for current operations. The campus of 577 acres, with 12 modern buildings acquired since 1957, is valued at a higher figure than many institutions which have been in existence 100 years or more. The college was admitted to membership in the Southern Association of Schools and Colleges in 1966 and was accredited by the UNIVERSITY SENATE of The Methodist Church in 1967. Degrees granted are the B.A. and B.S.

The governing board has a minimum of twenty-four and a maximum of thirty-six trustees, nominated by the board, approved by the North Carolina Conference Board of Education, and confirmed by the annual conference.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, THE. (See METHODISM IN THE UNITED STATES.)

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH, the second largest American Methodist denomination prior to Unification in 1939, grew out of constitutional questions related to slavery. The law of the Church then provided that Methodists should not hold slaves in those states where the laws allowed emancipation and where emancipated slaves could enjoy freedom.

Bishop JAMES O. ANDREW of GEORGIA became connected with slavery through his marriage to a woman who owned slaves. Since the laws of the state did not permit emancipation, Andrew executed a document in which the ownership was secured to his wife, and which provided that the slaves would be assisted to go to a state where emancipation was legal if they chose to do so.

The situation led to a notable debate in the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1844. The Northern delegates insisted that a bishop's connection with slavery would be harmful to the Church in the North, while the Southern delegates took the position that the Church would be practically destroyed in the South by punitive action against a slaveholder in a state where emancipation was forbidden by law, and who had violated no rule of the Church. Furthermore, it was claimed that the General Conference proposed to pass on the constitutionality of its own action.

The Northern majority adopted a resolution which requested Bishop Andrew to desist from exercising the functions of his office so long as the impediment remained. In the impasse a PLAN OF SEPARATION was adopted. This provided that if the Southern Conferences deemed it advisable to organize a separate General Conference the assets of the BOOK CONCERN would be divided proportionately, conferences and churches should decide to which branch they would adhere, and neither body would continue or organize work in areas which adhered to the other. All this was mutually and amicably agreed upon.

Under the Plan of Separation the Southern Conferences elected delegates to a Convention which met at Louisville, Ky., and there decided to organize a separate Church. In 1846 the first General Conference of the M.E. Church, South met in PETERSBURG, Va., and held its sessions in a Negro church building, as the Washington Street Church had not been completed. The new Church retained the same law on slavery.

Bishop JOSHUA SOULE of MAINE, who in 1808 had been the author of the CONSTITUTION of the Church, adhered to the South because he believed that the action of the General Conference deposing Andrew broke the Third RESTRICTIVE RULE and was in violation of the Constitution. The Conference of the M.E. Church, South gladly accepted Bishop Soule as bishop, and elected WILLIAM CAPERS of SOUTH CAROLINA and ROBERT PAINE of TENNESSEE to the episcopacy. Further moves of this important conference may be seen in the brief synopsis of its work under GENERAL CONFERENCES.

A change of sentiment occurred in the North, however. The General Conference of the M.E. Church in 1848 repudiated the Plan of Separation, declined to receive LOVICK PIERCE, the fraternal delegate from the Southern Church, and refused to divide the assets of the Book Concern. A long period of estrangement followed and Northern conferences were organized in the South. The Plan of Separation was, however, upheld by the U. S. Supreme Court. In 1876 the CAPE MAY COMMISSION, appointed by both Churches, unanimously declared that both were legitimate branches of Episcopal Methodism and fraternal relations were established.

The M.E. Church, South grew greatly and later established conferences on the West Coast and in the Northwest, which was not a part of the United States at the time of the division. In 1939 there were thirty-four annual conferences with 6,500 pastoral charges and a membership of over 3,000,000. There were organized missions among the Orientals, Indians and Mexicans in the West and Southwest, and these had around 12,000 members. Foreign missions had been established in ten countries, and these had a total membership of approximately 150,000. (See also METHODISM IN THE UNITED STATES.)

METHODIST FEDERATION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE was an unofficial group formed in 1908 within the M. E. Church to work, as its name implies, for social justice in American life. Some extremely able church leaders were among its first organizers, including Bishop F. J. MCCONNELL, Bishop HERBERT WELCH, and others. For the account of its involvement and pronouncements in matters that caused the withdrawal of support from it by the 1952 GENERAL CONFERENCE, see ETHICAL TRADITIONS IN AMERICAN METHODISM.

METHODIST HOMES FOR THE AGED (Br.). Through the initiative of the Rev. Walter Hall, the last twenty years of whose active ministry were spent in the LONDON area, the British Methodist Conference of 1942 founded the Methodist Homes for the Aged. This organization was designed to aid at least a few of the many who retire on fixed incomes of dwindling value because of the rising cost of living, and was in the tradition of JOHN WESLEY's provision of homes for poor widows. Large houses were secured, and subdivided into bed-sitting-rooms for the residents, who share a communal dining room and lounge. Residents must be over sixty-five, and they contribute to the expenses of the Home according to their means. Hall and his successors, the Revs. William Stoaite and Richard J. Connell (the present General Secretary), have been successful in raising money from many sources, mainly in gifts from individuals. The Homes available have increased from three in 1947 to twenty-six in 1969, and others are in the planning stage. One of the earliest residents in the Bognor Home was Mrs. E. Rhein, a descendant of CHARLES WESLEY. There is always a long waiting list of people seeking accommodation. METHODIST INFORMATION (U.S.A.), whose full title is the Commission on Public Relations and Methodist Information of The United Methodist Church, is the official news bureau and public relations office of that Church. It was begun in 1940 at the GENERAL CONFERENCE (TMC) of that year and owes its origin to the Bishops of the Church at the time of the reorganization of their Methodism in 1939. They had observed that social service organizations were establishing strong publicity departments, and that there were successful public relations operations in other religious bodies. Therefore, in their EPISCOPAL ADDRESS to the Uniting Conference, the Bishops, under the heading "An Intelligent Church," said that "Methodism in this great day finds itself with large numbers of communicants and adherents who have little knowledge of its activities, plans, purposes, happenings and movements. They are not, except in the most meager way, methodistically informed. The Church must keep them in touch . . . The greatest modern agencies for taking the messages of this church to its own people and to all people must be called into full action . . . A department of Methodist Intelligence . . . adequate in equipment, capable in management, and vigorous in action will have extraordinary possibilities for the United Church."

This recommendation resulted in the adoption of a report which called for the establishment of a Commission on Public Information. In 1952 the General Conference changed the Commission's name to the present title as given above, but all through the years it has been popularly known by the shortened title—Methodist Information. This has become a familiar trademark in hundreds of newspaper, radio and television offices over our land.

This agency is "to gather news of public interest concerning Methodist activities and opinion, and disseminate it through the secular press, the religious press, radio, television and other legitimate media of public information." (Discipline, 1964, ¶ 1586) It is also charged with certain responsibilities for training in church public relations. Successive Disciplines carry full details and directions concerning the Commission's work.

The top executive officer of Methodist Information for the first six quadrennia of its existence (twenty-four years) was Dr. RALPH STOOBY of NEW YORK. He retired in 1964. An annual fellowship of $3,000 for graduate study in religious journalism has been provided by the Commission to honor Dr. Stoozy, and to help perpetuate the high standards epitomized by him.

The Headquarters office was maintained during its first years in New York. Following the reorganization of the Commission on Public Relations and Methodist Information in 1968 in The United Methodist Church, the Headquarters office was moved to DAYTON, Ohio. The decision to establish a new headquarters office in Dayton was based on that city's more central location with reference to the church constituency and other general offices; and the fact that Dayton had been the location of the administrative offices of the former E.U.B. Church. Other national-level offices are maintained in cities where the principal boards and agencies are located: at NEW YORK CITY, NASHVILLE, Tenn.; EVANSTON, Ill.; and WASHINGTON, D. C.

Affiliated with the national offices is a network of some thirty-five area offices of Methodist Information. While these offices are autonomous and answerable to the bishop and governing commissions in their respective episcopal areas, they do cooperate with the general office of Methodist Information, and many of them were established with the help of modest grants-in-aid from the national office.

Methodist Information nationally is governed by a twelve man commission, nominated by the Council of Bishops and elected by the General Conference. The current chairman of the commission is Bishop EUGENE M. FRANK of ST. LOUIS.

Dr. ARTHUR WEST in the Dayton Headquarters office is the present general secretary of the commission.

METHODIST LAY PREACHERS' ASSOCIATION (New Zealand) is an organization recognized by the Conference, its duties being to foster the interests of lay preachers, until recently known as "local" preachers. Control is vested in an elected executive, with branches in each synodical district. All lay preachers who have been granted full status by their quarterly meetings are members of the association.

This association was formed in 1921, but before that time the Local Preachers' Mutual Aid Association served the needs of preachers in all branches of Methodism. While much of the work of the executive is of necessity administrative, the chief aim, both at national and district levels, is the improvement in the standard of preaching by lay men and women.

Accredited status is granted by quarterly meetings when a candidate has been successful in written and oral examinations, and has shown satisfactory ability in the conduct of public worship. Since 1922 the written examinations have been conducted by the board of examiners of the New Zealand church. However, schemes of study and written examinations were earlier approved through the Mutual Aid Association, and were operated from 1908 on behalf of the Wesleyan and Primitive Methodist churches.

The lay preacher has played an effective part in the work of church extension since the early settlement days of this country. In place after place they have prepared the way in the organization of societies before the appointment of a local minister. Experienced preachers from England were to be found in the work of evangelism in all the main settlements of the 1840-50 era. Even in the church settlements of Canterbury and Otago, Methodist local preachers were among the settlers arriving on the first immigrant ships. Again they were to be found in the military establishments during the Maori Wars.

The gold rushes of the 1860's brought to New Zealand an influx of men of all classes of life seeking fortunes from the icy waters of high-country gullies—gold! Among them were many who had already found that which is of more value than gold, and soon local preachers were given the Christian message in hastily erected tent churches in the many mining settlements. Their evangelistic fire prepared the way for the ministers who were later appointed to work in these difficult fields.

The early days were times of many small and scattered settlements. With the turn of the century came the breaking up of the large land holdings, and with this the number of small settlements greatly increased. This was the day when the "circuit buggy" carried the preachers far and wide over unpaved roads with mud and potholes in abundance. The "clip-clop" of the horse and buggy was a familiar sound to settlers in a hundred townships as the "local" traveled about to preach the Word of God.

Increasing industrialization and city growth, combined with modern transport, have reduced somewhat the demand on the services of lay preachers. However, in the true spirit of Methodism new doors are opening, and the lay preacher still finds large fields in which to serve.

METHODIST MEN'S FELLOWSHIP, official association of Methodist laymen in New Zealand, was formed in 1931 with the idea of enlisting the cooperation of the men of Methodism in the promotion of the work of the church at home and abroad in the spiritual, mental, and social aspects of Christian living. Branches have been formed in many circuits, and where the movement is strong, district executives have been set up. At the head of the organization is the national executive, which carries out the policy of the movement as decided at the annual meeting held during the Church Conference.

In recent years, the movement has placed emphasis on the provision of a wide variety of resource materials and ideas to prepare for the tasks confronting the men of the church.

METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY. Origins. THOMAS COKE was the impassioned visionary first responsible for British Methodist missionary work. In 1784 he published A Plan of the Society for the Establishment of Missions amongst the Heathen, and followed this in 1786 with a financial appeal, An Address to the Pious and Benevolent. WESLEY, sharply critical because he felt British Methodism to be already overstrained, gave Coke his support from the 1787 Conference. On Christmas Day, 1786, on the way to America with the preachers, Coke had landed at St. John's, ANTIGUA. Here he found a thousand Negro slaves gathered for worship, shepherded by JOHN BAXTER, a shipwright, who had continued the work of preaching to slaves begun in 1760 by NATHANIEL GILBERT on his own plantation. Coke left the three preachers in the WEST INDIES, and WILLIAM WARRENER was officially stationed at Antigua in 1787. Coke poured time and money into the West Indies circuits; and despite bitter persecution, the work grew steadily throughout the islands.

Coke's plea for a mission to Africa and the East met unyielding opposition until 1813, when at the Liverpool Conference he offered £6,000, the remainder of his fortune, for its establishment. The mood of Methodism was changing. Suspicion of Coke had given away to affection. GEORGE WARREN had already been appointed to SIERRA LEONE in 1811—the first missionary outside the West Indies and the colonies. JABEZ BUNTING founded the first District Missionary Society at LEEDS in October, 1813, and other districts quickly followed suit. Coke finally sailed for CEYLON on Dec. 31, 1813, with seven other volunteers. On May 3, 1814, he died on the Indian Ocean and was buried at sea.

Advance and Withdrawal to the Mid-Nineteenth Century. An era of spectacular advance followed Coke's death. In 1816 the Missionary Committee was formally constituted by the Wesleyan Conference—all noncolonial missionary work was done by the Wesleys until the 1850's. Within ten years almost all British Methodism's main fields were entered. In the West Indies membership leapt to twenty thousand in 1820, and was over forty thousand by 1840. Warren died within a year of landing in Sierra Leone; but although the "White Man's Grave" claimed 110 missionaries of all denominations in thirty years, volunteers were always ready to fill the gaps. GAMBIA was occupied. JOSEPH DUNWELL went to the Cape Coast, followed by THOMAS BIRCH FREEMAN, who pioneered into Ashanti and pressed on to DAHOMEY. In 1816 BARNABAS SHAW went to Cape Colony, and a year or so later began to open up the hinterland, with WILLIAM SHAW. JAMES LYNCH moved from Ceylon to INDIA in 1817. In 1815 SAMUEL LEIGH was sent to AUSTRALIA and then, in 1822, to NEW ZEALAND. In the same year WALTER LAWRY landed in TONGA, and soon afterward, NATHANIEL TURNER, DAVID CARGILL, WILLIAM CROSS, JOHN HUNT, and others began preaching in SAMOA and FIJI.

In Europe, CHARLES COOK began his work in FRANCE in 1821, and British Methodist missions were established in GERMANY, SWEDEN, GILBRALTAR, Malta, the Ionian Islands, Palestine, and Alexandria.

But by the middle of the century the apparently glorious picture had completely changed. In 1840 the Canadian Conference was constituted, and in 1855 the new Australasian Conference took over responsibility for the South Seas. Even so, the Wesleyan society could not meet all the needs that were left. Too much had been attempted too quickly, and withdrawals were inevitable. In Europe only France and a small society at Wurtemberg remained. That too much attention had been given to making converts and too little to training them had resulted in a sharp membership decline in the West Indies. A natural response to such existing areas as Ashanti and the South Seas had left harder fields, such as India and Ceylon, almost unmissioned. Missionaries were frustrated by the lack of financial support and new recruits, even when prospects were at their brightest; and in Africa, Thomas Birch Freeman withdrew from the ministry for some years. Financial stringency was inevitable. British Methodism, already sadly divided for almost half a century, was stricken once more. At a time when missionary work needed full support, the Wesleys lost a hundred thousand members as a result of the FLY SHEETS agitation against clerical autocracy. Many of these united to form the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES in 1857. The midcentury was a time for "rethinking missions." Priorities, strategy, motive, and approach all had to be reconsidered.

New Beginnings. By the Jubilee of the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society in 1863, it was clear that despite failures much had been achieved. More careful attention was given to pastoral care, as well as evangelism, in the West Indies. West Africa had ten thousand members. Though only two were found in Ashanti, human sacrifice there was fast disappearing. The last cannibal feast had already been held in Fiji. France, like CANADA and AUSTRALASIA, had its own Conference. Income began to rise again, augmented by the "Children's Offerings" (later to be known as the Juvenile Missionary Association) begun in 1841. Haphazard response to any call for help was giving way to planned advance. In India and Ceylon a more genuine encounter with the historic Eastern faiths was taking place; and though the Madras and Mysore districts had less than four hundred members between them, a real advance had been made through the establishment of high schools and later primary schools for boys. New missionary societies, agencies, and fields were a feature of the second half of the nineteenth century.

1) New Societies. Up to this period the non-Wesleyan societies had missioned only in the colonies. The PRIMITIVE METHODISTS had sent missionaries to the United States and Canada as early as 1829, and others in 1844 to Australia and New Zealand. John Addyman had gone to Canada for the METHODIST NEW CONNECTION. THE BIBLE CHRISTIANS had workers in Canada and Australia, and the United Methodist Free Churches sent men to Australia and New Zealand as soon as their Conference was formed in 1857. From the midcentury they took their share in full missionary work. (a) The United Methodist Free Churches undertook some work in Sierra Leone in 1859; responded to appeals from J. Lewis Krapf, a German explorer, and sent men to KENYA in 1862; and in 1864 began Chinese work at Ningpo which soon extended to Wenchow. (b) The Methodist New Connexion also turned to CHINA (Tientsin) in 1859. (c) Primitive Methodists concentrated on Africa. R. W. Burnett and Henry Roe went to Fernando Po in 1870, and it later became the springboard for the Mendeland Mission in Sierra Leone. In the same year Henry Buckenham began work at Aliwal North, in SOUTH AFRICA. (d) The last in the field, the Bible Christians, began work at Yunnan in 1844—a hard ground until the Miao “mass movement” in SAMUEL POLLARD’S time.

2) New Fields. Wesleyans, after so many withdrawals in Europe, were hesitant to enter China when it was opened to Western influence. The first missionary, GEORGE PIERCY, was a layman who paid his own charges in 1851. The Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society appointed JOSIAH COX to Hankow in 1853. All the other societies, except the Primitive Methodists, quickly followed (see above). The last field entered was BURMA, in 1881, where a chaplain began work among the Buddhists. The Wesleyan Missionary Society had stationed ministers in ITALY, SPAIN and PORTUGAL in the 1860s.

Though women had worked alongside their husbands from the beginning, it was not until 1858 that the Wesleyans set up “The Ladies’ Committee for the Amelioration of the Condition of Women in Heathen Countries.” From this essentially Victorian beginning has grown Women’s Work. Though the first women missionaries were regarded as freak products of the missionary movement, it soon became clear that they were essential to the missionary effort, especially among women and children. They served at first as evangelists and teachers, later as nurses and doctors, and later still in many kinds of “social” work.

3) Medical Work. Dr. Porter Smith was the first medical missionary on his appointment to Hankow in 1864. “Healing” was soon seen to be an essential means of evangelism, at first especially in China and then in India. African medical work was aided by the WESLEY GUILD, which first undertook work in Ilesha, sending Dr. Stephens in 1912. The first Leper Home was opened in Mandalay in 1898, and early leprosy work owes much to Dr. Isobel Kerr, who went with her husband to Hyderabad in 1907.

Twentieth Century Developments. All the societies have faced the same kind of problems in this period. Methodist UNION came easily in 1932 to societies already much accustomed to consultation, especially as few of their fields overlapped. Women’s work was integrated into the new Methodist Missionary Society at this period. Established means of evangelism—preaching, village tours, colportage—have continued, and so, to less degree, have pioneering efforts, notably in Northern Burma, the Zambesi area, and under EPHRAIM ALPHONSE in British Guiana. Education has been basic to the work, and many leaders in church and nation have come from mission schools. State control has tightened in India and Ceylon, where specifically Christian education has become less possible. In Africa south of the Sahara the church still makes the major contribution to education through schools or personnel, but there is much leeway in girls’ higher education. General medical work has grown rapidly in scope, influence, and experiment. Growing literacy emphasizes the need for Christian literature, and such established printing presses as that at Mysore and bookshops as in Accra help to meet this. So do Methodist writers on the field, who normally write for a larger-than-Methodist constituency. Social and “reconstruction” work is widely undertaken, and lately this has been considerably helped by the cooperation of the Methodist Relief Fund and the Methodist-inspired Fund for Human Need. Typical examples are HONG KONG housing for refugees, famine relief in South India, flood relief in Kenya and Bengal, and the Rastafarian project in Jamaica. Orphanages have long been part of Methodist missionary effort.

It is impossible to give comparative figures of membership during this period owing to (1) the withdrawal from China; (2) the integration of Methodism into united churches, such as the EGLISE RÉFORMÉE in France (1940), and the Church of South India (1947). In the earlier part of the century, membership was greatly increased through the phenomenon of mass movements—in the Gold Coast, in Southwest China under Samuel Pollard and F. J. DYMOND, in Hyderabad under CHARLES POSNETT, and in the Ivory Coast through “Prophet” WILLIAM HARRIS—in which whole villages and tribes asked for baptism. The danger was that so broad a stream rushing into the church could not but be shallow in experience and training. Adequate manpower remained the great need.

The main developments have stemmed from the transition from mission to church. The missionary has ceased to be the accepted leader in most fields, but is accepted as the colleague of national workers. This has been the aim of missionary work at its best, but it has been accentuated by nationalist movements, with their emphasis on the value of the indigenous. Architecture, music, forms of worship, the expression of the faith must be more and more in national terms. Administrative leadership in this situation passes naturally to indigenous nationals. One difficulty for the church arises because extreme nationalists have suspected that “colonial” interests may still affect the church. In financial affairs most of the Missionary Society budget is spent on the support of missionaries and their work; but though many districts have long been self-supporting (e.g., GHANA, Ceylon, the West Indies), other low-income areas (e.g., South India) still need support. In “advance projects” and missionary activity undertaken by overseas districts and conferences, the Missionary Society shares fully, but “plant” and “property” appeals can seldom be adequately met.

Full cooperation between overseas churches and the home base is now normal, but recent examples are the “Skegness Conference” (1961), at which representatives of all Methodist districts and churches overseas met with Missionary Society officers; and the appointment of the first non-European field secretary at Missionary Society headquarters.

The transition from mission to church is seen most fully in the inauguration of new conferences in Ghana (1961), NIGERIA (1962), Italy (1962), and Ceylon (1964). These conferences are fully autonomous, but maintain links, through both missionary personnel and official representation, with the British Conference.

Official cooperation with other churches has been part of missionary policy since the Edinburgh Conference of 1910. The Missionary Society has been a major partner in the Conference of British Missionary Societies. Overseas it has participated in united medical work (e.g., Vellore, South India), united schemes of evangelism (e.g., Cooper Belt Mission, Northern RHODESIA), and joint theological training (e.g., Bangalore, South India; Caenwood, Jamaica; and Nigeria).

The outstanding example of cooperation leading to actual church union is, of course, the Church of South India (1947), which included a quarter of a million Methodists, and in which over a hundred Missionary Society missionaries are still at work.

The Methodist Missionary Society today is regarded as the Overseas Missions Department of the Methodist Church in Great Britain, but at the same time it is the partner in mission of the autonomous conferences born of its labors. At the headquarters the officers are responsible individually for the care of the four zones: (1) the United Kingdom, (2) Asia, (3) the Western Area, and (4) Africa, while one officer is responsible for coordination across the zones. A great deal of attention has to be given to the ecumenical relationships which are developing rapidly in all parts of the world.

The present financial commitment of the society is above £1,000,000 annually in home income. With grants from governments and other overseas income, the total annual expenditure never falls below £4,000,000 (1963).

Women's Work. Prior to Methodist Union in Britain (1932) each denomination had its own women's society for the support of missionary work and the provision of women missionaries. These were Wesleyan Methodist Women's Auxiliary (founded 1858); Bible Christian Women's Missionary League (1892); Ladies Missionary Association of the United Methodist Free Churches (1897); the Methodist New Connexion Ladies Missionary Association (1899); and the Primitive Methodist Women's Federation (1909). In 1834, David Abeel, an American missionary invalided home from China, began a "Society for the Promotion of Female Education in the East." Suitable women who applied were recommended as "helpers" to missionaries unable to tackle zenana work themselves. Mary Twiddy, sent by this society to Ceylon in 1840 and then to India, urged the need of a more official Methodist approach which would give women "helpers" a proper status and gain greater support for work which they alone could do. As a result there was formed on Dec. 20, 1858, with fifteen members, "The Ladies Committee for the Amelioration of the Condition of Women in Heathen Countries, Female Education, etc." Its task was to select, train, and station women missionaries, mostly teachers, and to raise money for their support. In an age when women's place was in the home, early attitudes were critical and financial support comparatively slight, but within fifteen years twenty-one women were appointed. Early appointments were haphazard, in response to calls for help. Policy needed to be developed, financial support increased, and closer links made with the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society. In 1874 Mrs. LUKE WISEMAN joined the committee, providing the leadership and insight needed for these changes for almost forty years. At her death in 1912 the early patronizing title had been changed to the Women's Auxiliary; the Girl's League had been started in 1908; ninety-three women missionaries were overseas, many of them in medical work. The other Methodist organizations were set up on similar lines, benefiting from the longer Wesleyan experience. At Union, in 1932, the various auxiliaries took the name of "Women's Work," and though it has three General Secretaries and its own committees at every level, it is an integral part of the Methodist Missionary Society. In 1965 there were about two hundred women missionaries. (See MISSIONS, AND ORGANIZED METHODIST MISSIONARY WORK for American missionary history.)

CYRIL J. DAVEY

METHODIST NEW CONNEXION was a British Methodist denomination which was started in 1797 and which finally became part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH in 1907. The founders were WILLIAM THOM and ALEXANDER KILHAM; and their earliest followers were Wesleyan Methodists, chiefly from cities in the north of England in the industrial areas. They withdrew from the old connection because after JOHN WESLEY's death in 1791 the Wesleyan Conference was unwilling to grant to the laity the right to choose their own class leaders, to decide who should become and who should cease to be a member of society, and to send their own elected representatives to the annual conference to decide all business in conjunction with the itinerant ministers.

The New Connexion also thought that Methodism should unite with the nonconformist churches rather than with the Anglican Establishment. About 5,000 Wesleyans seceded in 1797; by 1815 there were about 8,000 members; the connection did not grow very rapidly, and in 1907 the membership was 37,000. The first New Connexion Conference was held at LEEDS in 1797, when William Thom was chosen president; the second, at SHEFFIELD in 1798, adopted a constitution which treated the laity and the ministry as equally responsible for church government; this included lay representation in the Annual Conference, which Wesleyan Methodism did not accept until 1877.

One of the most famous early ministers was RICHARD WATSON, the theologian, who served as a New Connexion minister from 1803 to 1811, when he returned to the Wesleyan connection. In the first half of the nineteenth century leadership was provided by THOMAS ALLIN (1784-1866), but the course of the New Connexion was deflected by the career of JOSEPH BARKER, whose gradual retreat from orthodoxy into Chartist politics caused the loss of about 4,000 members when he was expelled from the ministry in 1841. The litigation which followed these withdrawals led to the legal embodiment of the New Connexion by a Deed Poll signed by all the members of the Conference of 1846; this provided for the septennial revision of the constitution by the Conference with the approval of the circuits; a Model Trust Deed was also drawn up; and District Meetings, in which the laity were represented as well as the itinerancy, had been started in 1844.

The New Connexion seemed fated not to retain its most unusual servants: "General" WILLIAM BOOTH had joined the WESLEYAN REFORMERS in 1851; he became a hired preacher in 1852; he was dissatisfied with the chaotic state of the new body, however, and so became a New Connexion probationer minister in 1854. He was actually ordained in 1858. It was during his ministry at Gateshead (1858-61) that his wife Catherine began to speak in public. Booth, however, was unwilling to be restricted to the work of a single circuit, and in 1861 he resigned, becoming an independent revivalist.

In 1862-64 the New Connexion established a theological college at Ranmoor, Sheffield, which was used until the First World War and then sold in 1919. It was in 1860 that John Innocent and W. N. HALL arrived in CHINA to start a mission; Innocent lived to be president of the Centenary Conference held in Sheffield in 1897. Between 1837 and 1874 the New Connexion established a Canadian Mission, which had about 8,000 members when it united with other Methodist bodies and ceased a separate existence. In England, however, the New Connexion did not grow tremendously; after the Wesleyan schism of 1849, the reforming impetus was taken up by the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES, whose members were not attracted by the New Connexion—they wanted a still looser constitution and a more revivalistic style of piety. As late as 1889 negotiations between the New Connexion and the United Methodist Free Churches broke down completely over the status of the circuit minister, which the New Connexion felt was insufficiently guarded by the proposals for a union.

The negotiations which led to the union of 1907 may be traced back to the third ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE, which met in LONDON in 1901. The negotiations which followed this brought an approach to the New Connexion from the Wesleyan Methodist Church. The New Connexion Conference of 1905, however, rejected the Wesleyan approach and united with the Bible Christians and the United Methodist Free Churches in 1907. At that time the New Connexion had 37,000 members, 204 ministers, 1,123 local preachers, and nearly 88,000 Sunday school scholars.

METHODIST PROTESTANT, THE. (See METHODIST PROTESTANT-RECORDER.)

METHODIST PROTESTANT CHILDREN'S HOME (1910-1941), located first at Denton, N. C., U.S.A., and after August 1913, at High Point, N. C., was established by the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the NORTH CAROLINA ANNUAL CONFERENCE and was the only denominational orphanage of the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH. Mrs. W. C. (MINNIE LEE HANCOCK) HAMMER recommended the establishment of a children's home in a presidential address in May 1910, and the Rev. G. L. Reynolds, who became interested in the project, offered an old, discarded school building located on the M.P. Church property in Denton. The Methodist Protestant Children's Home was opened on Aug. 22, 1910. Mrs. R. S. (Mabel Williams) Russell, who served as the first matron. Mrs. J. W. (ETTA AUMAN) Austin, and Mrs. Fannie Page operated the home until it was removed to HIGH POINT.

ARMINIUS C. DIXON took an active role in having the home established in High Point (considered to be a more central location), and J. R. Reitzel, A. M. Rankin, George T. Penny and W. P. Pickett gave financial assistance toward making the move. A thirty-eight-acre farm was purchased from Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Welch near High Point and both Mr. and Mrs. Welch gave substantial gifts on the price of the land. Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Garrett became superintendents of the home on Aug. 1, 1913, and upon their resignation in 1924 the property was valued at more than $200,000. Rev. and Mrs. E. G. Lowdermilk and Dr. and Mrs. E. F. Allman supervised the home prior to 1928 when Dr. Dixon and his wife, MARGARET MINERVA KUHN DIXON took charge. There were seventy-two children in the home at this time.

The Children's Home made steady progress throughout its existence and received the cooperation and support of the North Carolina Conference, to whom the property was deeded, and in 1912 it was endorsed by the GENERAL CONFERENCE from which it also received annual financial assistance. The Sunday Schools of the North Carolina Conference donated approximately fifty percent of the home's operational costs and additional funds came from the DUKE ENDOWMENT, private gifts and the women of the North Carolina Branch of the Home Missionary Society.

In 1939 the property was valued at approximately $350,000, and there were some 115 children being cared for in the home. Following the unification of the M.P. Church, the M.E. Church and the M.E. Church, South, the Children's Home was closed in 1941.

METHODIST PROTESTANT CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR UNION (1892-1939), the official youth organization of the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH, assisted local churches in training young people "to conduct meetings, lead public prayers, make addresses, do Christian service, give systematically and develop their spiritual natures in private meditation, prayer and Bible study." The organization was an affiliate of the Interdenominational Union of the Christian Endeavor. The GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.P. Church of 1892 recognized young people's societies as a general agency of the church and at a meeting held in Trinity Church, Brooklyn, in July 1892, the Methodist Protestant Christian Endeavor Union was established. At the General Conference of 1908, a Board of Young People's Work was formally established to promote the religious education program of the M.P. Church through the expansion of Sunday schools and Christian Endeavor societies. CHARLES H. HUBBELL served for seven years as the first General Secretary of the Board and traveled throughout the various M.P. conferences enlisting and training young people for more efficient church service. Upon his death, HARLAN L. FEEMAN was appointed his successor and in 1917, when Feeman became the President of ADRIAN COLLEGE, A. C. DIXON became Secretary. Under the leadership of E. A. Sexsmith, who succeeded Dixon, a leadership training program of summer conferences, institutes and schools of methods was inaugurated. Sexsmith was followed by Lawrence Little. The Board of Young People's Work directed the religious educational program not only of the Christian Endeavor Societies but of Sunday schools, vacation church schools, week-day schools of religion, leadership training schools, institutes and summer conferences, conventions, vocational guidance and various other phases of the children, young people and adult's work. Free organizing literature for Christian Endeavor Societies was furnished by the Board. The individual societies were organized on the senior, intermediate and junior levels and used The Christian Endeavor World and The Junior Work (a monthly publication), published by the United Society in Boston, Mass. John F. Cowan, an active M.P. editor, founded Our Young People, which became the official organ of the Christian Endeavor Societies until it was discontinued. The New Guide (originally known as Our Morning Guide) was oriented toward both Sunday school and Christian Endeavor constituency.

METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH. A major division of Methodism which united in 1939 with the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South to form The Methodist Church.

Beginnings. The Methodist Protestant Church was organized in BALTIMORE, Md., 1830, as a result of dissatisfaction with the episcopacy and the lack of lay representation in the conferences of the M.E. Church. Such dissatisfaction had existed for some time. It was part of the American thinking following the Revolution. One of the "Reformers," ALEXANDER McCAINE, wrote a preamble to his History and Mystery of Methodist Episcopacy which was very much like the opening words of the Declaration of Independence. THOMAS HAMILTON LEWIS, in a fraternal message to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church in 1908, spoke of the inherent differences within Methodism as exemplified by FRANCIS ASBURY and NICHOLAS SNETHEN. "They represented two principles of government radically different . . . Asbury believed that men must be ruled, Snethen that they might be developed to rule themselves . . . Snethen laid the ax to the root of the tree of ecclesiastical absolutism by the simple expedient of giving unofficial Methodism the right to vote."

In 1816, and again in 1820, there was attempt to make the presiding eldership elective. A resolution to that effect was passed by the General Conference of 1820 by vote of 65-25, and in the same session it was suspended for four years by vote of 45-35. The following General Conference, 1824, it was declared that the resolution providing for election of presiding elders was void because it had not been sustained by a majority of the annual conferences. The mounting suspicions of the Reformers became convictions, that episcopal power had worked behind the scenes to defeat the will of the General Conference.

On the failure of this piece of legislation, a prominent layman, WILLIAM S. STOCKTON, began publication of a paper called the Wesleyan Repository at Trenton, N. J., for the promotion of the ideas of the Reformers. Its utterances were aggressive and radical, but since the official Methodist Magazine had announced that it would publish no articles on controversial subjects, the Repository gained wide circulation.

A petition for a change in the form of Methodist government was sent to the General Conference in 1824, and when it was rejected, a convention of the Reformers was held. This group established a periodical called the Mutual Rights of the Ministers and Members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, to succeed the Wesleyan Repository, and took steps to organize societies throughout the country. In an attempt to suppress this movement, the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE expelled DENNIS B. DORSEY, W. C. POOL, and thirty-three others "for spreading incendiary publications." A test case was made in the appeal of

TITLE PAGE, FIRST DISCIPLINE

Dorsey and Pool to the General Conference of 1828, which appeal was denied.

Prior to 1828 the expelled members and others formed a society known as "Associate Methodist Reformers," and two years later at the 1830 convention adopted a Constitution and Discipline and took the name Methodist Protestant Church. In doctrine it did not depart from accepted Methodist standards, but it eliminated episcopacy and the presiding eldership, and admitted laymen to both annual and general conferences. Each annual conference had a president and there was also by election a president of the general conference. The appointment of ministers was generally made by a "Stationing Committee," made up of ministers and laymen, though very significantly, in the MARYLAND CONFERENCE, the appointments were made by the president, just as they were by the bishop in the M.E. Church.

Development. The first General Conference of the M.P. Church met in Georgetown, D.C., May 6, 1834. Nicholas Snethen was elected president. There were representatives from thirteen conferences which reported a membership of 26,587, not including ministers. The outstanding ministerial leaders of the church were Alexander McCaïne, ASA SHINN, Nicholas Snethen, Dr. SAMUEL K. JENNINGS, GEORGE BROWN, Cornelius Springer, John French, William C. Lipscomb. Lay leaders of note were John Chappell, Thomas McKeever, Spier Whitaker, PHILEMON B. HOPPER, and William S. Stockton. THOMAS H. STOCKTON, son of William, was one of the eloquent preachers of his day. He served as Chaplain of the House of Representatives in Congress and made the dedicatory prayer at Gettysburg at the time of Lincoln's famous address. The quality of this leadership was attested by ABEL STEVENS when he spoke of them as "men whose character, talents and prestige . . . rendered their loss to the parent church a deplorable misfortune."

The reform movement had begun by the publication of its principles in the Wesleyan Repository and the Mutual Rights. Considerable literary ability had been shown in promoting the cause of reform. The young church saw the need of continuing publication. The Methodist Correspondent appeared in CINCINNATI in 1830, with Moses M. Henkle as editor, and among its distinguished contributors were Asa Shinn, Nicholas Snethen, and Cornelius Springer. The Mutual Rights and Methodist Protestant, of Baltimore, shortened its title and as the Methodist Protestant became the official organ of the church in the East. At the General Conference of 1834 a stock company was organized to establish a Book Concern, which was incorporated by the General Assembly of Maryland in 1835. In 1854 there was a division, and the Western Methodist Protestant Book Concern was set up at Springfield, Ohio, and with it the publication of the Western Methodist Protestant.

The church launched out on an educational venture almost from the start. Nicholas Snethen migrated to the West and started Dearborn College at Lawrenceburg, Ind. It was an unfortunate enterprise, for the buildings were destroyed by fire in 1839 and never rebuilt. The MICHIGAN CONFERENCE took steps to establish the Michigan Literary Institute at Leoni, Mich., in 1847, but before buildings could be built the movement was absorbed by ADRIAN COLLEGE, a Congregational institution at Adrian, Mich., which in turn was taken over by the M.P. Church at the General Conference of 1862. MADISON COLLEGE, at Uniontown, Pa., came over to the M.P. Church in 1849, but never prospered, due to North-South factions within student body and faculty. It was closed in 1855, with faculty and students transferring to Lynchburg College, Virginia. WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE was organized at Westminster, Md., in 1867, taking over the location of the Buell Academy, and has had an immensely successful career.

The General Conference of 1834 set up a Board of missions, with Dr. Samuel K. Jennings as president. The first missionaries were sent to the western part of the United States, principally to Oregon. In 1836 a Negro minister from Maryland, David James, was appointed superintendent of a mission at Cape Palmas, Africa, but the venture seems to have been a failure, since no further notice was given to it.

Division. Even while the M.E. Church was involved in the controversy over lay representation, the slavery question was also troubling the church. After the separation of episcopal Methodism in 1844, the M.P. Church continued the debate. In the eastern part of the church Alexander McCaine of Maryland was writing tracts in support of slavery while Asa Shinn of the Pittsburgh-Ohio area was opposing it. The Cincinnati Convention of 1857 prepared an anti-slavery memorial for the General Conference which met in Lynchburg, Va., May, 1858. The memorial was not adopted, a resolution declaring that the General Conference should never legislate on questions of morality taking its place.

A "General Convention of Delegates from the Northern and Western Conferences of the Methodist Protestant Church" was held in Springfield, Ohio, November 1858, to which delegates from nineteen conferences had been elected. The action of the Convention was to dissolve relations with such conferences which practiced or tolerated slave-holding, "until the evil of slavery complained of be removed." In 1862 the "General Convention of the Methodist Protestant Church" met in Cincinnati. In 1871 the "Second General Conference of the Methodist Church (formerly Methodist Protestant)" was held in Pittsburgh. Under the same name the General Conference met in Princeton, Ill., May 1875, and adopted a report on "Methodistic Union," naming commissioners to meet with like commissioners of the M.P. Church. The Civil War being over and the slavery issue settled, the two divisions, North and South, met in Baltimore, May 11, 1877, and the M.P. Church was re-united, "inasmuch as the cause for suspension of official relations . . . is now entirely removed by the providence of God."

Maturity. The last General Conference of the M.P. Church before uniting with the two Episcopal bodies was held in High Point, N. C., May 20, 1936. It had as president JAMES H. STRAUGHN of Maryland, and as secretary, C. W. BATES, of North Carolina. The Board of Missions, organized in 1834, had now expanded to include both Home and Foreign boards, and had incorporated the WOMEN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY. The Board was carrying on missions in JAPAN, CHINA, and INDIA. The Board of Christian Education had two divisions: (1) Educational Institutions, promoting Adrian College, Adrian, Mich.; High Point College, High Point, N. C.; Western Maryland College, Westminster, Md.; Westminster College, Tehuacana, Texas; and the Westminster Theological Seminary, Westminster, Md.; (2) Division of Religious Education, promoting the work of Church Schools and continuing the activities of the former Board of Young People's Work.

In 1929 the Methodist Recorder, published in Pittsburgh and successor to the Methodist Correspondent and the Western Recorder, was merged with the Methodist Protestant, of Baltimore, to form the Methodist Protestant-Recorder, thus in a way bringing together the Western and Eastern sections of the church. However, the church still maintained two Book Directories, one in Pittsburgh, one in Baltimore.

The General Conference of 1936 reported a total membership of 191,863 for the M.P. Church. The Maryland Conference, with 35,758 members, had not only been at the center in founding of the denomination, but at the forefront throughout its history. But the phenomenal growth of which EDWARD J. DRINKHOUSE frequently spoke was not maintained. The General Conference of 1877 reported 169,405 members and there was a wave of enthusiasm over the union of slavery and anti-slavery factions. It was proclaimed that the church had entered upon a "tide of prosperity unexcelled in the history of denominations." But the gains were not remarkable from 1877 to 1936. The original cause of separation from the M.E. Church had been resolved. The M.P. Church had become another Methodist Church.

Union of Methodism. The General Conference of 1908, held in Pittsburgh, appointed its president, Thomas Hamilton Lewis, together with A. L. Reynolds and J. W. HERING, as fraternal delegates to the M.E. General Conference meeting in Baltimore. Lewis was chairman of the Commission on Union of the M.P. Church, and in a memorable address to the General Conference he made a long remembered plea for the union of divided Methodism. His telling argument was that the M.P. Church was a child separated from divorced parents and wanted to come back to a united home. Tremendous applause was reported and the high inspiration of the occasion was carried through the years. At the General Conference of the M.P. Church in 1936 a PLAN OF UNION was approved. The church set about securing ratification of the Plan among its annual conferences. The President of the General Conference, James H. Straughn, played a very significant part in this work of ratification of the Plan.

At the UNITING CONFERENCE, held in KANSAS CITY, 1939, the M.P. Church by vote of its delegates elected as bishops of The Methodist Church, James Henry Straughn and JOHN CALVIN BROOMFIELD. The matter of lay representation had been settled years before in the Episcopal branches of Methodism and it was now demonstrated that the episcopacy was no longer a stumbling block. The controversy of the Reformers was ended. Bishop JOHN M. MOORE, when presiding, spoke facetiously and suggestive words when he presented Bishop-elect Straughn to the Uniting Conference: "Once a totalitarian leader and now a colleague in the ranks of benevolent democracy." (See also METHODISM IN THE UNITED STATES.)

Centennial. The M.P. Church observed its Centennial Anniversary in Baltimore, Md., May 16-17, 1928. The celebration was held in connection with the twenty-fifth quadrennial General Conference of the church. The conference sessions were conducted in St. John's M.P. Church and at the Lyric Theater, and were attended by some 3,000 persons, the largest number of Methodist Protestants ever to gather in one place in the history of the denomination.

The program was prepared by a committee appointed by the 1924 General Conference. President Thomas H. Lewis served as chairman; he was assisted by the presidents of seven annual conferences. A 300-member chorus organized by E. D. Stone, pastor of Hampden Church, Baltimore, provided special music for the celebration. Young ladies representing twenty-four annual conferences presented the offerings for the "Centennial Gratitude Gift" which amounted to more than $100,000. James H. Straughn directed the promotion for the Gratitude Gift. LYMAN EDWIN DAVIS wrote a special "Centennial Hymn." President Lewis presented an "Address of Salutation," and representatives of the Protestant Episcopal Church, the Presbyterian Church, the M.E. Church, and the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES brought greetings. Addresses were delivered by HUGH LATIMER ELDERDICE, HARLAN L. FEEMAN, CUTHBERT W. BATES, FRANK T. BENSON, and John C. Broomfield.

The Centennial Anniversary was preceded by a five-day M.P. Centennial Young People's Convention which used the theme, "Christ Preeminent." Several denominational leaders, including A. G. DIXON, FRANK W. STEPHENSON, and Robert M. Andrews, addressed the young people. A special "Centennial Edition" of The Methodist Protestant was published May 16, 1928.

Memorial Collection. The M.P. Church Memorial Collection was established in 1963 at NORTH CAROLINA WESLEYAN COLLEGE, Rocky Mount, N. C., by a number of friends and members of the former M.P. Church who were interested in the preservation of research materials connected with that branch of Methodism. The collection includes a wide assortment of books, bulletins, pamphlets, newspaper articles, and varied other memorabilia. There are portions of the private libraries of several distinguished members of the North Carolina Conference of the M.P. Church, including J. F. DOSIER, JOHN F. SPEICHT, N. C. BETHEA, and C. W. BATES. There are a number of religious treatises and denominational publications of significance.

All of the published histories of the M.P. Church are in this collection, including: James R. Williams, History of the Methodist Protestant Church (Baltimore, 1843); John Paris, History of the Methodist Protestant Church (Baltimore, 1849); Ansel H. Bassett, A Concise History of the Methodist Protestant Church (Pittsburgh, 1882); J. Elwood Carroll, History of the North Carolina Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church (Greensboro, 1939); Edward J. Drinkhouse, History of Methodist Reform, 2 vols. (Norwood, Mass., 1899). There is a complete file of the Journal of the North Carolina Conference for the years 1894-1939 and miscellaneous copies of the Journal of the General Conference dating back to 1850. Of special interest to historians and rhetoricians are the handwritten copies of several sermons given by John Paris, as well as other personal correspondence and published works of this well known nineteenth-century minister and author. There are also records of the Board of Trustees of the North Carolina Annual Conference of the M.P. Church, and a number of M.P. Disciplines dating from 1834, and hymnals dating from 1851.

Other valuable Methodistica connected specifically with the former M.P. Church may be found in the library at High Point College, at the library of the COMMISSION ON ARCHIVES AND HISTORY, Lake Junaluska, N. C., and at Westminster Theological Seminary.

Washington Conference. This significant gathering was held in Washington, D.C., May 12-15, 1931. It had been called by the Executive Committee of the M.P. Church at a time critical both for the church and the government, and its goal was to strengthen interest in denominational obligations and church activities and to discuss the Christian church and its place in world affairs. The motto of the conference was "Forward Together." Over 2,600 persons, representing a large number of the 2,000 M.P. churches and 200,000 members of the denomination, registered for the conference, which held its sessions in the Memorial Continental Hall of the Daughters of the American Revolution. John Calvin Broomfield, President of the General Conference, gave the opening address. Others who spoke included GEORGE W. HADDADWAY, Mrs. C. W. Bates, J. W. Hawley, E. A. SEXSMITH, CHARLES E. FORLINES, Frank W. Stephenson, Lawrence C. Little, and James H. Straughn. There were over 1,400 persons present for the Fellowship Banquet held at the Mayflower Hotel on Friday, May 15.

At the conclusion of the conference, A. NORMAN WARD, chairman of a forty-member "Committee of Findings," reported some twelve points set for the denomination by the Conference, including the placing of greater emphasis on evangelism and on the enlarged fields of Christian service opened by religious education, raising in full church assessments, and the awakening of the denomination "to a new sense of its importance and obligation in the spreading of 'scriptural holiness' throughout the lands, and for the great work . . . in carrying forward . . . the plans and purposes of the Kingdom of God. . . ." Following the Washington Conference a series of "Echo Meetings" were held on the grass roots or local level of the denomination in order to make known these goals. The Conference had great effect in mobilizing the work of the M.P. Church at that time.

METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH (1939-). The continuing Methodist Protestant Church was formed by ministers and members of the Mississippi Conference of the former M.P. Church who did not wish to join in the 1939 Methodist merger because of what they termed the liberalism of The Methodist Church. They emphasize the Bible as the literal word of God, the indwelling of the Holy Spirit subsequent to regeneration, and the premillennial return of Jesus Christ. They are a racially segregated church, believing this serves the best interests of both black and white. Their motto is, "Earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered to the saints."

The church has congregations in MISSISSIPPI, ALABAMA, MISSOURI, LOUISIANA, and OHIO in three conferences. Mission work has been established in KOREA and in two locations in British Honduras. A liberal arts school, Whitworth College, is operated in Brookhaven, Miss. They are members of the American Council of Christian Churches and the International Council of Christian Churches. They are affiliated with the SOUTHERN METHODIST CHURCH, the Fundamental Methodist Church, and the Evangelical Church in America in the International Fellowship of Bible Methodists.

The government is a representative democracy modeled on the United States government. Equal representation is given laymen in all functions of the church. There are no bishops.

METHODIST PROTESTANT HERALD, THE (1894-1939), was a weekly denominational periodical maintained by the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M.P. Church. It was an outgrowth of The Central Protestant and was the only publication sponsored by a specific conference in the M.P. Church. J. F. McCulloch started Our Church Record in 1894 with the view of arousing interest in the need for a conference educational institution. The name was changed to The Methodist Protestant Herald in 1910.

The paper was published throughout its existence in GREENSBORO, N. C. In 1896-97 the M.P. Publishing House was built in Greensboro and the income was used for the support of the paper until the opening of HIGH POINT COLLEGE in 1924, when the income went to it. The M.P. Publishing House was sold for $30,000 in 1938, a profit of $20,000 for the college.

McCulloch possessed considerable mechanical skill and not only edited The Methodist Protestant Herald but personally printed it. The subscription price was one dollar a year until 1916, when it was raised to $1.50 and in 1929 it was raised to two dollars. A subsidy based upon size and ability to pay was levied against all the churches and organizations in the North Carolina Annual Conference in order to support the paper. Despite severe financial difficulties, the paper survived the economic depression of the 1930's. McCulloch died in 1934 and J. E. PRICHARD, who had assisted McCulloch, assumed the editorship for the remainder of 1934 and through 1936. R. M. ANDREWS served as editor from 1937 until 1939 when the paper was merged with The North Carolina Christian Advocate, the official organ of the two conferences of the M.E. Church, South.

The North Carolina Annual Conference was rendered an impressive service by The Methodist Protestant Herald during the forty-five years of its publication. "Editor McCulloch, in addition to seeing High Point College opened and in operation, which was the primary purpose of the establishment of the paper, saw the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHILDREN'S HOME brought into being largely through the work of his paper. McCulloch also rendered a great service in the development of the entire Conference program through the years."

METHODIST PROTESTANT-RECORDER, the official periodical of the M.P. Church at the time of Methodist union in 1939, was an outgrowth of the merging of two papers: The Methodist Protestant, issued from Baltimore, Md., and The Methodist Recorder, published at Pittsburgh, Pa.

The origin of The Methodist Protestant may be traced to The Wesleyan Repository and Religious Intelligencer (1821-1824), a bi-monthly in large octavo form with sixteen pages, initially issued from Trenton, N. J., by WILLIAM H. STOCKTON, an influential layman of the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE, M.E. Church. When The Methodist Magazine, the only Methodist periodical in America at the time, refused to publish controversial subjects that might disturb the harmony of the church, William Stockton published this liberal periodical to expose the abuses of clerical power and urge more lay representation in the governing bodies of the church.

After several years of controversy The Wesleyan Repository and Religious Intelligencer, of which the second and third volumes were issued monthly at Philadelphia, was succeeded by The Mutual Rights of the Ministers and Members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which appeared from Baltimore as a monthly in August 1824. It was authorized by the Baltimore Union Society of reformers whose constitution in the first issue became the model for other similar societies and an important guide in creating the Constitution of The Methodist Protestant Church. A committee of ministers and laymen edited the paper with Dr. SAMUEL K. JENNINGS, chairman. The title was changed in 1828 to The Mutual Rights and Christian Intelligencer, edited and published by D. B. DORSEY as a semi-monthly folio of four large pages. From Jan. 7, 1831 it became The Mutual Rights and Methodist Protestant until the words "Mutual Rights" were dropped from the title in June 1834.

Mutual Rights, as it was often referred to, like its predecessor and early successors, was frankly controversial and pledged to open debate about forms of church government. Favorite themes were: equal representation by laymen and ministers in all church conferences; election of presiding elders as opposed to their appointment by the bishops; local preachers' rights including membership in annual conferences; rights of trial and appeal by ministers and members of the church. Most of the writers were anonymous "for prudential reasons," but the names of many were revealed in 1850 by Stockton. The list included EZEKIEL COOPER (whose ideas were later used in the Constitution and Discipline of The Methodist Protestant Church), HENRY B. BASCOM, JOHN EMORY, ASA SHINN, ALEXANDER MCCAINE, THOMAS E. BOND, CORNELIUS SPRINGER, and Gideon Davis. NICHOLAS SNETHEN was the most able and prolific of the contributors. Because it was the chief propaganda organ of the Methodists agitating for reform in the 1820's, the possession, circulation, and use of Mutual Rights became grounds for expulsion from the M.E. Church.

The Methodist Protestant, as the paper was called from June 1834 to its merger with The Methodist Recorder in 1929, had several distinguished editors during the nineteenth century, including E. YEATES REESE and E. J. DRINKHOUSE. It continued to be issued from Baltimore during that period.

The Methodist Recorder had its origin when CORNELIUS SPRINGER in 1839 issued an independent paper from Zanesville, Ohio entitled Western Recorder. He continued it for six years. Then in 1845 A. H. BASSETT became the editor, issuing it from the same place under the same title. In 1855, this independent paper was accepted by the northern and western annual conferences as an official paper, to express more adequately their views on slavery and abolition. Its name was changed to Western Methodist Protestant and issued from Springfield, Ohio. During the years when the northern section of The M.P. Church withdrew to become The Methodist Church, 1866-1877, this paper served exclusively as its denominational voice. Its name was changed to Methodist Recorder. In 1871, the publishing house was established at Pittsburgh, and this paper was issued from that location.

Following church union in 1877, both The Methodist Protestant (Baltimore) and Methodist Recorder (Pittsburgh) were accepted as official church papers until they were united Nov. 1, 1929 as The Methodist Protestant-Recorder, issued from Baltimore. The two editors, FRANK T. BENSON (Methodist Protestant) and LYMAN E. DAVIS (Methodist Recorder) were retained as editorial associates. Shortly before the merger Benson died and Davis became editor-in-chief, the paper being located at Baltimore. H. H. Price succeeded Davis and was followed by RICHARD L. SHIPLEY, who continued until Methodist union in 1939, when the paper was discontinued.

METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE

METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE, THE. Official publishing agency of The United Methodist Church; oldest and largest of Methodist connectional agencies; publisher, printer, and retail distributor of books, church and church school supplies, periodicals and audio-visual aids; non-profit, self-sustaining, appropriates from its earnings monies for the retirement and pension funds of annual conferences for conference claimants; headquarters in Nashville, Tennessee; retail branches and other operations in thirteen other cities, coast to coast; governed by the Methodist Board of Publication; John E. Procter, present President and Publisher; employs 1,865 persons; annual sales in excess of $40,000,000 for 1970-71 fiscal year.

The Methodist Book Concern. The Methodist Publishing House, America's oldest continuing publisher, traces its official history to 1789 when the M.E. Church appointed two of its preachers, JOHN DICKINS and Philip Cox, to the post of BOOK STEWARD. The Minutes of the Church for 1789 record these appointments, implying that Cox served as a traveling book steward while Dickins was stationed in Philadelphia as the minister of St. GEORGE'S CHURCH. By August of 1789, Dickins was issuing books bearing his own imprint, the earliest reputed to have been Wesley's translation of Thomas à Kempis' Imitation of Christ, entitled An Extract from The Christian's Pattern. Soon the publishing enterprise was being spoken of as the Methodist Book Concern, the name under which it was incorporated in 1836.

Although for more than a century and a half 1789 has been accepted as the official founding date of the Methodist Book Concern, it should be noted that publishing has, since the earliest days, been associated with Wesleyan Methodism. JOHN WESLEY himself employed both pen and pulpit in his evangelical efforts in England even before sending preachers to America. As the movement developed on the North American continent in the 1760's, Wesley's publications, especially those defining his theological position, and the Wesleyan method of salvation, were needed and sought by those who came into the Methodist societies. Prior to the American Revolution, officially these publications—sermons, Notes, hymnbooks, and Large Minutes—were forwarded to America by Wesley himself for distribution by the early preachers. In the late 1760's and early 1770's, one of the preachers presumed on his own to publish Wesley items in this country. He was ROBERT WILLIAMS, who came to America in 1769 and preached in the colonies from VIRGINIA to NEW YORK. Effective though Williams was in the spread of Methodism, his private publishing venture did not meet with Wesley's approval and at the first American Conference, held in 1773, he was instructed to publish no further items. For the next several years, presumably, such Methodist books as were distributed by the preachers were imported from England, specifically from John Wesley. Evidence exists of a rather brisk business in these items and the supervision of their sale by persons called Book Stewards. All this, however, transpired before the establishment of the M.E. Church.

The story of Methodism during the years of the Revolution belongs in another portion of this volume, but it should be borne in mind that the vicissitudes of wartime affected the distribution of Methodist books as they did other aspects of the Methodist movement. During the war, when FRANCIS ASBURY desisted from traveling and remained at the White farm in DELAWARE, there is evidence in his Journal that for a time he was engaged in the distribution of books, packing them for shipment to other sections. These volumes, it is to be presumed, were manufactured in England.

With the coming of peace, and the independence of the American colonies, American Methodism changed from a movement within the Church of England to a church, separately organized and established in its own right. This occurred, as will be noted elsewhere, at the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE of 1784. In accord with the Wesleyan tradition, American Methodism at its organizing Conference stressed the importance of reading, and immediately following published as its first official work the minutes of this Conference. Also published soon thereafter was the sermon preached by THOMAS COKE on the occasion of Francis Asbury's ordination. These publications appeared in 1785 and bore the imprint of the church, but not a distinct publishing agency.

The years 1786, 1787, and 1788 are significant in the history of Methodist publishing in that during each one distinct references are made to publishing as a specific activity of the church. In Asbury's Journal, the entry for April 26, 1786, reference is made to accounts of the "Book Concern," with specific reference to BALTIMORE as its location. In 1787 there first appeared in the Discipline a separate section devoted to publishing. This section, in accord with Wesley's English pattern, provided that publishing should be a connexional enterprise, to the extent that items published "in this country" bear the approval of the conference ("if it can be gotten") and that profits from such activities be devoted to Methodist causes. In 1828 EZEKIEL COOPER, the second Book Steward of the Methodist publishing activity, recalled that John Dickens, the first Steward, while the minister in New York, in 1787 "commenced printing some books, the small pocket hymnbook, and some others." The year 1788 is significant as some argue that the action in which Dickens was officially made Book Steward, was taken in that year, although not recorded until 1789. The fact that publishing was much in the minds of the Methodists during these years is borne out by the fact that Asbury's ill-fated COUNCIL of 1788 and 1789 was called to deal with, among other things, "our printing business." In fact, JESSE LEE implied that publishing perhaps began in New York as early as 1783, when Dickens first went there as a stationed minister.

Significant though all these dates are in a consideration of the history of The Methodist Publishing House, the fact remains that the title Book Steward first appears in the 1789 minutes, and that the earliest imprints bearing the name of a steward, so far found, bear also the date 1789, and PHILADELPHIA as the place of publication. Thus 1789 must remain as the official date for the founding of this agency, until other evidence is produced. Earlier activities, however, should not be overlooked.

The Book Concern in Philadelphia. The man credited with the founding of The Methodist Publishing House, John Dickens, was born in England in 1747. Except for his own record of his birth date on a page in his family Bible, he enters history in the year 1774 as a Methodist in Virginia. In 1777 he was admitted to the Conference on trial, and until 1779 preached on circuits in southern Virginia and NORTH CAROLINA. In 1779 he was married to Elizabeth Yancey, the daughter of a landed gentleman of Halifax County, N. C. In 1781, with the Revolutionary War for the most part concentrated in that section of the country, Dickens located and until the end of the war lived in North Carolina, near Fishing Creek, at the Edgecombe County line, on property evidently in his wife's dower. In April 1783, Francis Asbury records his successful persuasion of Dickens to return to the ministry and accept an assignment in New York, at Wesley Chapel—later JOHN STREET CHURCH. By June of that year Dickens and his family (two of his six children had been born by this time) were in New York, where he remained—except for the conference year 1785-1786, which he spent in North Carolina—until sent to Philadelphia in 1789.

It was Dickens who first met Thomas Coke on his arrival in America, he who first heard Wesley's plan for the new church, and he who suggested the name for this church when it was organized at the Christmas Conference. Dickens was further distinguished by being regarded as the best educated of the early Methodist preachers (tradition says he was educated at Eton), and the originator of the idea for a KINGWOOD SCHOOL in America, which was founded as COKEBURY COLLEGE. That he was a well-educated man, with literary inclinations, seems doubtless.

Arriving in Philadelphia in June 1789, Dickens immediately turned his attention to publishing, with several books appearing during that year and in the spring of 1790. These volumes included, besides a Kempis already mentioned, Saints Everlasting Rest (the work of JOHN FLETCHER), the Arminian Magazine for 1789 (evidently published in one volume, late in the year), John Wesley's Primitive Physic, and the Pocket Hymnbook. Philip Cox, the traveling book steward, apparently coordinated the sale of these items to the people through the Methodist circuit riders. John Dickens' first book list, like those which came later, consisted of items originally published in England, which through the emphasis of Wesley had come to be recognized as "Methodist" books. For the most part they fell in the category of practical theology.

From 1789 to 1798 Dickins operated the publishing agency that, in the course of time, came to be known as the Book Concern. Publishing at several different Philadelphia addresses throughout the decade, Dickins employed others to print his books and, contrary to legend, never himself operated a print shop. Considerable evidence remains of his sales efforts, however, including records of shipments to the "West" and South, and efforts to collect payment for the items.

For more than a century and a half tradition was held that Dickins began the Book Concern on his life's savings; and while exact record of the transaction of the founding of the Book Concern has yet to be found, it can be said with certainty that Dickins, like his successor, Cooper, used his own finances in the venture. At the first GENERAL CONFERENCE of the Church, in 1792, oversight of the Book Concern and supervision of Dickins' work, became an assignment of the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE, especially the three-man Book Committee of that Conference.

Although surviving the yellow fever epidemics that ravaged Philadelphia in 1783 and again in 1787, Dickins, in 1798, contracted the disease and on September 27 of that year died. His oldest daughter, Betsy, was also stricken and preceded her father in death by one day.

Immediately Francis Asbury summoned Ezekiel Cooper, a minister of the Philadelphia Conference, and chairman of the Book Committee, to superintend the Concern. Reluctantly, Cooper agreed, although for several months John Dickins' older son, Asbury, managed the business. When the Philadelphia Conference met in the summer of 1799, Cooper was officially elected Book Steward and Editor. It is interesting to note that young ASBURY DICKINS, as well as his mother, continued in literary pursuits, with the result that their names have a place in the history of American literature as co-publishers, after 1800, with Joseph Dennie, of the Port Folio, the literary magazine of Philadelphia's intellectual circle in a day when Philadelphia was the cultural center of American society.

At the time of John Dickins' death, the Methodist publishing agency was $4,500 in debt, largely, it appears from records, to the Dickins estate. Cooper, however, by careful management and the investment of some of his own money, set the Concern on its feet, reorganizing it and concentrating its attention on the publishing of strictly Methodist items. For the most part, however, it continued as a small, one-room enterprise, in straitened circumstances.

In 1803, just as the Book Concern was beginning to enjoy a modest prosperity, difficulty arose among the Philadelphia Methodists at their conference ostensibly over Cooper's being allowed to stay in one place for so long. Cooper, along with his Book Concern, was requested by the Book Committee to leave the city. Asbury, ever vitally interested in the business, desired that Cooper should go to Baltimore. The General Conference of 1804, however, directed him to New York, which was much more favorable to Cooper. The summer of 1804 found him operating the business under the direction of the NEW YORK CONFERENCE in the Battery section on Gold Street.

Early Years in New York. By 1808 Cooper was able to report that the Concern was out of debt and valued at $45,000. At this Conference he refused election to the Steward's post, thus setting a precedent of eight-year tenure that for many years was the policy of the church, and turned the job over to his assistant, John Wilson. Upon the death of Wilson in 1810, DANIEL HITT, who had been one of the most successful book-selling circuit riders in Dickins' day, became Book Steward, with THOMAS WARE as his assistant. Hitt remained in charge of the Concern through the years of the War of 1812, which, while marked by tremendous growth of the church, were not prosperous for the Book Concern. The lists during these years remained much the same as they had under Dickins—reprints of English volumes published to define the tenets and teachings of Methodism.

In 1816, at the end of Hitt's term as Book Steward, the General Conference elected to the post JOSHUA SOULE, then a young minister of the denomination. Soule had already won recognition as the composer, in 1808, of the document that for many years served the M.E. Church as a constitution. Like Ezekiel Cooper, Joshua Soule did not relish assignment to the post of Book Steward. He accepted it, however, and following the direction of the Conference, in 1818 published the first number of The Methodist Magazine, which was immediately successful. This periodical, which soon had a circulation of 10,000—a phenomenal circulation for its day—had been preceded by two unsuccessful efforts in the line of periodical publications. In 1789-90 and again in 1797-98, John Dickins had attempted to publish a duplicate of Wesley's Arminian Magazine for circulation in America. Composed largely of excerpts from the English publication, with a few American articles, these ventures had proved unsuccessful for the Book Concern, with its staff of two or three (at various times) persons. The Methodist Magazine, however, largely emphasizing "the work of God on this continent" won favor right away, and was the first real basis of hope for the future of the Book Concern. Despite this success, however, Soule refused reelection as Steward in 1820, and the post went to a New York minister later famous as a M.E. editor, author, and organizer. His name was NATHAN BANGS. Thomas Mason served as his assistant.

The Era of Nathan Bangs. Nathan Bangs, a man of the optimistic 1820's, thought big; and under the insistent urgings of his hand, the little Book Concern grew. For a time it seemed as if the forced flowering would prove fiscally fatal for the tender enterprise, but under the careful management of later Stewards it grew roots to sustain the ambitious program conceived and executed by Bangs. In 1821 the Concern, after having moved all over the lower end of Manhattan Island, rented the basement of the Wesleyan Seminary building on Crosby Street, and here Bangs installed a bindery, the first of the Concern's own book manufacturing departments. In 1824 Bangs opened a print shop; and when the Seminary moved to White Plains, on his own initiative he bought the New York property. This done, Bangs proceeded to enlarge the list of publications. In 1823 a periodical entitled The Youth's Instructor and Guardian had been started. This was followed, in 1826, by the Christian Advocate, and in 1827 by the Child's Magazine. The Methodist Magazine was also continued. Besides enlarging the list of periodicals, Nathan Bangs revised the book lists, adding to them more works by American Methodists. In 1824 the Concern began issuing Adam Clarke's commentary, entitled The Holy Bible, and, the next year, Watson's Theological Institutes. Of all Bangs' innovations, however, nothing excelled the Christian Advocate in popularity.

By 1828, with 25,000 subscribers, it had the largest circulation of any publication, religious or secular, in the entire country. After Bangs had served eight years as Senior Book Agent, in 1828 he became editor of the paper, filling this position until 1836.

The Opening of the First Branch House. The General Conference of 1820, which elected Bangs Book Steward, authorized the opening of a branch of the Book Concern in CINCINNATI, Ohio, and elected MARTIN RUTER, a minister distinguished as a teacher and scholar, to direct the affairs of the new undertaking. The difficulty of transporting goods from the east to the Mississippi Valley region, and the difference in currency values between the two sections, prompted the western venture. Begun as a subsidiary of the New York Concern, the operation in Cincinnati soon proved itself and in 1836 was incorporated as a separate enterprise, under the name of the Western Methodist Book Concern. Until 1912 this organization functioned separately from the Concern in New York, for many years even being guided in its affairs by a separate Book Committee from the one which had oversight of the New York operation. Even after consolidation of the Book Committees in 1868, two separate local committees had immediate responsibility for the two houses.

Although at first primarily concerned with circulating reprints of New York publications in the western country, the Western Book Concern soon began a book list and later a list of periodicals, distinct from those published in the east. Most notable of these were the German publications, books and periodicals, which began to issue from the Western Book Concern in 1839; and the elaborate monthly, entitled the Ladies' Repository, published from 1841 to 1876. The Western Christian Advocate, a weekly newspaper similar to but not a duplicate of the New York paper, first made its appearance in 1834.

Expansion of the New York Concern. The decade of the 1830's, during which the Book Concern moved positively to the publication of books and materials for the Sunday schools, was marked by expansion of the Concern's real estate holdings in New York. In 1833, at 200 Mulberry Street, the Concern erected its first building designed and built for its own use. A multi-story brick edifice, accommodating all departments for book manufacture as well as the Concern's retail and mail-order sales departments, this building was destroyed by fire in February 1836. Later in that year, partly financed by donations from Methodists and members of other churches, another building was constructed at the same address. It was used by the Concern until 1889, when a structure was erected at 150 Fifth Avenue.

During the 1840's the publishing programs of both the eastern and western Concerns developed extensively as the church grew and as her Sunday schools flourished. By 1844, when the church divided North and South, impressive catalogs of Book Concern publications were being issued, encompassing not only traditional theological titles, church requisites, hymnbooks, and volumes of moral and ethical value, but also list after list of Sunday school books, grouped as libraries (in the Wesleyan manner) or offered for sale as separate volumes. These Sunday school items were nearly all directed to children.

The Book Concerns and the Division of the Church. When the M.E. Church split in 1844, division of the property of the Book Concerns (in the east and in the west) came to be one of the main points at issue between the M.E. Church and the newly formed M.E. Church, South. According to the famous PLAN OF SEPARATION approved by the General Conference of 1844 (the last one attended by both the Northern and Southern factions), the holdings of the Book Concerns, along with other church properties, were to be divided proportionately with the Southern group, should the annual conferences vote to establish a separate Southern church. In 1845, at the LOUISVILLE CONVENTION, the M.E. Church, South, came into being. Between 1844 and 1848 discord between the two churches rather generally prevailed, especially in the border conferences between the two sections. In 1848, when the General Conference of the M.E. Church met for the first time following the split, the Plan of Separation agreed to by the Conference of 1844 was repudiated, on the grounds that it had not been approved by a majority of the annual conferences. By this time the separation of the Southern group, approved in 1844, was viewed in the North as a secession, in which the Church, South, had no claim on the property of the Book Concern. The Southern Church promptly filed suits in the civil courts for its share of the holdings. Ultimately, late in 1853, the Supreme Court of the United States, to which the decisions of the lower courts were finally appealed, ruled in favor of the Southern Church, awarding it $254,000 as its share of the Book Concerns. With this money the M.E. Church, South, in 1854 began its own publishing house in Nashville, Tenn.

The Book Concerns in the Last Half of the Nineteenth Century. Despite the heavy financial burden imposed by the court decision, the Book Concerns of the M.E. Church continued to grow in size and program during the decades of the 1850's and 1860's. Except for a slight setback in the first year of the Civil War, the Concerns prospered during the war years. Their Agents (in 1844 the title Book Steward was changed to BOOK AGENT which had been informally used for many years) arrived at the General Conference of 1868 with reports of growth, expansion, and financial solvency. The New York Concern, as had always been the case, was the larger of the two; but the Concern in Cincinnati was likewise a sizable operation, complete with manufacturing and sales departments, and branches in other cities. By 1868 the New York Concern had branches in BOSTON, BUFFALO, PITTSBURGH, SYRACUSE, and SAN FRANCISCO; the Cincinnati Concern had branches in CHICAGO and ST. LOUIS. Of all these branches the one in Chicago was by far the most solid. Since its establishment by the General Conference of 1852, the Chicago operation had experienced steady growth.

During the twenty years from 1852 to 1872, the commanding figure in the Book Concerns of the M.E. Church was THOMAS CARLTON, Senior Agent in New York, a Methodist minister with a gift for administration and financial management. Under his direction the Methodist Book Concern in New York moved into the front ranks of American publishing houses, weathering even the severe financial depression of 1857 that closed many other firms. An ambitious publishing program, embracing both books and periodical publications, became characteristic of the Methodist Book Concern, which annually issued extensive catalogs heavily slanted to the Sunday school and including a wider variety of subjects than had initially been typical of Book Concern lists. Perhaps the outstanding periodical publication of these years was the Sunday School Advocate, begun in 1841 and published in New York, Cincinnati, and Chicago.

As it had done since 1852, the General Conference in 1868 reelected Thomas Carlton to the position of Senior Agent in New York. JOHN LANAHAN, a minister of the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE, was elected Junior Agent. It was an unequally paired team, and the next four years in the history of the Methodist Book Concern were wracked with dissension and scandal. Amid the scandalous hubbub of American life of the 1870's, discord issued also from the Methodist Book Concern. Suspecting mismanagement of the business, Lanahan shortly after taking office, began investigations into the several departmental operations in the New York organization. In the printing department, he found evidence that seemed to justify his fears; and in some manner these discoveries came to the attention of the secular press, notably the New York Times. A front page story in this paper in September 1869, announced to the world that the Methodist Book Concern was tainted with fraud. Thus began a season of turmoil that lasted until the meeting of the General Conference of 1872. Lanahan's actions left him open to the charge of slander and insubordination. The actions of the Book Committee, ultimately responsible for investigating the matter, left this body open to the charge of whitewashing corruption in the name of public relations. Thomas Carlton, who very unwisely had engaged in financial speculation in oil companies worth millions of dollars, and who even more unwisely had done so in partnership with other employees of the Concern and on the Concern's premises, became the subject of hot debate between those who considered him a martyr and those who considered him the prime offender. Finally the General Conference of 1872 took action, appointed a special committee to investigate the matter, and approved the committee's report, in which both Agents were exonerated of the charge of fraudulent actions. Declaring that minor fraudulent practices had been perpetrated by certain employees in the Concern, but stating that they had not endangered the financial position of the House, the report called for a reorganization of the accounting procedures, which in their laxity left the way open for fraud should such be attempted. Needless to say, neither Carlton nor Lanahan was re-elected to the Agency in 1872.

In their stead REUBEN NELSON, a minister from the WYOMING CONFERENCE, and JOHN MILTON PHILLIPS, a layman from Cincinnati, were elected Agents for New York. Phillips has the distinction of being the first layman ever to be elected to the top position in the Methodist Book Concern. It should be said in passing that the General Conference of 1872, when Phillips was first elected, was the first General Conference of the M.E. Church to be composed of lay, as well as clerical delegates. Besides his significance as the first layman to hold the position of Book Agent, Phillips is also significant as the first man from the west to head the Book Concern in the east. The son of a former assistant editor of the Western Christian Advocate, Phillips was employed at the Western Book Concern in his early youth and rose to a position of responsibility there before being elected Book Agent in New York.

Following the so-called Era of Frauds, the Methodist Book Concerns, east and west, both prospered, and the eastern Concern together with the Missionary Society of the M.E. Church, in celebration of its 100th Anniversary in 1889, erected an impressive headquarters building at the corner of Fifth Avenue and Twentieth Street in New York City to house all its operations. In 1869, the Concern and Missionary Society had jointly purchased a building at 805 Broadway, and it was occupied by office and sales operations for the ensuing twenty years. The manufacturing departments remained at 200 Mulberry Street. Opened with elaborate ceremonies, the structure at 150 Fifth Avenue served as headquarters of the Methodist Board of Missions and the Book Concern (later the Publishing House) in New York until the late 1950's.

In terms of publications, the twenty years following the Civil War were distinguished for the Methodist Book Concerns by their publication of uniform Sunday school lessons (the first ones issued as "the Berean Series"), and publications for Chautauqua. Phillips and Hunt, Agents for the New York Concern, were the first publishers of Chautauqua texts designed specifically for that purpose. Notable advancement of the printing industry in these years resulted in increased book production both in the eastern and western houses. This carried over into the 1890's, when publications and other materials for the EPWORTH LEAGUE formed a significant part of the publishing program. These years also saw an increase in the number of theological books published by the Concerns.

Stepped-up production, resulting in sharpened competition, together with the depression of 1893, so severely affected the Book Concern in New York that at the turn of the century, this house, which had been the unquestioned leader in Methodist publications for more than a century, fell behind its counterpart in Cincinnati, not so directly affected by the economic fluctuations of the more heavily industrialized east. For many years consolidation of the two publishing houses had seemed fiscally desirable, especially as the two chief reasons for the existence of the Cincinnati Concern, lack of cross-country transportation and sectional differences in currency, had disappeared. This union was approved in 1908 and accomplished by 1912. At this time Chicago, along with New York and Cincinnati, became a headquarters city for the unified Concern.

In 1914, following the union of the two houses, ABINGDON PRESS was selected as the imprint of the Book Concern on those books designed for wider use than simply within the M.E. Church. Up to this time, and since the days of John Dickins, publications of the Concern had been issued in the name of the Book Agents, a practice also followed, because of copyright restrictions, in the publishing house of the M.E. Church, South. This practice, which continued until a decade ago, often makes difficult the identification of items published by the official publishing agencies of Methodism. The first line of Abingdon Press books, although consistently of high moral tone, extended beyond the bounds of the strictly religious.

Enjoying the general prosperity of the times, in the mid 1920's, the Methodist Book Concern extended its real estate holdings and erected a printing plant in suburban Dobbs Ferry, N. Y., moving its manufacturing operations out of New York City. This, along with other factors, left the Concern in weakened condition to weather the big depression of the 1930's. As a result the organization arrived at the end of the decade in serious economic condition. Thus its affairs were somewhat disordered at the time of unification in 1939.

Publishing House of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. When Nathan Bangs began the Christian Advocate in 1826, so popular was this publication that local Methodist papers, modeled after the New York periodical, began to spring up throughout the settled portions of the country. Further impetus was given them when the Book Concern in 1833 approved the publication of a "Christian Advocate" for the Mississippi Valley Region (the Western Christian Advocate). Sectional feeling was rather generally characteristic of the country, and the desire for special sectional papers sprang up in smaller and smaller regions. One of these was begun in NASHVILLE, Tenn., in 1833; and there were others elsewhere, both within and outside the South. The General Conference of 1836 accorded official sanction, including Book Concern sponsorship, to six of these papers, one of which was the Nashville publication. Thus began Methodist publishing in Tennessee's capital city.

By the time of the split in the M.E. Church, the Nashville paper, titled the South-Western Christian Advocate, was being ably edited and managed by JOHN B. McFERRIN, a Methodist minister of the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE. In 1845, the first book published by the M.E. Church, South, a history of its organization, was issued in Nashville under the direction of McFerrin. The organizing convention in Louisville provided for a Southern Book Concern, and at the church's first General Conference in 1846, JOHN EARLY, later bishop, was named Book Agent. Located in RICHMOND, Early gave direction to such book publishing as the Church, South undertook in its early years. THOMAS O. SUMMERS, in CHARLESTON, S. C., was named editor of the Church's Sunday school publication, the Sunday School Visitor, and Advocates were approved for all three cities. More formalized publishing plans were to be laid when the property of the Book Concerns of the Northern Church was divided. As has already been seen, this required ten years, during which interval the Southern publishing program was carried out in a scattered fashion.

The General Conference of 1854, anticipating a large sum of money to be received from the M.E. Church in accordance with the terms of the Plan of Separation and the decision of the courts, voted to establish a full-blown publishing house, complete with print shop, in Nashville, Tenn. This city was already identified with Methodist publishing; was nearer the center of the South than either CHARLESTON or RICHMOND; and was neither a border town, such as LOUISVILLE, nor a river town, such as MEMPHIS. Thus to it fell the honor of being the site of the first real publishing house south of the Mason-Dixon line. The whole section, other denominations as well as Methodists, took pride in it. As its first quarters, a tobacco warehouse on Nashville's public square was secured, and with the aid of a Philadelphia binder who relocated his shop in Nashville, the Southern Methodist Publishing House got under way late in 1854. Edward Stevenson and F. A. Owens were elected Book Agents.

To make up for lost time, the Southern House immediately launched a full-scale publishing program, duplicating insofar as possible that of the two Northern Book Concerns. During its first year, the Book Editor, as the title had become, again T. O. Summers, said that 150 titles were issued by this house. Some were traditional Methodist items, while others were reprints of English books, quickly "revised" by Summers—who was born in England—and pushed through the press. By 1858 it was obvious that the new enterprise had overextended itself, and John McFerrin, editor of the Nashville Christian Advocate, was elected Book Agent. From the outset his task was to correct the fiscal mistakes the House had made in its first four years.

McFerrin was well on the way to accomplishing his assignment when, in 1861, the Civil War erupted, unsettling conditions throughout the section. Nashville, the carefully chosen site of the Publishing House, was the first major Southern city to fall. It was occupied in February 1862 by the federal army, in advance of which McFerrin and most of the officials of the House (all staunchly Confederate in their sympathies) fled farther south to escape capture. From this time until the end of the war, activities of the Southern Methodist Publishing House were at a standstill, especially after the property of the House was confiscated in 1863 for use as a U. S. Government printing house.

During the late spring and summer of 1865, McFerrin and other departed Publishing House officials returned to Nashville to begin their work anew. Securing from President Andrew Johnson a release of the property, badly damaged during the federal occupancy, McFerrin resumed publication of the Nashville Christian Advocate in the late fall of 1865. Prior to the war, in the interest of economy, the Nashville paper had been made the sole official organ of the denomination, the other papers such as the Southern Christian Advocate in Charleston and the Richmond Christian Advocate, reverting to the support of their related annual conferences.

When the first postwar General Conference of the M.E. Church, South met in NEW ORLEANS in May 1866, continuation of the Publishing House, despite all odds, was voted. A. H. REDFORD, a minister of the LOUISVILLE CONFERENCE, was made Book Agent, while editorial responsibilities were largely assigned to T. O. Summers.

Recovering with rather amazing speed from the plight in which it found itself in 1865, the Southern House by 1872 felt itself to be sufficiently strong to undertake the erection of a new office building and plant in Nashville. Hardly had the new structure been completed than faults in the construction made immediate repairs necessary if the building was to be safely occupied. This unexpected cost, coupled with poor financial management and the overextending of credit, so sapped the life of the enterprise that by 1878 bankruptcy appeared the only choice. However, at the General Conference that year, McFerrin, since 1866 the church's Mission Secretary, was recalled to the post of Book Agent, and with the Book Committee was authorized to make whatever disposition of the House seemed best. Determined that the Southern Methodist Publishing House should not fail, McFerrin and the Book Committee devised a plan whereby low interest bonds could be sold to pay off high interest loans the House had previously made. The sale of these bonds across the South, largely accomplished by John B. McFerrin himself, a tough, consecrated campaigner as well as a master of oratory, comprises one of the most dramatic chapters in the history of The Methodist Publishing House. Within less than two years the bonds, totaling $300,000, were sold; and by 1884, when McFerrin died, the House was declared free from debt.

The careful and cautious management required by these circumstances somewhat inhibited the program of the Southern Methodist Publishing House during these years, throughout which its major efforts were concentrated on production of the Christian Advocate, edited by the able and popular O. P. FITZGERALD, and items for the Sunday school. In the latter field (although elsewhere the program of the organization was weak), obvious efforts were made to keep abreast of the times.

The decade of the 1890's was a period of significant growth for the southern organization which, as the century turned, was further benefited by money appropriated by the U. S. Senate to pay off the long-standing war damage claim occasioned by federal occupancy of the Nashville property during the Civil War. This claim was based on the declaration of the Lincoln administration that restitution would be made for war damage to property of churches, educational institutions, and other eleemosynary enterprises. In 1898, after more than thirty years, the U. S. Senate acted favorably on the claim of the M.E. Church, South. In the final days—indeed in the final hours—of the Senate's consideration, a question was raised concerning the size of the fee the House had agreed to pay its lawyer for handling the case. A hasty exchange of letters and telegrams between the Agents and Washington officials on this point (which was judged to have no bearing on the justice of the claim), resulted in a charge that the Agents, J. D. BARBEE and D. M. SMITH, had been deliberately misleading in their answers to certain questions. Considerable furor was caused throughout the Southern Church, with the result that the General Conference of 1902 staged a full-fledged investigation of the matter. Assured by the U. S. Senate that the Church would not be expected to return the money—$288,000—paid on the claim, the General Conference exonerated the action of the Agents. Barbee, however, was not re-elected Book Agent, although Smith was returned to the position of Junior Agent. In 1903, upon the resignation of Barbee's elected successor, R. J. Bigham, Smith became Senior Agent. Like John Milton Phillips in the M.E. Church, Smith was the first layman to hold the post of Book Agent in the Southern Church.

The generally favorable condition of the Southern Methodist Publishing House in the early 1900's led to expansion of the enterprise and real estate improvements in Nashville. In 1899 a branch was begun in DALLAS, Texas, and in 1902, together with the Missionary Society of the M.E. Church, the Southern House opened a branch in Shanghai, CHINA, which functioned for several years. This bold step was in accord with a tradition of assistance to missionary endeavors for many years practiced by the Methodist Book Concern in New York. During the middle years of the nineteenth century a missionary publishing house in Bremen, GERMANY, had to a certain extent been sponsored by the Methodist Book Concern. The program of German publishing in Cincinnati and that of Spanish and Portuguese publishing in the Southern House were in the same tradition. In 1912 a branch was officially opened in Richmond, Va., where through colporteurs and other channels Methodist books had been sold for many years.

In 1907 the Nashville operation of the Southern Methodist Publishing House moved from the public square location to a building erected for its use at 810 Broadway in Nashville. For many years this building, since it also housed several general agencies of the church, was informally regarded as the headquarters of the M.E. Church, South. After unification in 1939, 810 Broadway, Nashville was official headquarters for the Publishing House of The Methodist Church until 1957.

Following a steady though undramatic course during the years between 1910 and 1920, the Southern Methodist Publishing House in 1924 adopted a policy of publishing books of general Christian appeal as well as issuing titles bearing specifically on Methodism. At this time the House selected the imprint COKEBURY PRESS, which until unification was used on these items. The venture was immediately successful, and was partly responsible for the healthy condition in which the Southern Methodist Publishing House emerged from the depression of the 1930's. Well patronized by the church and accustomed to weathering adverse times, the Southern House at the time of Methodist union in 1939 was the soundest publishing enterprise of any of the three churches.

As a manufacturer of books since 1854, the Southern Methodist Publishing House had been a leader in this industry. In 1924 a separate printing plant was erected on Demonbreun Street in Nashville, which in 1957 formed the core of a new structure now headquarters of Methodist publishing. Since 1935 the Methodist printing plant in Nashville has employed as its trade imprint The Parthenon Press. This imprint, since unification, has also applied to printing done in the Cincinnati plant.

The Methodist Protestant Book Concern. Within bounds it might be said that the formation of the Methodist Protestant Church commenced in 1828 had as its basis the desire on the part of the Methodist Reformers for a free press. Claiming with some justification that they had only limited access to the columns of The Methodist Magazine, then under the editorship of Nathan Bangs, certain Methodist ministers independently began publication of a periodical entitled Mutual Rights. This publication, issued from Baltimore, advocated equal lay and clerical representation in the conferences of the church, together with restrictions on, if not elimination of, the powers of the episcopacy. Reprimanded for fostering a schismatic movement within the Methodist Episcopal Church, the leaders were expelled. As a result the Methodist Protestant Church was organized in 1830.

The importance of publications, especially periodicals, was recognized by the church at its organizing convention. JOHN JOLLY HARROD, a Baltimore book dealer, was named Book Agent and, it was said, like John Dickens before him, began the enterprise with his own funds. Prominent among its publications was the Methodist Protestant, a weekly newspaper which succeeded Mutual Rights. For a time Harrod attempted to publish and sell books for the denomination, but as the response in this area was limited, he relinquished his commission, and the church attempted to establish a book concern through contributions from the church members. This effort was never successful, but publication of the Methodist Protestant was continued.

In the 1850's dissatisfaction arose in the northern and western conferences of the church over the policy governing the Methodist Protestant's refusal to admit discussions of slavery in its columns. By action of the General Conference of 1854, permission was given for each section of the church to have its own periodical, if the conferences desired, with responsibility for the publications to rest on the annual conferences, not the General Conference. While meeting to discuss the beginning of a western publication, the western anti-slavery conferences decided to withdraw entirely from the eastern and southern conferences. As a result there were two churches from 1866 to 1877, as well as two publications. The Methodist Protestant, published in Baltimore, continued as the organ of the southern and eastern sections of the church, while the Western Methodist Protestant became the organ of the western conferences. Published for a time at Zanesville, Ohio, and later at Springfield, Ohio, the Western Recorder as it was ultimately named, along with the Western Methodist Protestant Book Concern, in the early 1870's came to rest at Pittsburgh. Although neither of the Book Concerns was a large operation, the Book Concern of the western Methodist Protestant body operated its own print shop.

In 1877 when the two sections of the church again came together, a Board of Publications was established, with separate local "directories" in charge of the Baltimore and Pittsburgh operations. By this time the Pittsburgh Directory was publishing not only the Recorder, but also a Sunday school periodical entitled Our Morning Guide, similar to the Sunday School Advocate of the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Sunday School Visitor of the Southern Church. The Baltimore Directory was publishing the Methodist Protestant and a series of uniform Sunday school lessons, both edited by EDWARD J. DRINKHOUSE. In 1884 all Sunday school publications were transferred to the Pittsburgh Directory, from which point they were distributed as well as printed.

Maintaining distinct identities for many years, the two Methodist Protestant publishing enterprises came closer together in 1929, when the two papers, the Methodist Protestant and the Methodist Recorder, were merged as the Methodist Protestant Recorder, published in Baltimore, where by this date a print shop was also being operated. This printing establishment employed as its trade name The Stockton Press, in commemoration of THOMAS STOCKTON, early denominational leader.

Methodist Protestant publishing, while never carried out so extensive a scale as the publishing programs of the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, is notable for its consistent production of both general and Sunday school periodicals. These publications did much to establish and maintain the identity of the relatively small denomination.

Since Unification. When the three Methodist Churches came together in 1939, Nashville was chosen as headquarters of what all agreed should be called The Methodist Publishing House. At this time the organization had mail-order branches in thirteen cities in addition to six printing plants. Each of the three uniting churches had its own system of Sunday school literature, and each its own assortment of periodicals. Consolidation of these operations, greatly affected by the entry of the United States into World War II in December 1941, was not completely achieved until the late 1940's. When finally accomplished The Methodist Publishing House consisted of thirteen mail-order locations, two printing plants (one in Nashville and one in Cincinnati), one system of Sunday school (by this time called "church school") literature, one general church periodical (the Christian Advocate), and one quarterly publication as successor to The Methodist Magazine and the old Quarterly Reviews (under the title Religion in Life). Except for official Methodist items, the House was using the imprint Abingdon-Cokesbury Press on its books, and The Parthenon Press as the trade name of its manufacturing department. It was headed by two Publishing Agents, one lay and one clerical, and governed by the Methodist Board of Publications.

Blessed with financial success during the war years and the years of the religious boom following the war, the newly unified operation was enabled to move forward despite almost constant organizational changes necessitated by the continuing process of unification. The decade of the 1940's was distinguished by initiation of the project to publish a Bible commentary, which appeared in twelve volumes published between 1951 and 1956 as The Interpreter's Bible, now a classic of biblical scholarship.

In 1956 the Christian Advocate became two publications: Together, a handsome monthly family magazine rivaling in technical perfection and editorial content elaborate secular publications of the period; and the New Christian Advocate, a professional journal for Methodist ministers and laymen intimately involved in the affairs of the local and general church. (In 1960 this publication reassumed the original title Christian Advocate.) In 1957 the House completed and occupied a new headquarters building at 201 Eighth Avenue, South, in Nashville, and in that same year undertook studies leading to a reorganization of its retail and mail-order departments and distribution points. In 1960 it adopted the trade name Cokesbury, for this aspect of its services, and changed the name of its book publishing department to Abingdon Press.

The recurrence of these names throughout the recent history of Methodist publishing deserves explanation. Both are related to the first educational endeavor of Methodism in America. Cokesbury College, the first Methodist school in this country, was opened in 1787 at Abingdon, Md. The name Cokesbury combines syllables from the names of the first two Methodist bishops: Thomas Coke and Francis Asbury. The idea for Cokesbury College, it will be remembered, was first set forth by John Dickins, who is recognized as the founder of The Methodist Publishing House. Reminiscent of the days of the mounted circuit rider is the present circuit rider colophon or trademark of The Methodist Publishing House, a tribute to the men who first circulated the books and periodicals published by the organization.

Today The Methodist Publishing House has operations in fourteen metropolitan areas across the nation. In Nashville are offices of its five central divisions: Retail Sales, Publishing, Manufacturing, Accounting, and Personnel and Public Relations. In Nashville also is the larger of its two printing plants, one of the largest complete printing operations in the nation; its Southern Regional Service Center (mail order); and one of its Cokesbury Book Stores. In Chicago and suburban Park Ridge, Illinois, are editorial offices of Together; the Christian Advocate; the North Central Regional Service Center; and a Cokesbury store.

In New York City and suburban Teaneck, New Jersey, are the Northern Regional Service Center, a Cokesbury store, and a Cokesbury book depository, in the Church Center near the United Nations Building. Other regional service centers and book stores are in Richmond, Virginia; Dallas, Texas; and San Francisco, California. Cokesbury stores are likewise operated in Atlanta; Boston; Baltimore; Cincinnati (where is located the second of the Methodist printing plants); Detroit; Kansas City, Missouri; Los Angeles; and Pittsburgh.

Some indication of the book publishing activity of The Methodist Publishing House may be seen in the catalogs of Abingdon Press, which annually list more than a hundred new titles, including religious books, children's books, and books of general interest to youth and adults. A sizable portion of the publishing program of the House is concerned with the publication of teaching materials for the Church school, bearing the Graded Press imprint, editorially prepared by the Editorial Division of the Methodist Board of Education on outlines devised by the church's CURRICULUM COMMITTEE.

A Nonprofit, Self-Sustaining Organization. From its inception The Methodist Publishing House and its predecessor organizations have been nonprofit but self-sustaining. Even before the Methodist Book Concern officially came into being, the Discipline of 1787 specified that profits arising from the sale of books should be directed to denominational causes at the discretion of the bishop and the Council. The 1792 Discipline directed the Book Steward to pay monies out of the book fund for Cokesbury College, district schools, and "distressed preachers." From the outset, success was so presumed for the publishing activity that no provision was made for its own sustenance other than such monies as would come from its own operation. For a time, in the early 1800's, an effort was made to collect money for a Tract Fund to enable the Concern to sell at less than publishing cost evangelistic and moralistic tracts. This effort, however, was notably unsuccessful. Therefore, it can be truthfully said that The Methodist Publishing House has been self-sustaining since its founding.

The practice of drawing support for church causes from book sales, early established by the church, continued almost uncontrolled during the early years of the Book Concern. Despite the passage of the sixth Restrictive Rule in 1808, forbidding the General Conference to use the surplus funds of the Book Concern for any other purpose than the support of worn-out preachers, the Concern for many years paid the salaries and expenses of the bishops and underwrote the expenses of the General Conferences, besides supplying money for other less obvious expenses of the church. In 1860, Thomas Carlton said, "The Concern has paid the general expenses of the whole church, . . . at an average of nearly $38,000 per annum since 1836." It is calculated that during this period about $300,000 was actually distributed to the annual conferences for the relief of the retired ministers, their widows and dependent children. Between 1860 and 1868, $132,609 went for this purpose.

At the turn of the century, the Methodist Book Concern, including the Concern in Cincinnati, began making larger appropriations for the conference claimants. By 1939, it was reckoned that a total of nearly $9,000,000 had been appropriated by the Methodist Book Concern for this purpose.

The precedent established by the M.E. Church of drawing money from its publishing house for the miscellaneous expenses of the church was followed from the first by the M.E. Church, South. By 1866, it was figured that $233,000 of Publishing House money had been spent in "outside enterprises" of the M.E. Church, South. Because of the straitened financial circumstances of the Southern Methodist Publishing House, no appropriations were made to the conference claimants of the Church, South during the 1870's and for most of the 1880's. Resuming the practice in 1888, the Southern Methodist Publishing House by unification had appropriated a total of $1,848,290 for the conference claimants of the Southern Church.

The Book Concerns of the M.P. Church, although basically organized in a different manner from those of the episcopal churches, were from the first hopefully considered a source of revenue for the denomination. This hope never materialized, however, as the concerns at best only met their own expenses.

Since unification, The Methodist Publishing House, has operated strictly in conformity with the church's Fifth Restrictive Rule, which provided that the income of the organization could only be used for the business itself, with proceeds above operating expenses and proper reserves going only to the conference claimants. A total of $12,365,000 was appropriated for these beneficiaries between 1940 and 1968.

In the aggregate, since its organization in 1789, the publishing agency of The Methodist Church has provided more than $23 million for the denomination's retired ministers, widows, and orphaned children.

In The United Methodist Church. At the union of The Methodist Church and the Evangelical United Brethren Church in 1968, the publishing interests of both Churches were put under one General Board of Publication, similar to, and for practical purposes an extension of, the Board of Publication of The Methodist Church as it had been up to that time. The General Board, comprising all the publishing interests of The United Methodist Church, functions as The Methodist Publishing House. The Board consists of forty-five members including two bishops selected by the Council of Bishops, five members at large, elected by the Board, and thirty-eight members elected by the Jurisdictional Conferences, the number from each Conference determined by the membership of the Jurisdiction.

The E.U.B. Church brought into the union the Otterbein Press, located in Dayton, Ohio, and the Evangelical Press in Harrisburg, Pa. Centralization of the entire printing operation in the interests of efficiency and economy brought all publishing to the Nashville plant. In view of this, the Cincinnati, Dayton, and Harrisburg plants were sold. (See also PUBLISHING HOUSE CONTROVERSY.)

METHODIST QUARTERLY REVIEW. This title covers the publishing history of a periodical which began in 1818 as The Methodist Magazine, and continued to appear under various titles (except 1829) until its demise in 1931: The Methodist Magazine, monthly, 1818-28; The Methodist Magazine and Quarterly Review, quarterly, 1830-40; The Methodist Quarterly Review, 1841-84; and The Methodist Review, bimonthly, 1885-1931. In addition to English predecessors (beginning with The Arminian Magazine from 1778) two abortive efforts had already been made: the reprinting of the first two volumes of the English magazine by JOHN DICKINS in 1789-90 as enterprises of the newly founded Methodist Book Concern, and the distribution in 1797-98 of a few numbers of a proposed Methodist Magazine authorized by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1796.

In 1816 the General Conference instructed "the book steward and his assistant," who turned out to be JOSHUA SOULE and Thomas Mason, to begin anew the project of publishing a serious religious periodical. Accordingly in 1818 appeared the first issue of The Methodist Magazine. "The great design of this publication," averred the editors, "is to circulate religious knowledge—a design which embraces the highest interests of rational existence, as the sum of individual and social happiness increases on a scale of proportion with the increase of spiritual light and information." The subsequent editors were: NATHAN BANGS, 1820-36; Samuel Luckey, 1836-40; GEORGE PECK, 1840-48; JOHN MCCLINTOCK, 1848-56; DANIEL WHEDON, 1856-84; DANIEL CURRY, 1884-88; James Mendenhall, 1888-92; WILLIAM KELLEY, 1892-1920; GEORGE ELLIOTT, 1920-30.

During the early years the little monthly subsisted on reprints of articles drawn chiefly from the Arminian Magazine and pious accounts of divine providence and saintly deaths. Bangs accomplished much with little until his election as Missionary Secretary in 1836, when Samuel Luckey took over for a quadrennium. During this period book reviews became a part of the regular features. The change from small monthly to substantial quarterly in 1830 marked the emergence of a true theological review. Not until the era of George Peck, however, did the magazine assume mature status as a serious journal. Interpretations of new trends in philosophy and theology began to appear. German works were reviewed.

The MQR entered an exciting period with the appearance of John McClintock as editor. Taking up his duties as General Conference complained against the scholarly standards in favor of more popular treatment, he forthrightly stood firm for yet higher standards. Long intensive review articles appeared on religious and secular books like Butler's Analogy and Ticknor's classic on Spanish literature. Several articles took up cudgels against prevailing liberalism of the Channing-Parker-Comte varieties. Throughout the whole century contributions followed in regular succession on aspects of Wesleyan theology and Methodist church order.

During the long decades between 1856 and 1884 Daniel D. Whedon spent his tremendous energy on building the MQR into a journal unsurpassed by any other of the time. Its influence was felt not only within the circle of Methodism but throughout American Protestantism. Many contributions came from non-Methodists, among them Philip Schaff. Whedon was not afraid of controversy. The pages sparkled with fires of debate on lively issues. Schleiermacher and Bushnell came off rather well in critical articles; but Theodore Parker and Ralph Waldo Emerson were severely mauled. The Review took account of the appearance of a new generation of Methodist theological writing—Whedon's own Freedom of the Will, Miner Raymond's Systematic Theology, John Miley's Atonement in Christ. In addition it sought to interpret for its readers the broader aspects of nineteenth century culture, especially in the field of literature. A few voices were raised in favor of original American art.

With Whedon's retirement, the new editors, Daniel Curry and, more important, James Mendenhall, expanded the review to a fat bimonthly, including several added features designed to win a wider audience, the "Arena" and "Itinerants' Club." The doughty old editor turned his journal into a veritable fortress against the attacks of "agnosticism, Old Testament criticism, and all the cognate upheavals in the path of Christian culture and progress." He was already struggling to prevent the nineteenth century from becoming the twentieth. Nevertheless new voices were heard and different points of view were expressed. Culturally a reaction set in against the romantic vagaries of Berlioz and "the unspeakable Zola."

The next period, the long editorship of William V. Kelley, carried the MQR into the twentieth century. Names like RALL and LEWIS and KNUDSON appeared, to say nothing of the perennial BOWNE. Kelley suited well the spirit of the turn-of-century with his combination of serious theological and broad cultural interests. The furious battles of modernists and fundamentalists were muted in the magazine. There was a respite from the fiery crusades of Whedon and Mendenhall.

The last decade was controlled by George Elliott, who died suddenly in 1930. The MQR died almost as suddenly, doubly stricken by the death of its editor and the Great Depression, and expired with the third issue of volume 114 in 1931. It had been born three years after the venerable North American Review, which managed to survive eight years longer. It continued in unbroken vigorous publication far longer than any other scholarly religious periodical in America. It was reborn in 1932 as the ecumenical review, Religion in Life, different in title and scope but of the same parentage.

FREDERICK A. NORWOOD

METHODIST QUARTERLY REVIEW (M.E. Church, South). This magazine was launched in 1847, with H. B. BASCOM, President of Transylvania University, LOUISVILLE, Ky., as editor and JOHN EARLY the publisher.

The introduction in the first issue stated the magazine's policy. Following are excerpts. "It is intended as a general Church organ, authorized by the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, at Louisville, Kentucky . . . Ours is an age of nominal opulence, commercial greatness, varied mechanical activity and rapid progress . . . This review is designed to explore theology, philosophy, science, education and literature. It is written primarily for the south, to encourage southern authors . . . Honest search for facts of theology and historical reality are always to be sought and fairly presented . . . As a Nation, we are one, and God grant that we shall forever continue to be."

The first volume featured a defense of "State Rights," and a plea for "Adequate Religious Education of the Negro." A department of "exegesis" and a generous editorial section were carried throughout its history. The Quarterly of the M.E. Church, South, during the nineteenth century, carried articles titled "Is A Classical Liberal Arts Education Essential To An Effective Minister?" "The Merits of the Property Settlement of the Divided Methodism," "Proper Female Education," "Missions," "Biographies of Eminent Ministers" (many of other denominations), and many other subjects.

In 1851 DAVID S. DOGGETT became the editor and John Early continued as publisher, in RICHMOND, Va. By 1858 the Quarterly was moved to NASHVILLE, Tenn., with THOMAS O. SUMMERS the editor. In 1859 the Southern Methodist Publishing House was listed as the publisher.

The Quarterly of the M.E. Church, South, was discontinued in 1860, with the outbreak of the Civil War. It was some years before that Church recovered from war enough to publish a journal again, but in the meanwhile the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1870, struggling to get the Church back after the ravages its people had suffered, adopted the Southern Review as their official journal. This was edited by ALBERT TAYLOR BLEDSOE and became the "representative connectional publication" of the Church, South.

Bledsoe had begun this quarterly journal in BALTIMORE in 1867 and it soon obtained a wide and powerful influence "over the southern half of the continent," as Bishop HORACE DUBOSE expressed it. Bishop DuBose termed Bledsoe "a demijour who seemed to have concentered all masteries into a single brain and taken his place upon the tripod. Its editor being a Methodist layman who a little later entered into the local ministry, the people called Methodists felt a peculiar loyalty to the Review." The Review and the church's support of it continued to the close of 1877 when Bledsoe died. Bishop DuBose properly observed that the numbers of this magazine "are a repository of theological and philosophical thought of such excellence as to constitute a library in themselves." This is true, and the forty-eight issues of the Southern Review are today highly prized, cherished and often referred to in many important libraries, especially over the South.

Two years after Bledsoe's death, in 1879, the old Quarterly of the M.E. Church, South was revived. J. W. Hinton of MACON, Ga. was editor and J. W. Beck of CHATTANOOGA and BIRMINGHAM the printers, under contract with the Southern Methodist Publishing House until 1887, when the "new series of the Quarterly Review" was first printed in the Nashville plant.

The Southern Methodist Publishing House was severely handicapped by the Union Army of Occupation in Nashville, when it commandeered their new building and equipment, for five years, as Army Headquarters. "The Federal War Claims Committee" appraised the damage at $500,000 but the Church could not secure an act of Congress for payment until 1897, when a compromise settlement was made for $288,000, thirty-five percent of this amount going for attorneys' fees, and cost the Church another long controversy.

In 1886 appeared the first two of many articles on "Union of the Methodist Churches." W. P. Harrison was editor from January 1887 through 1902, when JOHN J. TIGERT gave distinction to the magazine until 1906. GROSS ALEXANDER was listed editor during 1906, however, E. E. Hoss edited the quarterly for 1907 when Alexander took over the editorship until 1915. Horace DuBose gave editorial luster to "The Review" for 1916-18. Frank Thomas was editor for 1919-21, to be succeeded by GILBERT ROWE from 1921-28. WILLIAM PETER KING became the thirteenth and last editor in 1928 until the General Conference of 1930 decreed that the "Honorable Methodist Quarterly Review of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, be discontinued with the current volume." The depression also helped to terminate the Quarterly Review of the M.E. Church in 1931. Subsequently Religion in Life began to be published under the auspices of the M.E. Church, and this journal was adopted and provision made for its continuance in The Methodist Church.

Before and after 1860 brief experiments were made to publish the magazine as a monthly and a bi-monthly. During the nineteenth century the most frequently listed topics were on Methodist polity, ministerial education, Methodist schools and colleges, the place of women in the church, lay representation in the annual and general conferences. Less frequent articles explored English Literature, biographies and missions.

The "dawn of the golden century" was hailed in 1900. Articles reflected new issues in the twentieth century such as secularism, modernism, fundamentalism, the "status of the Negro," labor, temperance, peace and woman suffrage. By 1966 many of these once issues have been resolved, or are now rapidly moving towards some adjustment.

METHODIST RECORDER, THE, a Wesleyan newspaper, first issued on April 4, 1861, under G. T. PERKS and W. MORLEY PUNSHON, was more liberal and cheaper than The Watchman. Its editors or managing-editors have been W. T. DAVISON, NEHEMIAH CURNOCK, J. B. Watson, F. D. WISEMAN, R. G. Burnett, and the present editor, W. E. Pigott. It is vigorously independent and not the property of the denomination or the Conference. It reports foreign and general news and comments thereon in "Notes of the Week." Having absorbed The Methodist Times and Leader and The United Methodist, it is the only Methodist newspaper circulating today in England. A series of "Winter Numbers" issued annually at Christmas from 1892 to 1907 are rich in articles on Methodist history. (See photo, p. 1593.)

Conference ready now for Stage One

SEVENTY-NINE PER CENT SEAL ON 1969 DECISION

BY THE EDITOR

Whitworth Hall,
University of Manchester,
Saturday, June 27

The Representative Session of the 1970 Conference this morning served notice on the Church of England that it is ready to proceed with Stage One of the plan for Unity.

It was made clear that a simple majority would have been enough. In the event, on a show of hands, 465 representatives voted in favour with 124 against, a majority of 79.64 per cent.

Earlier in the year twenty-nine Synods had given approval to the 1969 decision in the following terms:

The Conference, affirming its faith that the Holy Spirit will lead us into a new Church, gives approval to the inauguration of Stage One of the Anglican-Methodist proposals.

Conference is no picnic and there are long periods when members have to listen to serious debate. There are, however, lighter moments when the wit of the speaker gets a ready response and one such moment has been caught by the Recorder photographer in this shot of the representativeness.

METHODIST RECORDER

Since that date it has grown (1963) to a fellowship of some two hundred ministers and over a thousand laymen, whose membership is scattered not only in British Methodism but through the mission field. It also has branches in AUSTRALIA and NEW ZEALAND. Its aims are to encourage unity of the ways in which the Holy Spirit has worked in past revivals, and to stimulate prayer for a revival in the present age, believing that this is a most desperate need. In order to prepare for revival, the fellowship believes that there is a need to stress not only prayer, but also dependence upon the Scriptures and in particular the doctrines of assurance and scriptural holiness.

METHODIST SOCIETY (Stillwellites), U.S.A., was formed in 1820 in NEW YORK when SAMUEL STILLWELL, a prominent politician in New York City and leader of a class of Negroes, and WILLIAM M. STILLWELL, his nephew and traveling preacher in charge of two Negro congregations in New York City, led over 300 people out of the M.E. Church. The cause of the schism was a resolution passed by the 1820 GENERAL CONFERENCE concerning the trust clause in the deed. The Conference said it would henceforth admit no charter for any house of worship not in keeping with the Discipline of the M.E. Church. This resolution offended many of the independently-minded

New York Methodists, who then left to form the Methodist Society in the City of New York.

The new church was congregational: bishops and presiding elders had no place in the organization. The Bible was to be the guide of discipline, and any rules were to be made by the members' vote. A Discipline was published in 1821 and a periodical, The Friendly Visitor, began. In 1826 disagreement over whether the church was to be purely congregational or somewhat connectional caused a split. The 2,000 member body had spread to CONNECTICUT, NEW JERSEY, and Long Island. After the split, the church died out, though William Stillwell continued to preach in an independent Methodist church until 1851.

METHODIST STUDENT MOVEMENT. (See YOUTH MOVEMENT.)

METHODIST THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL IN OHIO, Delaware, Ohio, was authorized by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1956, when that body called for expansion in the education of ministers. For several years prior to this date, Ohio Methodists, under the leadership of Bishop HAZEN C. WERNER, had been studying the possibilities for a seminary in Ohio. Between 1956 and 1960, Ohio Methodists raised $3,500,000 in a state-wide campaign. Later, $2,000,000 was added. OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY gave the school fifty-seven acres for a campus, and an additional fifteen-acre plot was obtained. The physical plant, dedicated October 14, 1960, was erected at a cost of $4,000,000. Instruction began in September, 1960. The seminary gives a B.D. degree. The governing board is made up of forty-four trustees, twelve each elected by two Ohio conferences; nine from bordering annual conferences, nominated by the bishops and elected by the conferences; ten at large; and the bishops of the two Ohio areas.

FRANK BAKER

METHODIST UNITARIAN MOVEMENT, THE, (1806-58) forms the only real example of Methodist deviation upon doctrinal grounds. It was founded by JOSEPH COOKE (1775-1811), and gave birth to vigorous churches on the borders of Lancashire and Yorkshire. Because of two sermons preached at Rochdale in 1805, Cooke was expelled from the Methodist Society on grounds of doctrinal error. Although he never reached a Unitarian position, he appeared to have Socinian leanings, and the Methodist Unitarian Movement was the logical outcome of his methods in the study of the Scriptures. His followers became known as "Cookites," and their first chapel was built in Rochdale in 1806, followed by one at Newchurch-in-Rossendale in 1809. The earliest extant plan (1812) shows eighteen preachers and prayer leaders and sixteen places.

Closely associated with Cooke was John Ashworth. The introduction of the Cookites to organized Unitarianism arose as a result of their preachers occasionally supplying the pulpit of the Elland Unitarian Chapel, at that time in a straitened condition. The first annual meeting of the Methodist Unitarian Association, which existed until 1844, was held in Rochdale in 1818. In the following years Richard Wright (1764-1836), an itinerant of the Unitarian Fund, a missionary society established by the Unitarians in 1806, stimulated and encouraged the Methodist Unitarian congregations. About 1838, however, their organization began to dissolve. The leaders of the movement died; John Ashworth in 1851; James Taylor in 1856; James Wilkinson, the last of the faithful band of Cookite preachers, in 1858. Henceforth the congregations became independent in government and discipline, and passed into the main stream of Unitarian Christianity. Ashworth was the author of Ten Letters: Giving an account of the Rise and Progress of the Unitarian Doctrine in the Societies . . . formerly in connection with the late Joseph Cooke (1817; 2nd ed., 1829; reprinted, 1870).

The government and discipline of the movement was Methodist; the annual meeting of the association was a Methodist conference in miniature. The movement strongly supported the growth of Sunday schools, an outstanding example of which was at Todmorden, where John Fielden (1784-1849), M. P., was superintendent. The half century during which the movement flourished was a period of social and political unrest. The Methodist Unitarians were, in the main, weavers, colliers, and artisans, and their ministers belonged to the same class. Fielden threw himself into the crusade for factory reform, and many Methodist Unitarians were behind the Todmorden Political Union, formed in 1831 to obtain radical reforms, the abolition of slavery and oppression. Of the political council, numbering twenty, seven were prominent Methodist Unitarians. The Methodist Unitarians also numbered in their ranks some of the earliest advocates of cooperation in England.

METHODIST WOMEN'S FELLOWSHIP in New Zealand came into being on Feb. 1, 1964, for the first time combining all women's work in the church into a single, nationwide movement. The former WOMEN'S MISSIONARY UNION and the WOMEN'S GUILD FELLOWSHIP thereupon ceased to exist; and in addition many local groups, variously known as Fireside Clubs, Young Mothers' Groups and so on, were affiliated to the movement. The result has been a great increase in efficiency and a considerable saving in overhead expenses.

The new movement has taken over the programs and responsibilities of the former separate organizations. Its executive powers are vested in a national convention which meets annually in October. Membership is approximately ten thousand, and the amount raised for national objectives (year ending August 31, 1966) was £18,000. In addition, local fellowships raised a further £20,000 for circuit and trust objectives.

METHODIST WOMEN'S MISSIONARY UNION in New Zealand was formed in 1915. For many years auxiliaries or groups of missionary minded women had been working for missionary advancement: in Dunedin from 1902, in Christchurch from 1907, in Auckland and Wellington from 1908. Representatives of these and other auxiliaries—twelve in all—met in Christchurch in 1915 and formed the Methodist Women's Missionary Union and annual conferences have been held ever since.

In 1962, the union reported 226 auxiliaries with a total membership of 6,363. The income for 1960-61 was £17,302. Since 1906, gift parcels have been sent periodically to home and overseas sisters engaged in missionary work. Kurahmna, a hostel for Maori girls was opened by the union and is still supported by members of the Methodist Women's Fellowship. Each year, a special objective was accepted by the union; and in 1960-61, £2,750 was raised and sent to the Home and Maori Mission Department to assist in replacing furniture and amenities in one of the department's hostels for Maori girls.

The "Gleaners' Circle" has always endeavored to enlist support for missions from women living in isolated places. Gleaners have been sent regular missionary letters from the national president and from missionary sisters. Used stamps are sold too; and in 1960-61, £1,486 was raised in this way.

District conventions have been a feature of the union program, and the movement has been singularly used of God to enrich the spiritual life of the church.

In 1964, the union united with the Women's Guild Fellowship to form a single movement known as the Methodist Women's Fellowship. All former activities of the union are continued by the new fellowship movement.

Kurahuna, a Maori girls' school hostel, at Onehunga, Auckland, New Zealand, owned and operated by the Women's Missionary Union (and now by the new Fellowship Movement), was opened on January 26, 1931, as the Kurahuna School of Domestic Science and Hygiene for the training of adolescent Maori girls. Union members raised most of the money to purchase a house and land and have maintained the work by instituting a penny-per-week-per-member fund. In 1944 the policy was changed to take younger Maori girls who live at the hostel and receive Christian and domestic training, while attending the local primary and secondary schools.

METHOPRESS. (See ARGENTINA.)

METHVIN, JOHN JASPER (1846-1941), American preacher and missionary to the Indians of OKLAHOMA, was born in Jeffersonville, Ga., Dec. 17, 1846. Educated in the schools of GEORGIA after serving two years in the Confederate States Army, he became a lawyer, then a teacher in the public schools, and then became president of Gainesville College and also of Butler Female College.

He was licensed to preach in the M. E. Church, South in 1870, ordained deacon in 1874, admitted on trial in the INDIAN MISSION CONFERENCE and ordained elder in 1885, and admitted to full membership in 1887, supernumerary in 1905, and retired in 1908.

In 1885 John Methvin heard the call of the church for missionaries to the Indians and went out to be Superintendent of New Hope Seminary for girls among the Choctaws. The next year he had similar work at Seminole Academy. During this year he made a tour of the Western Tribes in Oklahoma Territory, and wrote a report of conditions among these Indians urging that missionaries be sent. At the Annual Conference on Oct. 12, 1887, he was appointed "Missionary to the Western Tribes."

Immediately, he and his wife and children began the long journey west to Anadarko, Okla., where the Indian Agency for these tribes was located. He spent two years visiting the tribes from KANSAS to TEXAS, and decided to concentrate on the Kiowa, Comanche and Apache tribes. A parsonage was built with an annex for public worship, and the Indians were invited to join in the "New Worship."

He visited in teepees and tents, held prayer services, talked with individuals, speaking through interpreters. He made it clear he wanted nothing other than the opportunity to tell them of the love of God for all men. Among the very first converts was an Indian chief, To-hau-sin, and many followed his lead. Churches and Sunday schools were started, and in 1890 a day school was opened. This was known as "Methvin Institute" and for twenty years it was one of the great civilizing agencies. A ready writer, many articles and books came from his pen. Among them are: Our Brother in Red, Andele or the Mexican-Kiowa Captive, Fig Leaves or Else, and In the Limelight.

He died Jan. 17, 1941, and his body was laid to rest in the cemetery at Anadarko, in the land and among the people he loved.

MEXICAN BORDER CONFERENCE. (See RIO GRANDE CONFERENCE.)

MEXICO (Estados Unidos Mexicanos) is located in North America, bordered by the U.S.A. and GUATEMALA, and has an area of 1,972,545 square kilometers. The population is 48,600,000 (1970) and increases at the rate of 1,400,000 a year. It is fifteen percent white of European extraction, twenty-nine percent indigenous, fifty-five percent mixed races (mestizos), and one percent of other races. The official language is Spanish.

México has a variety of climates. The main sources of its economy are agriculture, livestock and mining.

As early as eight to ten thousand years B.C., nomad tribes wandered through its territory. The Maya-quiché and the Náhuatl groups were outstanding. They were highly developed, but they were in a period of decline, and were conquered by the Aztecs, a warrior people. During this period, in 1519, Hernando Cortéz landed in Vera Cruz.

The conquest of México was done by Spanish adventurers interested in gold, not in God. The natives, according to their traditions, took them to be descendants of their god (Quetzalcoatl). Assisted by Franciscan, Dominican and Augustinian monks, the conquerors took over all power, imposed their civilization and established a social life according to the feudal system from Europe. Big haciendas were built; slavery and exploitation were effected in the name of the new religion.

Europeans destroyed the native idols, substituting for them statues of Mary and of the infant Jesus. They evangelized them, imposing ideas and rituals by force, and baptized them by thousands. Conversion was made to forms, therefore the result was syncretism, and the natives were made to live in darkness, superstition, and ignorance. A few priests, like Bartolomé de las Casas and Fr. Pedro de Cante, are remembered for their good intentions and efforts to protect the defenseless, innocent natives. Such was the colonial period for 300 years.

México fought its war of independence from Spain in 1810, led by Miguel Hidalgo y Costilla, a priest. A period of chaos followed. By 1857 there was in existence a liberal party. It was composed of men who were not under the control of the traditional church; they were free to think and to act for themselves. Through the assistance of this party the President Benito Juárez, an Indian, was able to consolidate the Republic and to strengthen it. Under his leadership there was formulated the progressive constitution of 1857 and the famous laws of reform were enacted. These two documents established freedom of religion, the separation of Church and State, the nationalization of cemeteries and of the property of the clergy, lay teaching in the official schools, and civil marriage.

Following Juárez there was a thirty-four year period of dictatorship under Porfirio Díaz. In 1910 México was again involved in a much bigger revolution, social in essence and purpose, started by Francisco I. Madero. This revolution is even going on today, and has provided for a new nation. The Constitution was revised and a new one made in 1917, which provided justice for all, established national sovereignty, safeguarded individual rights, and recognized the rights of the manual worker and the need of agrarian changes. Through the years major developments have been in industry and commerce, education for all, new content and meaning in international relations, and self-determination for a new nation, old though it be.

It is recognized that the natives of México were very religious. There was, however, not much progress, due to the type of Christianity brought by the conquistadores and lived by the colonizers. The Bible was practically unknown by the priesthood and forbidden to be read or owned by lay people. Roman Catholicism was the official religion. An effort to evaluate the effect of the church in Mexico at that time shows that much of the misery, illiteracy, backwardness, and unrest of the people was due to the inability of the clergy to see the needs of the people as they ought to have done.

The reform movement under Juárez favored freedom of worship. Liberalism permeated different levels of society. The Inquisition was forbidden, therefore it was possible to strengthen colportage. Work of the BRITISH and AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETIES started in 1827. By 1860 Protestant missionary work was being done along the U. S. border and missionaries were even sent south into the country.

It is no wonder that President Benito Juárez said, "I could wish that Protestantism would become Mexican by conquering the Indians; they need a religion which will compel them to read and not to spend their savings on candles for the saints." He also said, "Upon the development of Protestantism depends the future happiness and prosperity of my nation."

The Methodist Episcopal Church in Mexico. Two main branches of Methodism from the United States opened work in México. The GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church appointed a committee in 1836 to consider the advisability of establishing work in México and South America. In November 1871, under the leadership of Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON, an appropriation for the work was made. In 1872 WILLIAM BUTLER was selected to be superintendent of the work in México. Bishop GILBERT HAVEN preceded him and arrived at the port of Vera Cruz in December of 1872, and on Christmas day he was a passenger on the first through train of the newly constructed railroad to México City.

William Butler has been called "the founder of two missions," because twenty years before he came to México, he had gone on a similar work to INDIA. He arrived in México City, Feb. 23, 1873, and remained there seven years, after which he returned to the United States. He was an efficient and skillful worker. Soon after arriving in México City, he managed to buy a property. It happened to be the cloister of the first Franciscan monastery erected in the Americas. It is located on Gante Street, No. 5, the place in which Fr. Pedro de Gante had established the first grammar school in the continent and had opened it for the Indians. The place was dedicated, and consecrated as a Methodist Church, and opened to public worship on Christmas day of 1873.

Southern Methodism. In 1873 the LOUISIANA CONFERENCE met at NEW ORLEANS. Bishop GEORGE F. PIERCE was presiding, and invited Bishop JOHN C. KEENER to make a few remarks. In his speech he mentioned interest in México, the closest neighbor, and thrilled his hearers with an account of the conversion of Alejo Hernández, a political exile from México then living in Brownsville, Texas. When he finished, a voice from the rear of the church called out, "If there were sufficient money, could you go to México?" To this Bishop Keener responded, "Of course I could go." A collection was raised, and so the first missionary of the M. E. Church, South was Bishop Keener. He embarked on the steamer Tabasco for Vera Cruz.

By 1875 he had secured a property in México City to be used as a church. It was the San Andrés Chapel which had been a part of the Capuchin monastery. They called it "The Messiah" in México City, and it later became the Church of El Mesías. Alejo Hernández was then appointed pastor of the newly organized church, and Sostenes Juárez, a man distantly related to the famous president, preached the first sermon in Spanish to a Spanish congregation of seven persons. Before returning to the States, the founder appointed J. L. Daves the first superintendent of that Mexican Mission.

Protestant work in México during that time was very difficult for the Methodists, as for all Protestants. The people were divided into two classes, the rich and the poor, and the poor were very poor. Fanaticism created great opposition. Persecution was almost everywhere. Families were divided on account of faith. New converts were ostracized by their relatives and friends. However, the work was carried on courageously by both the missionaries and the congregations. With firm resolution they planted the seed.

In accord with the times, the work was led by missionaries, mainly from the U.S.A.: men and women, preachers and teachers. They established churches, day schools, seminaries, orphanages and medical clinics in some of the most important cities, such as Chihuahua, Durango, Torreón, Monterrey, Guadalajara, General Terán, Saltillo, Guanajuato, Querétaro, Pachuca, Puebla, Caxaca, San Luis Potosí and the Federal District.

TEMPLO METODISTA, DURANGO, MEXICO

Very soon because of the readiness in many ways of the country and its people, there were converts and naturally national leaders began to share in the work, taking upon themselves important duties.

Long would be the list of that legion of faithful workers from both countries who witnessed to their faith in Christ and tried to help others to find peace, happiness and salvation. It would be impossible to forget such missionaries as John W. Butler and his wife, Sarah; J. P. Hauser and Mrs. Gould C. Hauser; Jackson B. Cox; Frank S. Onderdonk; Mr. and Mrs. Lemuel Newberry. In the field of education Dr. and Mrs. Matthew D. Smith, Ethel Thomas, Laura Temple, Helen Hewith, Grace Hallister and Mae B. Seal. In the training of the ministry, Milton C. Davis; in medical work, Miss Edna Pathoff and Dr. Levi B. Salmans; in social work and evangelism, Hattie L. Ayres, Lillie Fox, Leila Roberts, Helen M. Hodgson, Bishop W. P. THIRKIELD, and Bishop GEORGE A. MILLER.

Some outstanding nationals ought to be mentioned. Ministers: Agustin Palacios, Justo M. Euroza, Pedro Flores Valderrama, Victoriano D. Báez, Vincente Mendoza, Epigmenio Velasco, Eduardo Guerra S., Agapito C. Coronado, Gaspar Garza y Garza, Benjamín Fernández, Felipe Rincón, Raúl Ríos León, Eucario M. Sein, Ernesto M. Villansana, J. T. Ramírez, and Manuel V. Flores. In the field of education, Juan Díaz Galindo, Manuela Vargas, Antonio Carro, Agustín Romero López, Francisco Cruz Aedo, Benjamín N. Velasco, Francisco Cepeda C. and María González. Women active in denominational and interdenominational work, Mrs. Josefina G. de Velasco, Elisa S. de Pascoe, María Q. de Frausto, Guadalupe S. de Perales, Elizabeth M. de López, Mercedes Fernandez, Maclovía Garza Flores, Victoria Reyes, and Carmen Dávila.

Mexican Methodism United. Methodist unity came true in México on Sept. 16, 1930, even before the union in the U.S.A. From the beginning the M. E. Church and the M. E. Church, South in Mexico were somewhat related and very much in parallel. Each worked independently and attained triumphs and successes or faced dangers on its own, but often there was coordination. They supported enthusiastically the "National Convention," an interdenominational annual gathering for inspiration and spiritual growth. From it much fruit has come about.

In 1917-19 there was a joint effort in which several Missionary Boards proclaimed the "Cincinnati Plan." This plan expressed the desire and the imperative need to establish not only fraternal relations between the two Methodist churches, but also intimate and organic forms of cooperation with each other. The Central Area Latin American Conference of the M. E. Church was held in PANAMÁ. México was worthily represented by Bishop Wilbur P. Thirkield, VINCENTE MENDOZA, Victoriano D. Báez, and EPIGMENIO VELASCO. Those men were commissioned to work towards the unification of the two branches of Methodism before the next General Conference. The following Annual Conference of the M. E. Church, meeting in México City and presided over by Bishop George A. Miller, approved unanimously the idea, and asked the Bishop to write a project for unification. There was similar support at the Conference of the M. E. Church, South, presided over by Bishop WILLIAM B. BEAUCHAMP.

Duly representative committees were appointed to study and work on the project. Approval was given by the General Conference of the M. E. Church in Kansas City, Mo., May 25, 1928, and by the General Conference of the M. E. Church, South at Dallas, Texas, May 14, 1930. The four official committees met in México City on July 7 and 8, 1930, with twenty representatives from each Conference. Bishop W. A. CANDLER presided and unification was accomplished in the Iglesia Metodista de México, an autonomous entity, affiliated with the mother churches.

On Sept. 16, 1930, on the day of the celebration of the independence of México, with a solemn service, the session of the First General Conference was opened to establish the Methodist Church of México. Victoriano D. Báez presided. Legislation was enacted and promulgated in the original Discipline. Plans for work were formulated and JUAN NICANOR PASCOE was elected the first bishop of the Iglesia Metodista de México. He was consecrated the following Sunday, Sept. 21, 1930.

IGLESIA METODISTA EL DIVINO SALVADOR, JUAREZ, MEXICO

Medical work was most urgent when Methodism began. Dr. Levi B. Salmans established in Guanajuato an important center which no longer exists. There were others in Monterrey, San Luis Potosí and México City. The people lacked knowledge, and illness and suffering were abundant. There was very little application of hygienic measures. Medicines and hospital care were very expensive. Much work was done through teaching, campaigns, lecturing, and practical service, through improvised clinics and movable staff. Now that the Social Security program of the Government has taken the major responsibility for medical care for working men and their families, the church tries to help in areas where the need is not met by the government program.

SANATORIO PALMORE, CHIHUAHUA, MEXICO

An important Methodist medical center exists in Chihuahua. The Sanatorio Palmore, with a plant valued at four million Mexican pesos, a school for nurses, a combined staff of evangelical and non-church-related doctors, is recognized as one of the most important medical centers in the north of the country. There is still a ministry to be carried on in producing Christian nurses and Christian doctors, not only trained with the best of knowledge but with the love of Christ.

Education. The first missionaries of the Methodist Church recognized the great need for schools and education for the underprivileged masses, and schools of higher learning, especially for the training of teachers. In most cases a day school was built by the side of the church. The pastor was at the same time teacher in the school. Even through the revolutionary years, up to 1930, Protestant schools were recognized as among the outstanding centers of education, because of their quality and moral contribution. One emphasis of the Mexican Revolution still in process is a strong program of education, which includes school buildings with the best of equipment, the training of teachers, a program of development to take care of the needs of a fast-developing country, and facilities for students to study for a career to be trained abroad in technical fields.

The Protestant schools still have a place. Colegio Palmore in Chihuahua, under the leadership of Francisco Cepeda, in celebrating its seventy-five years of service, finds its graduates in key positions in government, industry, commerce, education, as well as members of a society where Christian ideals and standards learned at the school find a place of operation. There is Colegio Elliot Torreón, Instituto "Dr. Andrés Osuna" in Piedras Negras, and Colegio Juarez in Guanajuato.

Querétaro, a city full of history, still feels the impact of the Instituto Benjamin N. Velasco, a militarized school. Augustín Romero Lopez has rendered service to the church, the community and the country in assisting parents in the education of their boys.

Pachuca will long live, although Manuela Vargas retired from active work and Antonio Carro Zempualteca has been called home to his deserved reward. The Hijos de Allende and the Julian Villagran schools will live on with a high record for their services. Ministers, school teachers, outstanding professional men, and active workers in many organizations found training, inspiration and backing at these important schools.

Puebla is another important state capital where two schools were established. The life of the city has been affected in more than one way. Juarez School, Instituto Normal Mexico, and Instituto Mexicano Madero will remember names like Blanche Betz, Juana Palacios, Adela Palacios, Angela Lozano, Altargracia Juarez. Maria Robles, and Consuelo Vargas de Romero, Pedro Flores Valde-rama, Gonzalo Báez-Camargo, Carlos Laguna, Juan Diaz Galindo, Francisco Cruz Aedo and Miguel Sarmiento and many more who taught at these institutions. No matter where they are living or working such mottoes as "the best culture for the best service," along with the inspiring personalities and living examples, will enlarge the action of such schools. Many of their students have been active leaders in the progress of their home towns. Some are authors of text books, some are active church leaders. Deaconesses and ministers trained in Methodist schools are now the pride of the two Annual Conferences. Some are serving the church in other countries. Through education, the Methodist Church has made a great contribution to Mexican life.

In Mexico City, Laura Temple's vision still holds on.

Ethel Thomas, Sara Alarcón, Delfina Huerta and many others have carried since 1906 the school for girls, which even today is an important asset for the activities of the Methodist Church.

Methodism could not have carried on as successfully as it has without training girls to become deaconesses. Such a school is now directed by Miss Carmen Dávila, a graduate from it. The school cooperates with the Union Evangelical Seminary in training boys and girls for service to the Master. Seminary training was first started in Puebla by the M. E. Church, in Saltillo and in Mexico City by the M. E. Church, South, in efforts to provide the much needed leadership. Since 1917, just having celebrated fifty years of service, the Methodist Church, with Congregationalists and Disciples of Christ, has cooperated in the Union Evangelical Seminary where their ministers are trained. Manuel V. Flores is at present the Principal. He carries forward the memories that John Howland, Milton C. Davis, F. J. Huegel, and Juan Díaz have left, in this field of service.

Social Centers. México has been a country of revolutions, a mixture of the old with the new and of rapid social changes. Half the population is now under fifteen years of age. People's needs vary much from place to place and from one person to another. Christian environment and guidance for growth and adjustment is sought by those at a disadvantage. A combined effort of the Woman's Division of Christian Service in the U.S.A. with national leaders made possible the creation of Christian Social centers.

The Centro Social Cristiano in Chihuahua was founded in 1919 and developed under the experienced leadership of Lillie F. Fox. At present it has a modern plant with a gymnasium, a day nursery, a program for personality development, and a complete commercial study course, thanks to the devoted ministry of Irene Nixon, who led it from 1951 to 1965. The director today is Horacio Rios.

Monterrey is an important industrial city, second to the Federal District, fast growing with a large floating population seeking employment or entrance to the United States as braceros (seasonal workers). It was blessed by the Centro Social, founded by Sara E. Warne in 1921. Helen M. Hogsdon made of this place a true life investment in every sense. The results will long be felt. She discovered and made possible training for leaders now serving the centers. María González, a worthy successor, learned by her side the art of serving in the name of our Master. The Centro has a full program for every day in the week and supports the church program. Classes in English, cooking, clubs, work with children, young people, and adults, sports and playground, community service, extension work at needed barrios, and personal guidance keeps them busy. Camping is done at a beautiful site in the mountains—a dream came true through Anna Belle Dyck's consecrated work.

Other centers with similar work are located in Durango, Centro MacDonell; Saltillo, Centro Social Roberts; and Cortazar, Centro Social Rural.

The Country and the Church Today. No doubt México is fast developing. It makes headway among underdeveloped nations growing and strengthening its life, and even marks routes for international understanding and cooperation for universal peaceful survival. Religion finds it difficult to follow that speed. The Church as an institution is caught amid the fast changing moves, and yet, the Methodist Church in México recognizes that it has responsibility to its members, to its tradition, but more so to the country and to the people living there.

Bishop ALEJANDRO RUIZ MUÑOZ aims to recover the youthful power and the strength with which Methodism was born and is trying to relocate the message and its proclaimers amid the modern roads of needs and conflicts and is studying the ways and means to make it live according to the times.

The Methodist Church in Mexico is organized in two Annual Conferences constituted by three districts each. It has 296 congregations and pastoral charges. It has 194 church buildings and 342 preaching places. It has 156 pastors, 40 women workers and deaconesses, and 26 missionaries. The membership is 27,463 and 7,825 probationers, making a grand total of 35,288 (1969 figures).

The Methodist Church of México is now planning its one hundredth anniversary. Plans are underway and much effort is being put forth to make of this date a strong goal to double the membership, to deepen its life in Christ and to widen its influence in the power of the Spirit of Christ in service to humanity and in witness of the faith among the Mexican people.

The FREE METHODISTS have for some time had work in Mexico, though the 1917 constitution severely restricted all church work in that country. Both church and government made concessions in 1929, but anti-church riots broke out in 1931. Against this background, Gonzalo Cisneros, Free Methodist minister, went to Mexico in the early thirties as a missionary from the California Latin Conference. He established churches in the states of Sinaloa and Sonora. A Bible Training School was located at Nogales, Arizona. Here young people were prepared for service in Mexico. The school has now been relocated at the University City of Hermosillo, and the program modified to give Bible instruction to young people preparing for any of the professions. In 1965 a church constitution meeting the provisions of Mexican law, was adopted. The Mission superintendent resides at Nogales, Arizona. He is liaison between the conference and the mission board. Membership is reported at 721.

MEXICO, NEW YORK, U.S.A., Mexico Methodist Church, oldest continuous church in the Black River-Ontario District, began about 1808 when a Methodist circuit rider preached the first sermon. That year he organized the first class at the home of Leonard and Minerva Ames with five members. The Ames home was used for church services until about 1820.

In 1810 the Mexico Circuit extended from Camden and Redfield to the Oswego River. The Methodists and the Congregationalists for some years used a schoolhouse built in 1820. Mexico M. E. Church was legally organized in 1833 and a brick building was erected that year. A parsonage was built in 1840.

The brick church was burned in 1840. Then for years the Methodists worshipped in Town Hall. The present church was constructed in 1851. From 1883 to 1885 the church was repaired and enlarged, adding memorial windows. The present parsonage was received as a legacy from Dr. Harriet Ames Rundell in 1897.

When the centennial was celebrated in 1908, the church had grown from five to 332 members, with twenty descendants of Minerva Ames present. In 1926 a new chapel costing $15,000 was added. In 1943 the church had four missionaries in CHINA and JAPAN. In 1947 the sanctuary was repaired and renovated.

For two separate periods the Sunday school rooms were used by the Mexico Academy and Central School while erecting new school buildings. Again in 1957 the church was remodeled, and rededicated Nov. 3, 1957.

In 1970 Mexico First Church had 566 members and church property valued at $236,623.

JESSE A. EARL

MEYER, LUCY RIDER (1849-1922), founder of the Chicago Training School for Mission and Social Service and of the Deaconess Order of the M. E. Church, was born Sept. 1, 1849, in New Haven, Vt., the daughter of Richard D. and Jane (Child) Rider. She held degrees from Oberlin College (A.B., 1872; A.M., 1880), and the Woman's Medical College of NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY (M.D., 1887), and she did graduate study in the Divinity School of the University of Chicago. On May 21, 1885, she married Josiah S. Meyer, and they had one son.

At fourteen Lucy joined the Methodist church at Weybridge, Vt. As a young woman she taught school in several places, including one year at GREENSBORO, N. C., in a freedmen's school supported by Quakers. She later wrote a number of Negro Spirituals which won recognition.

After graduating from Oberlin she entered medical school because her fiancé was training to go out as a medical missionary. Because of his untimely death in 1875 she returned to her parents' home in VERMONT. As a teacher in the local Sunday school she prepared Bible readings and lists of questions for her pupils, and soon was contributing to Methodist Sunday school periodicals, a practice she continued through the years. Her signature, "Lucy J. Rider," became a familiar name in church and Sunday school papers. She copyrighted twenty "Whisper Songs" for children, the words and music bearing her initials.

In 1876 she became "Lady Principal" in the Troy Conference Academy, Poultney, Vt., teaching natural science. After one year she entered Boston School of Technology for further training. Her first book, The Fairy Land of Chemistry, financially her most successful literary effort, was published about that time.

In 1879 she went to McKENDREE COLLEGE, Lebanon, Ill., as professor of chemistry. While there she spent many weekends going to distant towns and cities to address or to help organize Sunday school conventions. In June 1880, she was a delegate to the World Sunday School Convention in London, and returned to become Field Secretary of the Illinois State Sunday School Association, a post that called for travel, speaking, and writing. It was soon said that her presence made any Sunday school convention a notable event. In 1883 she published Children's Meetings, a book that had a large sale for many years.

While serving (four years) with the Sunday School Association, Lucy Rider dreamed of starting a permanent school to train young women for leadership in Christian work and often spoke of the need in public addresses and in private conversation. Disappointed because no school materialized, she resigned from the Sunday School Association and spent the winter of 1884-85 teaching Bible study and music in Dwight L. Moody's school at Northfield, Mass. Also, while in the east she tried unsuccessfully to interest church leaders in New York in helping to found a school. Returning to Chicago in May, she was married. Shortly afterward the Chicago Preachers' Meeting invited her to speak on her plan for a training school. Following her enthusiastic address, a committee composed of ministers and representatives of the two women's missionary societies of the church was appointed.

Assisted by her husband, Lucy Meyer worked and planned feverishly through the summer of 1885 and in October the Chicago Training School for Christian Women, as it was first called, opened with four students. Well informed on the deaconess movement in Europe, Lucy Meyer aimed to train Christian young women who, assured of board, room, laundry and $8 per month, would give full time in ministry to the poor, the orphan, the sick, and the aged. The school's monthly paper, the Deaconess Advocate, told of its work and encouraged financial contributions. As finances permitted, new buildings were erected, and an orphanage, a hospital, and a home for the aged were established. The 1888 GENERAL CONFERENCE recognized deaconess work and provided for a board of deaconesses in the annual conference. A General Board of Deaconesses was set up in 1900, and in 1908 the Methodist Deaconess Association was established with Lucy R. Meyer as secretary. The Chicago Training School reached a peak enrolment in 1910 of 256 and a graduating class of eighty-four.

Controversy swirled around Lucy Meyer through the years. Some objected to her school saying the church and Sunday school could fit young women for such service. The deaconess uniform which she designed was criticized as a step toward Roman Catholicism. Her biggest difficulty was with the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY. Early in its history that organization employed deaconesses, and with some logic it argued that the institution and the movement headed by Lucy Meyer should be under its care and guidance. A capable, independent, strong-minded woman, Mrs. Meyer would not agree. A long struggle, damaging to both sides, ensued for the control of the deaconess movement in the church. In 1903 bishops met with representatives of both sides to no avail. In the 1912 General Conference an impassioned speech by Mrs. Meyer (she was a delegate three times beginning in 1904) won an overwhelming vote for the minority report which kept the work independent. The friction began to subside in 1924 with the formation of the Board of Hospitals, Homes, and Deaconess Work.

Lucy Rider Meyer felt divinely called to educate young women for Christian service. The training school she established in Chicago was her life. All she did and suffered was to the end that the school and the deaconess movement might prosper. At a banquet in New York she was humorously, and yet appropriately, introduced as the "Archbishop of Deaconesses." For more than thirty years she and her husband, a former YMCA secretary whose business ability and practical sagacity complemented her enthusiasm and consecration, gave themselves sacrificially to the school.

A writer of ability, Lucy Meyer published, in addition to the books already mentioned, Deaconesses, Biblical, Early Church, European, American, 1890; The Shorter Bible, 1895; Deaconess Stories, 1900; and a novel, Mary North, 1903. Also, she compiled poems and hymns and wrote a number of articles which were published. In 1918 she was made president emeritus of the training school. She died in Chicago, March 16, 1922.

ALBEA GODBOLD

MIAMI, FLORIDA, U.S.A., today is the largest city in FLORIDA, the county seat of Dade County, and is known the world over as a resort center. About 1870 the first settlers built on the site where Fort Dallas had stood during the Indian War.

The first Methodist service to be held in Miami was in Pierce's sponge warehouse on the banks of Biscayne Bay sometime in 1892. C. W. White, who served the Indian River Mission and who came to Miami monthly by stage-coach or boat, helped this congregation to build a church in 1893. The church was located on the Military Trail at an Indian trail crossing. At this site a little community was emerging known as Lemon City, so the new church took the name of Lemon City Methodist Church, by which it was known until 1934 when its name was changed to Grace Methodist. The first service was held in this church on Easter Sunday, 1893. At this time the present downtown Miami was little more than a jungle where only seven white people lived. Lemon City, however, had a thriving population of 300 inhabitants.

On April 15, 1896 the last spike was driven on the Henry Flagler railroad line to Miami. Pioneers began to pour into the area and the pines and palmetto scrub gave way to a city of tents and rough pine board houses. In October of 1896, Levi L. Fisher, the presiding elder of the Jacksonville District of the ST. JOHN'S RIVER CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, arrived in Miami to take a boat to Key West. While he was waiting passage on the boat, he began talking with some fishermen who were mending their nets. While chatting with them he asked, "Are there any Methodists living along the River?" A houseboat was pointed out belonging to Bill Wilson, who they said was a Methodist. The presiding elder visited the Wilsons and stirred them up about starting a Methodist Church. A month later, on Nov. 15, 1896, fifteen persons met on Wilson's houseboat and organized the M. E. Church in Miami. E. V. Blackman was appointed as pastor of this work. Shortly after he arrived he went to Henry M. Flagler, the capitalist, and persuaded him to donate a lot for the building of a M. E. Church and at the same time he secured donations of land for a Baptist Church and for the M. E. Church, South. Flagler had several years earlier given $200 to help build the Lemon City Church.

In December of 1896, James Bolton was sent to Miami by the M. E. Church, South to the Biscayne Mission embracing Lemon City, Miami and Coconut Grove; however, that year nothing was done to organize a church in Miami itself. It was a year later when Fred Blackburn was appointed to Miami in 1898, that the M. E. Church, South was organized. He visited through the community trying to ride through the wagon-rutted sand roads on a bicycle.

The M. E. Church and the M. E. Church, South both began their work under the name of First Methodist Church. In 1912 a new church and parsonage was built by the M. E. Church at a cost of $87,000. This new church was named White Temple. In 1914 the M. E. Church, South erected a new building at a cost of $44,100, and its name was changed to Trinity. Lemon City, Trinity and White Temple became mother churches for numbers of mission churches as the Miami area grew. By 1939, at the time of Methodist union there were eleven appointments in the greater Miami area made by the M. E. Church, South and six by the M. E. Church. Both churches had a Miami District.

As the city grew, the number of Methodist churches increased. By 1945 there were twenty-one churches with a total membership of 11,152. By 1970 the number of appointments had increased to thirty-seven with a total of 30,645 members.

First Church. Trinity Church was for sixty-eight years the historic downtown church of southern Methodism, mother church to a number of thriving Miami area churches and one of the most prolific churches in giving of her sons and daughters to the ministry. In 1966, Trinity Church united with White Temple Church which was located just two blocks away, to form the First Methodist Church of Miami. The name is significant in that both Trinity and White Temple were originally organized as First Methodist Church, White Temple in 1896, and Trinity in 1898. The "new" Church has 1,916 members and is presently engaged in a building program to erect a center of Methodism and Protestantism for downtown Miami which will cost in excess of a million dollars.

CLARENCE M. YATES

MICHALSON, CARL (1915-1965), American theologian, author and teacher, was born in Waverly, Minn., June 29, 1915, son of Carl D. and Gertrude K. (Leuzinger)

Michalson. He was educated at John Fletcher College, B.A., 1936; DREW UNIVERSITY, B.D., 1939, M.A., 1940; Yale University, Ph.D., 1945.

He was admitted on trial into the MINNESOTA CONFERENCE, M. E. Church, 1938, ordained deacon 1939, received in full connection and ordained elder 1940.

He was a pastor in Iowa, 1935-36; Teabo, N. J., 1938-40; New Hyde Park, N. Y., 1941-43, and then became professor in DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in 1943. He soon came into prominence as a theologian and lecturer. He was visiting lecturer in SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY the summer of 1955, and in Tokyo Union Theological Seminary, JAPAN, 1958. He served as a member of the Board of Governors of the Council for Clinical Training, Theological Foundation for Southeast Asia; as member of the American Theological Society, American Philosophical Association, and of the Society for Theological Discussion. He wrote during these years Faith for Personal Crises, 1958; The Hinge of History, 1959; Japanese Contributions to Christian Theology, 1960; The Witness to Kierkegaard (Editor), 1960; The Rationality of Faith, 1963.

He was married to Janet Aloyse Merrill, May 30, 1944. Their children are Karen and Steven.

Michalson was tragically killed in a plane accident on Nov. 8, 1965, while enroute to address an educational gathering. In 1967 a collection of his essays was published posthumously under the title Worldly Theology—The Hermeneutical Focus of an Historical Faith. His work and influence were outlined and evaluated in appreciative articles and reviews in such journals as The Christian Century and Religion in Life following his untimely demise.

MICHIGAN, one of the north central states, is divided into two peninsulas, and is nearly surrounded by the Great Lakes. The name is derived from the Indian "Mishigamaw," which means "Great Water." The state ranks eleventh or twenty-third in size, 96,720 square miles or 57,022, according to whether one includes that part of the Great Lakes over which the commonwealth has undisputed possession. It has 3,121 miles of coastline, more than any state save Alaska.

During the colonial period Michigan was explored and settled by French missionaries and fur traders. They established settlements at SAULT STE. MARIE (1668), the Straits of Mackinac (1671), and DETROIT (1701). In 1760-61, during the French and Indian War, Michigan passed from French to British control. Title to what is now Michigan went to the United States at the close of the Revolution.

At first a part of the Northwest Territory, then of INDIANA Territory, Michigan was organized as a separate Territory in 1805, and was admitted to the Union in 1837. On the completion of the Erie Canal in 1825, a tide of immigration flowed into Michigan. In 1830 the population was 31,639.

Michigan ranks high in agriculture, tourism, mining, and manufacturing. With the rise of the automobile industry in the twentieth century, the population grew rapidly—2,800,000 in 1910, over 5,000,000 by 1940, and 8,778,187 in 1970. Michigan was called the "arsenal of democracy" in the second world war.

The first Methodist preacher in Michigan was Daniel Freeman who came from CANADA in the spring of 1804 and preached several times. Later in the same year NATHAN BANGS delivered several sermons in Detroit. Methodism was established in the Territory by WILLIAM CASE of the NEW YORK CONFERENCE in 1809 when he made Detroit a regular preaching point on his circuit which covered southwestern Ontario. In the fall of 1810, William Mitchell, a member of the WESTERN CONFERENCE, organized a class of seven members in Detroit. The Detroit Circuit of the Upper Canada District reported 134 members in 1812, of whom about fifty were in Michigan.

During the war years of 1812 and 1815 there was no Methodist preacher in Michigan and the work became disordered. In 1815 when Joseph Hickcox of the GENESEE CONFERENCE was appointed to the Detroit Circuit, he found the original seven members in the town still faithful but he declared that even so the place was a "sink of iniquity." His three-weeks circuit, 300 miles around, had three preaching places in Michigan.

The first Methodist church edifice (the first Protestant church) in Michigan was built in March 1818, on the River Rouge six miles west of Detroit in what is now east Dearborn. The structure, some 24 by 30 feet, was of logs, and it had rough benches for seats; it was in use for ten years.

The Methodist work in Michigan was in the Upper Canada District of the Genesee Conference until 1820, when the GENERAL CONFERENCE placed Michigan Territory in the OHIO CONFERENCE. By 1824 the Detroit Circuit had 242 members. In 1835 two districts were established in the Territory.

In 1836, the Ohio Conference was divided to form the Michigan Conference which included the two districts in Michigan and four in northern Ohio. The conference was organized Sept. 7, 1836 at Mansfield, Ohio, with Bishop JOSHUA SOULE presiding. At the outset the conference had two stations and twenty circuits. The two Michigan districts had 4,044 members. A few appointments in southwestern Michigan were in the La Porte District of the INDIANA CONFERENCE from 1832 to 1840.

In 1840 the Michigan Conference was limited to the state of Michigan and at the time it had seventy-eight ministers and 11,523 members.

JOHN CLARK of the New York Conference began mission work among the Indians in the upper peninsula in 1832. The conference took charge of the mission in 1837. Copper mining began in the state in 1844, and in 1847 JOHN PITEZEL, an Indian missionary, was appointed to work among the miners. In time there were five appointments in the Indian Mission District, including one at Sandy Lake, Minnesota. JUDSON COLLINS went from Albion as a missionary to CHINA in 1847.

In 1835, on the request of several Michigan Conference leaders, the state legislature issued a charter for a college. Wesleyan Seminary opened at Albion in 1843 and became ALBION COLLEGE in 1861.

In 1856, the Michigan Conference was divided to form the DETROIT CONFERENCE which covered the eastern half of the lower peninsula and all of the upper peninsula. At the time the state had 21,378 Methodists.

The Michigan Christian Advocate, a weekly, was established in 1874. With a circulation of nearly 30,000, it is today the only independent Methodist paper in the North Central JURISDICTION and the only Protestant weekly in Michigan.

In 1876 the two conferences chose Bay View as the location for an annual state-wide camp meeting, and it continues as an important summer religious and cultural center. In 1906 the Michigan Conference established the Clarke Memorial Home for the Aged in Grand Rapids, and the Detroit Conference started a similar institution at Chelsea. In 1962 the latter conference established another home in Detroit. The two conferences acquired Bronson Hospital in Kalamazoo and the Methodist Children's Village near Detroit in 1920. In 1939 with Methodist unification the conferences acquired ADRIAN COLLEGE, a former Methodist Protestant school. There are now ten WESLEY FOUNDATIONS in Michigan. Both conferences have camps and extensive camping programs.

In 1900 there were approximately 100,000 Methodists in Michigan rather evenly divided between the two conferences. After that date, due in part to the rapid rise of the automobile industry, the Detroit Conference forged ahead. By 1929 it had some 103,000 members to about 65,000 for the Michigan Conference.

In 1933, when the Chicago Northwest Conference (German) was absorbed by the English-speaking conferences in several states, the two Michigan conferences received seventeen of the German churches. Methodist unification in 1939 brought fifty-seven Methodist Protestant pastoral charges with 3,426 members into the conferences. In 1942 some eleven Swedish churches came in when the Central Northwest Conference (Swedish) was absorbed. In 1958, two churches from the LEXINGTON CONFERENCE, Central Jurisdiction, were received into the Detroit Conference, and nine more came in 1964 when the Lexington Conference was absorbed.

Between 1940 and 1955 the population of Michigan increased 37.7 per cent and the Methodist membership grew 31 per cent. The rapid growth of suburban areas, the decline of inner city areas, and the loss of population in the lumbering, mining, and agricultural areas of the state, have posed problems for Michigan Methodism. The conferences had campaigns for funds for church extension in 1953 and 1955. In 1962 they projected a united crusade for money to undergird Albion and Adrian Colleges and GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

In 1970 the two Michigan conferences had a total of thirteen districts, 1,014 churches, 163,541 church school pupils, 300,428 church members, and property valued at $201,359,752.

MICHIGAN CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE. The town of Adrian, Mich., was the birthplace of two Michigan Christian Advocates. In 1851 J. V. Watson published a paper by that name. Shortly thereafter he moved to CHICAGO, taking with him the paper which became the Northwestern Christian Advocate.

Twenty-two years later in 1873, another clergyman by the name of Orrin Whitmore, presiding elder of the then Adrian District, broadened the scope of his Adrian District Methodist, a monthly publication, into a paper for all of Michigan Methodists entitled The Michigan Christian Advocate. By a striking coincidence the second Michigan Christian Advocate was edited in the same Adrian office as the first. Whitmore's monthly paper did not seem to meet the need or come up to the expectations of Michigan Methodists. Finally the matter was brought before the Annual Conference which recommended by a strong vote that a weekly paper be published.

The next question was: Who would publish it? After considerable discussion among prominent laymen and ministers it was decided to form a stock company to be known as The Methodist Publishing Company whose purpose was to print a religious newspaper called the Michigan Christian Advocate. Book and job printing were also a function of that company. DETROIT was to be its headquarters. Capital stock totaled $10,000 and was divided into 100 shares of $100 each. Two days before Christmas in 1874 final organization of the company was effected at Detroit and the Michigan Christian Advocate was launched upon its illustrious career.

Ten years after the Advocate was born a campaign boosted its circulation from 6,000 to 10,000. From there it went to 14,000, 15,000 and finally 18,000. In those days subscriptions were carried many months beyond expiration date. It was a common practice until postal regulations outlawed it. So the 18,000 was hardly comparable to a similar figure today, but it was a noteworthy attainment.

From 1886 until the end of the First World War the Publishing Company made money and gave its profits to the retired ministers' pension fund. Associate editor, Elmer Houser, wrote in 1933 that the gifts to the pension fund totaled $93,000.

All this time the paper was actually under the direction of the private corporation, run by dedicated laymen and ministers who had the interests of the church at heart, and regarded the Advocate as a service they were glad to perform. However, following the First World War in 1919, it seemed fitting that the stock company be dissolved. This was done and the Advocate's equipment, assets and subscription list were given outright to the two annual conferences of the Michigan Area, namely, the DETROIT and MICHIGAN CONFERENCES. A board of eight ministerial trustees, four from each conference, were elected by the conferences and became responsible for publishing and operating the job printing business which augmented the Advocate's income.

For many years Zion's Herald, published in BOSTON, and the Michigan Christian Advocate were the only "independent" weekly Methodist periodicals published in the Northern part of the Church. The others were under GENERAL CONFERENCE control. Zion's Herald continues as a monthly, leaving the Advocate the only one in the North publishing with weekly frequency. (Some years ago the Advocate started publishing forty-six issues a year, skipping every other week during the summer period. This policy continues.)

The editors of the Advocate invariably have been ministers. Yet it must be said that the longest and perhaps the most distinguished service ever rendered the Advocate was by a consecrated layman.

The first editor after the Publishing Company was formed was Orrin Whitmore, who continued in this capacity until his appointment in 1876 to a pastorate in Saline, Mich.

There were at least two in those early days who were called "Editor-in-Chief." One was L. R. FISKE, one-time president of ALBION COLLEGE, and J. M. ARNOLD. The latter managed a private bookstore in Detroit, which was later purchased by the Methodist BOOK CONCERN, probably in November of 1886. Today the Detroit Cokesbury bookstore of the METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE is the outgrowth of that original purchase. In addition to managing his bookstore, Arnold became Business Manager and Assistant Editor of the Advocate and finally its Editor-in-Chief.

To J. H. POTTS belongs the distinction of being editor for the longest period. He was a towering figure of over six feet in height—a member of the Michigan Conference. For forty years (1877-1917) his pen worked overtime for the Advocate, and his trumpet-like voice resounded throughout the state as he was called upon to speak in its various pulpits. He was also a strong liberal voice in the General Conference and crossed verbal swords with another distinguished editor, JAMES M. BUCKLEY, on the issue of seating women in that body. Potts won.

The next editor was picked from the Detroit Conference and served briefly during the difficult years of the First World War. He was Frank F. Fitchett, who was stricken in health and was forced to retire in 1920.

The Advocate trustees again turned to the Michigan

Conference for someone to fill the vacancy. This time their choice was William H. Phelps, who had served as pastor and district superintendent, and is remembered by many Michigan Methodists for his kindly spirit and unquenchable wit. His editorship covered a period when Biblical controversy raged, and when the devastating depression took a heavy toll of church papers. For nineteen years (1920-1939) he stood serene amid these storms which he made easier to endure by his never-ending sense of humor. Like his predecessor, he retired because of ill health and died shortly thereafter.

Following him is the present editor, John E. Marvin, who came to the editorship in 1939 from three years' experience as Associate Editor. He is a son of the Methodist parsonage and served several churches in the Detroit Conference before joining the Advocate staff.

In its Associate Editors, the Advocate has always been blessed with both editorial and business ability. Only the following are mentioned: JOSEPH F. BERRY, who became editor of the Epworth Herald and later a bishop; James E. Jacklin, who was the moving spirit in founding Chelsea Home, a Detroit Conference institution for the elderly, and who served the Advocate for twenty-four years; Elmer Houser, a Methodist layman who served for a total of fifty years as circulation manager, bookkeeper, business manager and finally as Associate Editor.

In the summer of 1941 the Advocate returned to Adrian, the place of its birth, after a Detroit sojourn of about sixty-seven years. The circumstances of this return represent a unique undertaking in Methodist history. The biggest influence leading up to this event was the unification of the Northern, Southern and M. P. branches of Methodism in 1939. Two M. P. institutions played a major role in the Advocate's transition—the former M. P. Publishing House in PITTSBURGH, and Adrian College.

After unification it was decided to discontinue the Pittsburgh publishing plant and to give to Adrian College certain pieces of printing equipment. This seemed natural because both institutions had been affiliated with the M. P. branch of the now united Church. It was Samuel J. Harrison, then president of Adrian College, who saw the possibilities of setting up a printing plant carried on by the College as a part of the student self-help program. He also saw the possibility of bringing the Advocate to Adrian's campus and pooling the equipment of both printing establishments to form what came to be known as the Adrian College Press.

A change in college administration in 1959, and the lack of adequate space for printing facilities and editorial offices resulted in the Advocate moving to a new location in the same town. A Methodist layman, Robert Tuttle, who had managed the Adrian College Press, joined with another layman, Donald Swenk, to form a printing business which leased certain pieces of Advocate equipment, and continued to print the paper under a contractual arrangement.

As time passed, the Advocate board was enlarged to include an equal number of laymen and ministers from both the sponsoring conferences. Circulation reached its lowest point in the depression of the 30's when it dropped to 8,000. Since then, it has climbed slowly but surely to reach its current listing of over 28,000—the highest in its 93-year history.

The content of the publication is described by its statement on the cover, "The Newsmagazine of Michigan Methodists." While it majors on local, state, national and world news of Methodism in particular, and of Christendom in general, it is also an opinion magazine dealing with current issues, many of them highly controversial. The policy is thoroughly democratic, however, allowing for the widest possible latitude of opinion on a variety of moral and religious subjects.

This liberal editorial policy has kept the Advocate's editors in the center of current debate whatever the issue. When Phelps was editor, he was accused of heresy, and actually investigated by a committee from his conference—but given a clean bill of theological health. In characteristic humor he boasted to his last days that he was the only minister in his conference who was orthodox because he had a committee's report to prove it! This incident will illustrate the freedom practiced by Michigan Christian Advocate editors through the years of the modernist-fundamentalist controversy, and in the more recent times of social and political turmoil. Besides news and opinion, the Advocate has carried a limited amount of promotional material, but has always been careful to avoid becoming a purely promotional type publication.

MICHIGAN CONFERENCE was formed in 1836 by dividing the OHIO CONFERENCE. (See MICHIGAN for account of early Methodism in the state.) At the beginning the conference had two districts in Michigan and four in OHIO. The two Michigan districts had 4,044 members. The first session of the conference was held at Mansfield, Ohio, Sept. 7, 1836, with Bishop JOSHUA SOULE presiding. Beginning in 1840, the conference was limited to Michigan, and at that time it had seventy-eight ministers and 11,523 members.

In 1856, the DETROIT CONFERENCE was formed by dividing the state and thereafter the Michigan Conference was limited to the west half of the lower peninsula. The division left the conference with ninety-one ministers and 10,623 members. Down to 1900 the two conferences were about equal in numerical strength, but thereafter the increasing population in the Detroit area, due largely to the rise of the automobile industry, caused the Detroit Conference to forge ahead.

In 1931 when the Michigan Conference had approximately 64,000 members, it reduced the number of its districts from six to five. In 1968 with a membership of more than 105,000 a sixth district was again created. The names of the districts are: Albion, Kalamazoo, Lansing, Grand Rapids, Central Michigan, and Grand Traverse.

In 1969 the name was changed to West Michigan Conference and in 1970 the Conference reported 464 churches, 110,906 members, 67,401 enrolled in Church schools, and property valued at $73,632,842.

MICHIGAN CONFERENCE (EUB) was organized in Grand Rapids, Mich. in June 1951, following the 1946 union of The EVANGELICAL CHURCH and the Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST. It brought together the work of the former denominations in MICHIGAN.

The work of The Evangelical Church had begun in Michigan in 1838, when Solomon Altimos, a minister of the East Pennsylvania Conference, settled in Ash Township near Flat Rock, in the southeastern corner of the state. He began to preach in the area and also traveled across southern Michigan as far as St. Joseph County. In 1845, a mission was formed near Ann Arbor by the Ohio Conference. About this time, work was started in southwestern Michigan by both the Indiana and Illinois Conferences. The GENERAL CONFERENCE of The Evangelical Church, meeting in Buffalo, N. Y., in 1863, ordered the organization of the Michigan Conference, its boundaries to include all of the state of Michigan, that portion of the state of Ohio lying north of the Maumee River, and a narrow strip from the northern edge of the state of Indiana. The organization was accomplished in May, 1864, at the session of the Ohio Conference, meeting in Carey, Ohio, with the first regular session of the Michigan Conference being held in April, 1865, in the Beagle Church, near Blissfield. This infant conference of sixteen churches and 1,414 members (1865) enjoyed steady growth through the years, first in the rural areas and later spreading to the rapidly growing urban centers. By 1950 there were 124 organized congregations and 14,946 members. The conference boundaries remained virtually unchanged during this period.

In 1831, the Wabash Conference of the United Brethren Church assigned William Davis to travel the St. Joseph Circuit, which included St. Joseph, Cass, and Berrien Counties in southwestern Michigan, along with some territory in northern INDIANA. Shortly thereafter, a group was meeting in Brown's Tavern in Berrien Springs but no permanent work was established until 1845. In 1838, the Ohio Sandusky Conference appointed Stephen Lillybridge to the Michigan Mission, an area in the southeastern corner of Michigan; but no permanent work was established here until 1848.

The General Conference of the United Brethren Church across the years took a number of actions affecting conference boundaries in Michigan; but these actions involved only the lower peninsula of the state, for no work was ever begun in the upper peninsula. In 1845, the territory of Michigan was divided east and west, that part lying north of Ohio being given to the Sandusky Conference, and the part north of Indiana to the St. Joseph Conference. Work progressed so that by 1853, the Michigan Conference, a mission conference including all of the state except the southwest corner, was authorized. The southwest corner, including St. Joseph, Berrien, and Cass Counties, remained with the St. Joseph Conference. In 1857, Michigan became a self-supporting conference. 1861 saw a major revision of boundaries as Michigan Conference was given the bottom two rows of counties in the state plus the Maumee District of the Sandusky Conference. St. Joseph Conference maintained its corner while all the state north of the two rows of counties was organized as the North Michigan Conference. This arrangement held until 1869, when the Michigan Conference became the North Ohio Conference and was given only the southernmost row of counties in Michigan. The rest of the area was assigned to the northern conference which was renamed Michigan. In 1877, the state was again divided north and south with the division line running through Grand Rapids and Flint. The southern portion was named the Michigan Conference and the northern portion was called the Saginaw Mission Conference, a name which was changed four years later to North Michigan Conference when it became self-supporting. Following the division of the United Brethren Church (1889), Michigan and North Michigan were consolidated into one Michigan Conference (1897) and, in 1901, St. Joseph Conference gave its corner of the state to the Michigan Conference. This boundary was then maintained until the conference union of 1951, but the many divisions over the years contributed to slow growth. By 1950, there were 39 organized congregations and 4,993 members.

The Michigan Conference of The Evangelical United Brethren Church had 21,830 members in 1968. There were 113 charges and a total of 133 churches. Ministerial membership was 180 in all classes. The conference was divided into two districts, with a residence for the East District Superintendent in Detroit, and a residence for the West District Superintendent in Grand Rapids. The conference office was maintained in Lansing. The total value of church property in Michigan was $14,009,626. $2,732,510 was paid out for all purposes in 1967.

In 1969, the conference united with the Detroit and West Michigan Conferences of the former Methodist Church to form the present Detroit and West Michigan Conferences.

MICHIGAN CONFERENCE (MP) was organized in July 1842, with five itinerant ministers from the Ohio Conference, three circuits, and some 250 church members. James Gay was the first president. In 1858 the conference was divided to form the West Michigan Conference which continued as a separate body until 1908 and was then absorbed by the Michigan Conference.

The Michigan Conference was strongly opposed to slavery. It refused to elect delegates to the M. P. GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1850 because to do so would mean complicity with the evil of slavery. In 1864 the conference passed a strong resolution in support of the Federal government as it prosecuted the war against "rebellion."

Apparently some members of the conference believed that Methodist Protestantism in its enthusiasm for democracy had developed a connection that was too loose for effective church life. In 1873 the conference formed eight subdistricts of five to seven churches with a pastor as chairman of each. The chairman visited the circuits and the quarterly conferences in his subdistrict and was expected to act as the conference president would if he were present. The chairman had no control over the appointments of the preachers unless he was a member of the conference stationing committee. The subdistrict plan proved helpful in promoting missions and finances. There was some opposition to the subdistrict plan; over a period of several decades it was adopted in some years and rejected in others.

Perhaps Methodist Protestantism's most important venture in Michigan was ADRIAN COLLEGE. Chartered in 1839, it became a Wesleyan Methodist school in 1852. In 1859 it was moved from near Jackson to Adrian. In 1862 the trustees voted to invite the Methodist Protestants to cooperate at Adrian. The move seemed logical because at that time there was serious talk of uniting the non-episcopal Methodists in the north and west and because the Methodist Protestants in Ohio, Illinois and Michigan had for some time desired to start a college.

The union plans failed, but the Adrian trustees, caught in a financial crisis, wanted help with the college debt and a proposed endowment fund. The college was put in the hands of the Methodist Protestants by the simple expedient of electing a majority of the trustees from that church. The Methodist Protestants did not pay off the debt nor did they raise the endowment fund, but they took charge of the college. In succeeding decades the institution had a precarious existence, but it managed to survive. At unification in 1939, Adrian College came into The Methodist Church with no debt, an endowment of some $152,000, and a plant valued at $340,000. It has grown to be a first-rate church college.

The Methodist Protestants in Michigan were never numerous, as compared with the membership of the M. P. Church. Their churches were almost altogether in the rural areas and small villages. A congregation of more than 100 members was rare. Simpson's Cyclopaedia, fourth edition, published in 1882, reported two Methodist Protestant conferences in Michigan, 104 itinerant ministers, seventy-two unstationed preachers, 4,352 members, thirty-three churches and thirty-one parsonages valued at $82,490. As a denomination probably the Methodist Protestants exerted an influence beyond what might be expected in view of their small constituency in the state.

In 1938 the Michigan Conference journal reported seventy ministers, fifty-seven churches, 7,630 enrolled in the Sunday schools, 1,038 in the women's societies, and 4,176 church members.

MIDDLEBURG, FLORIDA, U.S.A. Middleburg Methodist Church, a pioneer FLORIDA church, is located twenty-six miles southwest of JACKSONVILLE on State Highway 21. A historical marker gives directions to the church which is located just east of the highway at the place where Highway 21 crosses Black Creek.

The Methodist Church at Middleburg is one of Florida's oldest Protestant congregations with an unbroken line of pastoral appointments dating from 1823, two years after Florida became a Territory of the United States. The local records indicate that Methodist people met prior to that time but no organized church is noted until 1823. It must be remembered that no Protestant worship was permitted under Spanish rule in Florida. The Middleburg Church was cited by the 1963 FLORIDA CONFERENCE for 140 years of continuous service. The building is the oldest in the Florida Conference. It remains an excellent example of church construction in Florida during the pre-Civil War period. As one visits this church and the adjoining cemetery, one feels that one has been transferred back a century and a quarter.

The church structure is of wide clapboards on the exterior and wide random width tongue and grooved ceiling on the inside, all painted white. The nails were wrought by hand at a then nearby forge. The pews are mahogany. All of the lumber was cut from neighboring forests and was dressed by hand. The visible evidence of the drawknife can be observed by all. The labor in the cutting of lumber and the construction of the church was by slaves owned by members of the church.

No major change has been made in the interior of the building since the 1850's. There is a wide center aisle which was designed to separate the men and the women. Two back pews were reserved for the use of the slaves, "that they might have the privilege of joining in the common worship."

Descendants of the early settlers in the Middleburg area, who had received land grants from the King of Spain, are represented in the church membership.

W. VERNON MIDDLETON

MIDDLETON, WILLIAM VERNON (1902-1965), American bishop, was born in Baltimore, Md., Dec. 25, 1902, the son of William F. and Stella (Fort) Middleton. He was educated at DICKINSON COLLEGE (A.B., 1928), New York University (A.M., 1932), and DREW UNIVERSITY (B.D., 1931, and Ph.D., 1946). His honorary degrees were: D.D., LL.D., L.H.D., J.U.D., and Litt.D. He married Miriam Kathleen Horts, June 13, 1931, and they had two children, Patricia Jean and William H. L.

Received on trial in the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE in 1928, Middleton was ordained both deacon and elder in 1930. His pastoral appointments were: Dauphin and Heckton Circuit, 1924-28; Hulmeville, 1928-31; associate, First Church, Germantown, 1931-33; Canadensis, 1934-35; and Narberth, 1935-39. He was pastor of Covenant Church, Philadelphia, and executive secretary of the Philadelphia Missionary and Church Extension Society, 1939-42. From 1942 to 1944, he gave full time to the work of the society. From 1944 to 1960, he served with the Division of National Missions in Philadelphia, first as secretary of the church extension section, 1954-56; and finally as general secretary of the Division, 1956-60.

Middleton was a delegate to the 1956 and 1960

GENERAL CONFERENCES, leading his delegation to the latter. He was a trustee of three Pennsylvania colleges: Dickinson, ALLEGHENY, and LYCOMING. He published two books, Methodism in Alaska and Hawaii, and The Arm of Compassion. Elected bishop in 1960, he was assigned to the Western Pennsylvania Area, renamed the Pittsburgh Area in 1964.

Middleton was recognized as an able administrator. His work as secretary of church extension promoted the growth of Methodism in PUERTO RICO, and today it is the largest Protestant church in the island. As bishop he conducted two successful financial campaigns for church extension in his area. He made a favorable impression as host bishop of the 1964 General Conference at Pittsburgh. He died Nov. 12, 1965 at Minneapolis while en route to a meeting of the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS in Seattle. Burial was at Chambersburg, Pa.

MIDDLETOWN, OHIO, U.S.A. First Church is the direct descendant of the first religious group organized there when a little band of devout Methodists met for worship in the fall of 1805 in the log cabin home of James Grimes, a Methodist local preacher who had migrated from VIRGINIA after serving in the Revolutionary War. Itinerant preachers and such circuit riders as PETER CARTWRIGHT served the growing society, which soon became a member of the Miami Circuit, the first in OHIO. On Sept. 17, 1815, at the OHIO ANNUAL CONFERENCE held in Lebanon, James Grimes, the founder of the Society, was ordained a local preacher by Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY. Participating in the ordination service was WILLIAM MCKENDREE, then the only other American Methodist bishop.

The group outgrew the Grimes cabin and for a time beginning in 1815 met in a new one-room brick school house, the first to be erected in the hamlet. The congregation built its own one-room house of worship in 1829, the first brick church in Middletown. It was dedicated by Bishop JOSHUA SOULE.

In 1849 the group outgrew the one-room church and a two-story brick building forty-two by sixty-seven feet was built at a cost of $3,900. It was dedicated Jan. 20, 1850, by George W. Walker, the presiding elder, and was named Walker Chapel in his honor. The Ohio Annual Conference met in this church in 1880, with Bishop JESSE T. PECK presiding.

After forty years the two-story brick church became inadequate and the present handsome one, the first stone church in Middletown, was erected in 1890, at a cost of over $50,000, and dedicated May 3, 1891, by Bishop ISAAC W. JOYCE.

The church immediately opened Middletown's first public library in one of its rooms. About 1,000 books had been contributed and members served as voluntary librarians.

The Ohio Annual Conference was entertained again in 1892, with Bishop WILLIAM X. NINDE presiding. During its 161-year existence many dedicated ministers have served Middletown church, and one of them, WILBUR E. HAMMAKER (1904-1908), later became a bishop.

Additions and improvements have been made from time to time, the latest in 1953, when a modern three-story educational building adjoining the church was built at a cost of $102,600. The membership in 1970 was 2,190 and the annual budget at that time was in excess of $153,000.

MIDLAND, MICHIGAN, U.S.A. First Church is located in what is called the "City of Beautiful Churches." The present building, the only downtown church, was started in 1950. The sanctuary—a brick, steel and glass structure with balconies—seats 1,000 worshippers. The attention of the worshiper is drawn upward toward the skylighted altar and cross. Through the side walls of plain glass, accentuated by smaller colored panes, the congregation looks out on one side to a landscaped pool and on the other to a cloistered garden. Individual panes in memorial windows express personal concepts of Christian faith.

Fellowship Hall and classrooms are in the lower level. The educational wing and the chapel were consecrated in 1953. The final phase, the construction of improved office, choir, church school, library and caretaker facilities, was completed in 1967. The church complex covers a city block.

Midland became a part of a circuit in 1857 with four members and nine probationers. In 1868 the 40 by 70 frame building was started. This building with renovation and additions served the church until a fire in 1936 forced the 547 members to a new decision.

The membership tripled in the period from 1950 to 1965 and in 1970 stood at 3,427. The church school and youth programs have an average attendance of 1,000. Outstanding is the young leadership in the church and the wide participation in community affairs by many of its members.

The church is a center for Methodist district and conference meetings and also community religious meetings. The architecture and natural setting of the church was arranged to inspire in its membership the concept of growth—growth beyond themselves, beyond walls, beyond this earth, beyond time.

MIDLAND, NORTH CAROLINA, U.S.A. Bethel Church in Cabarrus County was organized in 1782 in Yadkin Circuit, and was put in Salisbury Circuit in 1783-1814. Among the first members were Alexander McLarty and family, by certification from "South End of Kinlyse (or Kintze) (SCOTLAND), 29 July 1773." Margaret McLellan joined in 1783, and David and Mary Taylor, David White and John Garmon in 1784.

"Taylor's Meetinghouse" became "Bethel" about 1808 with the first deed and a new log church. Under the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE until 1815, Bethel was then put on Sugar Creek Circuit and its successors in the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE until 1870. Then it went into the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE until 1890, when the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE was organized. Associated with Clear Creek Circuit until 1906, Bethel was then on two-point charges with Mill Grove, Big Lick, and Bogers until it became a permanent station appointment in 1946.

Bethel was rebuilt about 1850 and in 1924. The 1970 membership was 274 and the property is valued at $121,300. Nine men have gone into the ministry from Bethel.

MIDLAND, TEXAS, U.S.A., is the only city or town in Midland County. The county was organized in 1885. It is traditionally ranching country, but in recent years vast oil resources have been discovered, and today several major oil companies maintain regional offices in Midland. The First Methodist Church was organized in Midland in August 1885, with seven charter members, six women and one man. There are now five Methodist churches in Midland with a total membership of 6,225. First Church, the mother church, is the largest, with a membership of 2,288 and a Church school enrollment of 1,374. The first building was a small frame structure erected in 1889. The present church building is valued at $900,000 and the parsonage at $64,000. A new sanctuary, built in 1967-68, is considered one of the most beautiful in TEXAS.

MIDWEST CITY, OKLAHOMA, U.S.A., Wickline Church.

Twenty-five years ago a town sprang up on a wheat field across from Tinker Air Force Base. A few months later, June 13, 1943, the first Methodist church in this area started in a tent. In the struggling early days of the church, an elderly woman, Mrs. Jeffie Wickline, left all she had to this church in memory of her husband for whom the church was named. The money derived from the estate was a little over $18,000, but the new church found the money and the sacrificial gift an inspiration for a renewed stewardship. Over the next fifteen years, four building projects completed the church plant worth $500,000. The membership has grown from four the first Sunday to 2,417 today.

Seven pastors have given their encouragement to this progress. The pastors were: D. Allen Polen, C. E. Nisbett, Lee Bowles, D. Wesley Doak, Don F. Harrel, Elwyn O. Thurston, H. Ray Baker. Seventeen young men have gone into full-time Christian service.

The church has been known for its progressive ideas. There are no traditions that have to be followed. Wickline Church has assisted in the organization of four new churches in this area. When the new day in education was presented, leaders in children and adult education prepared themselves. Presently youth leaders are pushing the new youth ministry. Wickline is still a young church and eager to find new ways to serve her community.

MRS. ROBERT CARLISLE

MIGUEZ-BONINO, JOSE (1924-), Argentine theologian and educator, was born in Sante Fe, ARGENTINA, to staunch Methodist parents. He received theological training at the FACULTAD EVANGELICA DE TEOLOGIA in BUENOS AIRES. Upon graduation he went to Union Theological Seminary in New York, where he earned B.D., M.A., and Ph.D. degrees.

Prior to launching into a teaching career, he was pastor of the Ramos Mejia (Buenos Aires) and San Rafael (Mendoza) churches. After some years as a professor in the seminary at Buenos Aires, he became president in 1960. Currently he writes articles for theological journals, and he was invited to teach for one semester at Union Seminary, New York, in 1967. He was one of the Methodist observers at the first and third sessions of the Vatican II Ecumenical Council of the Roman Catholic Church.

He is married to the former Noemi Niewenhuyze, and they have three sons.

EDWIN MAYNARD

MILBURN, WILLIAM HENRY (1823-1903), blind chaplain of the United States Congress, was born in PHILADELPHIA, Sept. 26, 1823, the son of Nicholas Milburn. When five years of age, the sight of his left eye was destroyed by a piece of glass thrown by a playmate. The other eye became inflamed and its vision was seriously impaired. By the age of thirty he was totally blind. His family moved to Jacksonville, Ill., in 1838. He entered Illinois College in 1841, but was obliged to leave in 1843 because of poor health. He had been able to read only by holding a book very close to his eyes.

Pioneer Methodist preachers, including the famous PETER CARTWRIGHT, frequented the Milburn home, and young Milburn decided to become a preacher. As an exhorter, in 1843, he accompanied PETER AKERS on a 500-mile circuit. They slept on shuck mattresses laid on cabin floors and ate the food the people offered. Milburn claimed that thereafter he never liked fried chicken, hog, hominy, or corn bread. On Sept. 13, 1843, Milburn was admitted to the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE and appointed to the Winchester Circuit. Two years later he was ordained deacon and appointed agent to raise money for MCKENDREE COLLEGE and a female seminary which later became MACMURRAY COLLEGE. While en route from Wheeling to Cincinnati by boat, he met a group of congressmen whom he reproved for drinking, card playing, and profanity. Impressed, they raised a purse for him and almost immediately (1845) secured his election as chaplain of the House of Representatives. Milburn married, Aug. 13, 1846, and moved to BALTIMORE, though he continued as financial agent for his conference.

Because of poor health, Milburn moved South in 1848, transferred to the ALABAMA CONFERENCE, was ordained elder, and in January 1849, was appointed to Montgomery. After serving there and in Mobile, he went back to Congress as chaplain for one term (1853), and then settled in New York. There he supplied churches, including historic JOHN STREET, and lectured widely in the United States, Canada, and England. About 1862 he took orders in the Protestant Episcopal Church, but in 1878 he was readmitted to the Illinois Conference. Resuming as chaplain of the House of Representatives in 1885, he served until 1893, when he became chaplain of the U.S. Senate. He resigned the latter position in 1902 because of failing health. In 1893 he offered the invocation at the World's Columbian Exposition, and in 1897 he led the opening prayer at Queen Victoria's Diamond Jubilee.

Milburn wrote four books, including Ten Years of Preacher Life, and The Pioneers, Preachers, and People of the Mississippi Valley. As a speaker and writer, his style was simple and undecorated, but it was enlivened by humor and illustration. He traveled 1,500,000 miles lecturing and preaching, and he was the most distinguished blind man of his time. He died at Santa Barbara, Calif., April 10, 1903.

MILES, WILLIAM H. (1828-1892), first bishop of the C. M. E. Church, was born on Dec. 26, 1828, at Springfield, Ky. He was born a slave and owned by Mrs. Mary Miles, who freed him in her will. In 1855, William Miles joined the M. E. Church, South and was licensed to preach in 1857. When the C. M. E. Church was formed in 1870, he was the first to be elected to the office of bishop by the first General Conference. His consecration to the episcopacy was by Bishops McTyeire and Paine of the M. E. Church, South. Bishop Miles served for twenty-two years as the Senior Bishop and was noted as an eloquent preacher. He died on Nov. 14, 1892, at Louisville, Ky.

MILES COLLEGE, Birmingham, Ala., named for Bishop William H. Miles, is a co-educational liberal arts institution. It is the result of early efforts put forth by the C. M. E. Church to establish an educational institution of collegiate rank. The college is considered to have been a development from two high schools—one at Thomasville, established in 1898, and the other one at Booker City (now Docena) established in 1902. These high schools were organized and maintained by the Alabama and North Alabama conferences. The college received its charter from the State of Alabama in 1909.

It grants the Bachelor of Arts and Bachelor of Science degrees.

The governing board consists of twenty-six members, three-fourth of whom must be members of the C. M. E. Church, and three members from the Board of Missions of The United Methodist Church.

Total enrollment is 1,029; total faculty is 105; value of physical plant, $2,740,224; and endowment, $235,447.

MILEY, JOHN (1813-1895), American minister and theologian, was born in Butler County, Ohio, on Christmas day, 1813. He was graduated at Augusta College (A.B., 1834, A.M., 1837), and entered the Church's ministry through the Ohio Conference of the M. E. Church in 1838. He was minister to numerous local churches in Ohio until 1825, when he transferred to the New York East Conference where he remained until 1873, when he was called from his pastorate at Washington Square Church, New York City, to the chair of systematic theology at Drew Theological Seminary. In this position he served as professor and author until his death on Dec. 13, 1895; his funeral was held in the chapel at Drew.

During his years at Drew, Miley not only met the classroom responsibilities attendant upon his professorship, but also assumed the task of propounding a Methodist theology for his day. That theology was set forth in a host of published articles but especially in two discursive works: The Atonement in Christ (1879) and Systematic Theology (in two vols., 1892 and 1894). The former was an explication of the dominant theories of the atonement and a defense of the "Governmental Theory" (which aimed to preserve the justice of God's moral demands) of Grotius, a seventeenth century Arminian statesman and theologian. Miley's Systematic Theology was his effort to present a "Methodist Arminianism" which would theologically differentiate Methodism from Calvinism and Romanism and which would acknowledge the insights and limitations of the science and scientific method of his time. Both of the above books were included in the Conference Course of Study of the M. E. Church, the work on the atonement occupying this honor from 1880 to 1908.

Despite his active life as teacher and theologian, John Miley served as a member of four General Conferences and in 1886 was fraternal delegate to the General Conference of the M. E. Church, South.

PAUL W. MILHOUSE

MILHOUSE, PAUL WILLIAM (1910-), American E.U.B. bishop, churchman and author, was born on Aug. 31, 1910, at St. Francisville, Ill. His formal education was received at Indiana Central College, A.B., 1932, Magna Cum Laude, and at American Theological Seminary, B.D., 1937, and Th.D., 1946. Honorary degrees were conferred on him by Indiana Central, D.D., 1950, and Westmar College, L.H.D., 1965. On June 29, 1932, he married Frances Noblitt; they have three children.

Ordained in the Illinois Conference, Church of the United Brethren in Christ, in 1931, he served churches at Elliott, Olney, and Decatur. He has been statistician, secretary, director of student work, director of youth and young adult camps in the Illinois Conference (EUB). He conducted a religious news television program at Harrisburg, Pa., for one year. Wider churchmanship has been expressed in his presidency of the Ministerial Association and Council of Churches in Decatur; associate editorship of the Telescope-Messenger, 1950-59; executive secretaryship of the General Council of Administration, 1959-60; election to the bishopric in 1960; membership in General Assembly of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, 1961, and in the General Assemblies of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, 1960, '63, and '66. He was a member of the Arbitration Panel in Decatur labor strike, and of the Board of Directors of the Illinois State Council of Churches.

An interest in writing from high school days has found expression in several widely used books. They include Enlisting and Developing Church Leaders, 1946; Come Unto Me, 1947; Except the Lord Built the House, 1949; Doorways to Spiritual Living, 1950; Lift Up Your Eyes, 1955; Christian Worship in Symbol and Ritual, 1953; Laymen in the Church, 1957; At Life's Cross Roads, 1959; and Otterbein, Pioneer Preacher, 1968. He edited Growing Together, 1959, and Facing Frontiers, 1960. Additional writings of his have appeared in numerous periodicals. In The United Methodist Church Bishop Millhouse was assigned to the OKLAHOMA Area.

A. C. MILLAR

MILLAR, ALEXANDER COPELAND (1861-1940), American clergyman, educator and editor, was born at McKeesport, Pa., on May 17, 1861, the son of William John and Ellen (Coven) Millar. He attended CENTRAL COLLEGE in Missouri, receiving the A.B. degree in 1885, and the A.M. in 1889; Wesleyan College, Winchester, Ky., D.D., 1907; HENDRIX COLLEGE, Conway, Ark., D.D., 1940; University of Arkansas, LL.D., 1922. He married Elizabeth Harwood (deceased, May 22, 1924) of Brookfield, Mo., on June 27, 1887, and they had two sons and a daughter. Millar married a second time Susie McKinnon of Jacksonville, Texas, on Oct. 15, 1925.

He was ordained to the ministry of the M. E. Church, South in 1888, after serving for a year as professor of Latin and philosophy at the Neosho, Mo., Collegiate Institute, 1886-87. He became president of the Central Collegiate Institute of Altus, Ark., which was moved later to Conway, Ark., and renamed Hendrix College in 1890. He served as professor of history and economics, Central College, Fayette, Mo., 1902-04; presiding elder, Little Rock District, 1906-10; president of Hendrix College (second time), 1910-13; president of Oklahoma Methodist College, Muskogee, Okla., 1913-14; associate editor of the Western Methodist (now Arkansas Methodist), 1904-14. He was editor-in-chief of the Arkansas Methodist, 1914-40, also serving as presiding elder of the Arkadelphia District, 1931-32.

Millar was head of the good-roads-movement in Arkansas which resulted in the adoption in 1899 of an amendment to the Arkansas Constitution, authorizing counties to levy a road tax. He led a movement to secure legislation regulating college degrees. In the larger church, he was delegate to the Ecumenical Conference on Foreign Missions; a member of the General BOARD OF EDUCATION (MES), 1898-1902; a member of the Educational Commission; of the Arkansas Historical Commission, 1909-13, and again in 1927. He led a special investigation of the Arkansas Penitentiary in 1908; was president of the Arkansas Education Association, 1911. He was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE, MES, five times including 1930; secretary of the Arkansas Forestry Commission, 1924-40; president of the Arkansas Anti-Saloon League, 1923-40; president of the Western Methodist Assembly, 1922-33; vice-president, 1933-40. He was vice-president of the JUDICIAL COUNCIL (MES), 1934-39. He traveled in Latin America, 1920. He died in Little Rock, Ark., on Nov. 9, 1940. He is the author of Twentieth Century Education Problems, 1901; Together (poem), 1910; "My Own Loved Arkansas" (song), 1937.

MILLER, ADAM (1810-1901), American German preacher, was born in MARYLAND, of Mennonite ancestry, having a grandfather and two uncles who were Amish preachers. He grew up in an Amish colony at Shanesville, twenty-five miles from Canton, Ohio. His father, impressed by Joseph McDowell, later an itinerant in the OHIO, ROCK RIVER, and IOWA CONFERENCES, sent Adam to McDowell for English instruction. Influenced by McDowell's preaching, Miller was the first of his family to embrace Methodism. He received an exhorter's license and spent almost two years with McDowell, going to school in summer and teaching in winter. Licensed to preach in 1830, he entered the Ohio Conference of the M. E. Church, in 1831, and was assigned to Nicholas Circuit, VIRGINIA, traveling 350 miles around thirty-one appointments. Also, serving Guyandotte and Point Pleasant circuits, then in Virginia, Miller traveled in Kanawha District for four years.

Removing to INDIANA, he was assigned to Greenville Circuit (1835), West Union Circuit (1836), Milford Circuit (1838), and then to the German Methodists in CINCINNATI and on Lebanon District (1839). In 1840 he was appointed to a regular German District of the CINCINNATI CONFERENCE. Miller, who was the first native American to join WILHELM NAST's ministry to German settlers, helped establish churches in BALTIMORE, NEW-ARK, Rahway, Poughkeepsie, Albany, and BUFFALO.

In 1858, transferring from the Peoria Conference to the Iowa Conference, Adam Miller began teaching in the German Language and Literature Department of IOWA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY. Granted "superannuated or worn-out" status in 1861, he removed to Springfield, Ill.; he then resided almost a decade in CHICAGO and was living in DENVER, Colorado Territory, in 1873. His Iowa Conference membership was terminated by location in 1874. Adam Miller was effective as a preacher for twenty-two years, eight on circuits, one on a station, and thirteen in other appointments, while having fifteen non-effective years.

MILLER, ELIZABETH KUMLER (1835-1908), outstanding American church woman, was born on a farm near Millville, Ohio, Feb. 1, 1835. Her father, Daniel C. Kumler, was one of the three men sent to Africa in 1855 to begin United Brethren Mission work in SIERRA LEONE, West Africa.

She attended the village school, Oxford Female Seminary (now Western College for Women, Oxford, Ohio) and OTTERBEIN COLLEGE, graduating in 1858. One of her classmates at Otterbein College was BENJAMIN R. HANBY, the famous song writer.

After teaching in an integrated village school in Ohio, in 1859 she married John S. Miller and began house-keeping in a log cabin. In 1862 she was called to be principal of the Ladies Department of Otterbein College. She accepted and they moved to Westerville, where her husband died a year later.

In 1880 she came to DAYTON, Ohio to serve the Women's Missionary Association of the Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST. She served in various capacities—as trustee, editor of the Woman's Evangel and national president. It was said of her during these years that "she was the best known and the best loved woman in the Church."

She was a sensitive woman with remarkable insight into the total task of the Church and with a worldwide concern. She was also a poet and a book of her poems was published after her death. Early on Oct. 23, 1908, she died and was laid to rest in Woodland Cemetery, Dayton, Ohio.

MILLER, EMORY (1834-1912), American minister, was born in Mount Pleasant, Pa., on Dec. 23, 1834. He attended Mt. Pleasant College and after moving to Iowa enrolled at the Iowa Conference Seminary (Cornell College) and later took some work at the GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE.

He was admitted to the IOWA ANNUAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in 1858 and served churches, until retirement, in the Iowa Conference, the UPPER IOWA

CONFERENCE, the DES MOINES CONFERENCE, with the years 1860-1861 in the MISSOURI CONFERENCE, and 1882-1885 in the MINNESOTA CONFERENCE. Outstanding pastorates were filled at Cedar Rapids 1863-1864; Davenport 1871-1872; Iowa City 1880-1881; Des Moines 1884-1886; 1905-1907 and Indianola 1887-1891. He was presiding elder of the Davenport District 1868-1870; Cedar Falls District 1875-1879; Des Moines District 1892-1897.

His preaching and expositions of Holy Scripture were especially effective in large urban congregations. Recognized by IOWA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY with an M.A. in 1856, he was twice honored by the State University of Iowa with a D.D. in 1877 and an LL.D. in 1888. A book, The Evolution of Love (1892), received many commendations. During his pastorate at Indianola and after retirement, Miller was a member of the teaching staff at SIMPSON COLLEGE.

He was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1876, 1880, 1892, 1896, 1904 and to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in Washington, 1891. He died in Des Moines on July 3, 1912.

MILLER, FREDERIC K. (1908-), Commissioner of Higher Education for PENNSYLVANIA, was born Nov. 28, 1908, in Lebanon, Pa., to United Brethren parents, the Rev. HARRY E. and Laura (Keiper) MILLER. He earned his A.B. degree at LEBANON VALLEY COLLEGE (1929) and his M.A. (1931) and Ph.D. (1948) at the University of Pennsylvania, where he was an Assistant in History from 1931 to 1933.

After serving as a teacher of social sciences and basketball coach at Lebanon High School (1933-39), he became Chairman of the Department of History at Lebanon Valley College. From 1948 to 1950, he added to his teaching responsibilities the duties of Assistant to the President; and following the death of President Clyde A. Lynch, he served as the Acting President from 1950 to 1951. In 1951, Dr. Miller was elected President of Lebanon Valley College, a position he held until 1967, when he assumed his present post with the Department of Public Instruction of Pennsylvania.

Dr. Miller's tenure as President of Lebanon Valley College was marked by great growth in assets, faculty strength, and academic quality. In addition to the leadership he supplied his Alma Mater, Dr. Miller found time to participate in numerous religious, community, and educational affairs.

He was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the E.U.B. Church from 1954 to 1966; a member of the Board of Publications and Trustee of the OTTERBEIN PRESS, 1955-60; and President of the Historical Society of the Eastern Conference, 1950-66. He holds his membership in the Annville United Methodist Church.

In educational circles, he was a member of the Commission on Higher Education of the Middle Atlantic States Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools, 1960-66; President of the EUB College Administrators, 1957-60; Secretary (1957-61), Vice President (1961-62), and President (1962-63) of the Pennsylvania Association of Colleges and Universities; and Chairman of the Board of the University Center at Harrisburg, 1961-63 and 1966-67.

His participation in community affairs ranges from membership on the Board of Trustees of the Good Samaritan tan Hospital, Lebanon; the Board of Directors of the Lebanon County Chamber of Commerce; and the Lebanon County Unit of the American Cancer Society; the Board of Directors of the Lebanon YMCA to membership on the Student Services Committee and the Executive Committee of the Pennsylvania State YMCA.

Dr. Miller is married to the former Marion Stover of Philadelphia and is the father of a daughter, Janet Louise, wife of Robert N. McLeod. Dr. Miller served with the U.S. Army in the European Theater of Operations, 1943-45. He has been awarded honorary degrees as follows: Litt.D., Muhlenberg College, L.H.D., Dickinson College, LL.D., Lebanon Valley College, and Ped.D., Geneva College.

BRUCE C. SOUDERS

MILLER, GEORGE (1774-1816), was one of the first two ordained men to become associated with JACOB ALBRIGHT, founder of the "Evangelische Gemeinschaft" in PENNSYLVANIA at the opening of the nineteenth century. The other of the two was JOHN WALTER.

George Miller was born Feb. 16, 1774, at Pottstown, Montgomery Co., Pa., and died April 5, 1816, in Union township, Union County of that state. He is buried at New Berlin, Pa.

In his childhood, the parents, Jacob and Elizabeth Miller, moved to Alsace township, Berks County, where the father died when George was but eleven years of age. He had erected and was operating a grist mill at the time of his death. The business proved to be a valuable source of income for the family. There were two other sons in the family, John and Solomon. The family was of the Lutheran faith.

George Miller suffered a confining illness at the age of twelve. He reported that this experience resulted in a new sense of respect for his mother and led him to read through the entire Bible by the age of eighteen. Regaining his health, he received catechetical instruction from a Lutheran pastor of Reading, Pa. Although sensing an urgency toward the abiding spiritual values of life, he was also at times beset with temptations common to youth of his age.

At the age of nineteen, Miller took up residence with his brother John and soon became a master millwright, fully informed on the construction of grist mills and the milling business. In 1798 he purchased a tract of land in Brunswick township, Schuylkill County, where he erected and operated his own mill. In 1800 he was married to Magdalena Brobst, at which time they erected their own home near the mill site.

It was in the years of early 1796 that Jacob Albright began his itinerant preaching in eastern Pennsylvania. In 1798, Miller first heard Albright speak and was deeply impressed. In 1802, while Miller was operating his own milling business, Albright called one evening and asked for night's lodging. He was invited to preach in the Miller home.

On June 2, 1802, while at work in his own mill, George Miller made a complete surrender to God. Both his wife and brother Solomon embraced the Christian faith under the early influences of Jacob Albright and John Walter. A class was established of which he became the leader.

In 1805 Miller sold his land and mill properties and entered into full-time itinerant Christian work under the direction of Albright and Walter. His first assignment covered work in Lancaster, Dauphin and Berks counties.

The first Annual Conference of the newly emerging church was held at Muhlbach (now Kleinfeltersville), Lebanon County, in 1807. At this session Miller was ordained elder.

In the early 1800's Miller became afflicted with intermittent illness. After 1809 he could accept no definite assignment to the pastorate. Having some literary ability and upon the urging of his fellow pastors, he accepted the responsibility of writing the newly projected Discipline which Jacob Albright had not been able to carry through. This historic original draft of seventy-five pages was completed in 1809. Shortly thereafter he compiled a "book of rules" for Conference business. In succession he wrote Practical Christianity, a short biography of Jacob Albright, and then his own autobiography. Much of this work was done on a small printing press in his own home.

WILLIAM C. F. HAYES

MILLER, GEORGE AMOS (1868-1961), American bishop, was born in Mendon, Ill., July 8, 1868, the oldest of four children of Martin and Ardalissa Dryer Miller. The family moved to CALIFORNIA, where the father became a pioneer in early California Methodism, serving churches in the Sacramento and San Joaquin Valleys, farming virgin soil to support his family.

George Miller attended the University of Southern California and later graduated from Stanford. In 1895 he married Margaret Ross and they had two daughters.

He was ordained in 1896 and served pastorates in Hanford, Calif. (1896-1900) and Fresno First Church (1900-04), a church founded by his father. He went to Central Church in MANILA, P. I. (1905-07), returning to the States to lecture and do field work with the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY (1907-08). He served Hamilton Church, SAN FRANCISCO (1908-09), and First Church, SAN JOSE (1909-14), Grace Church, San Francisco (1914-16), and then, sent by California Epworth Leaguers, he went to PANAMA as Mission Superintendent (1917-19), pioneering Methodist work in COSTA RICA. He then became Executive Secretary of Mission Work in South America for the M. E. Church. In 1924 he was elected to the episcopacy at the GENERAL CONFERENCE of that church held in Springfield, Mass., though he was not a delegate to the Conference.

Bishop Miller served one quadrennium each from headquarters in MEXICO CITY, BUENOS AIRES, and SANTIAGO. He retired in 1934, served a local church in Lafayette, Calif., and continued his interest in Spanish American missions. He raised funds for and established the Training School for Christian workers in Costa Rica. He died Oct. 12, 1961, his wife, who had greatly helped him through the years, predeceasing him.

Bishop Miller's service, in line with nationalistic trends the world over, spanned the years when Methodism moved into an era of increasing self-administration, self-extension and self-support, on the mission field. He turned over to "national" bishops, one by one, the three episcopal areas in Spanish America, bringing to a close the period of church administration from the United States.

Before modern travel facilities, Bishop Miller traveled up and down the hemisphere on burro-back, by cattle boat, through tropical jungles and over blizzard swept mountains, enduring at times the miseries of altitude sickness. He was a gifted and prolific writer, some thirty books in English and Spanish and several blank verse dramatizations of Biblical stories coming from his pen. He was also a musician, playing both string and wind instruments; an artist, who created exquisite wood carvings and charcoal sketches. Many a church benefitted from his versatile skills as organ-builder, expert mechanic, able carpenter, photographer, and printer. His sense of humor never failed, nor did his calm acceptance of life, a prime requisite for a difficult administration with tensions of decreasing depression appropriations and the growing pains of a church moving toward self-direction and maturity.

Among the books written by Bishop Miller were: Interesting Manila; The Life Efficient; China Inside Out; Prouding About Panama; Adventures With Christ in Latin America; Restlessness and Reality; Missionary Morale; Mexico and the Mexicans; and his autobiography, Growing Up, which he wrote when he was ninety-one years of age.

EVELYN MILLER BERGER

MILLER, HARRY E. (1873-1947). American clergyman, pastor of the Salem United Brethren Church, Lebanon, Pa., from 1904 to 1945, one of the longest pastorates on record in the former United Brethren Church.

The son of Isaac and Frederica Schach Miller, Harry Miller was born at Orwin, Pa., June 5, 1873. After moving to Lebanon with his parents, he was converted at the age of twelve in the Memorial United Brethren Church; but he later transferred his membership to the Salem Church, which recommended him for the Quarterly Conference license in 1893. He was ordained in 1899, by the East Pennsylvania Conference, CHURCH OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, the year he received his A.B. degree from LEBANON VALLEY COLLEGE.

In 1903, he graduated from Bonebrake Theological Seminary (now UNITED THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY), Dayton, Ohio, and returned to PENNSYLVANIA where he served as pastor of the Zion Church, Myerstown, for a year before assuming the leadership of his home congregation in 1904. In 1912, he took a M.A. degree at Lebanon Valley College; and in 1916 he was honored with a D.D. degree by the same institution.

During his pastorate, Miller received 1,078 members into the Salem congregation on profession of faith. He was known throughout the denomination as a masterful, sincere preacher and to his congregation as a devoted pastor. He was active in a number of responsible positions in both the East Pennsylvania Conference and the denomination as a whole. Beginning with 1909, he represented his annual conference at GENERAL CONFERENCE eight times; but illness prevented his accepting election to the merging conference of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ and THE EVANGELICAL CHURCH in 1946. He was a Trustee of Lebanon Valley College for twenty-seven years, and a member of a number of agencies of his annual conference throughout his active pastorate.

Miller died Feb. 4, 1947, two years after the Salem congregation had honored him by electing him as Pastor Emeritus. He is buried at the Mt. Lebanon Cemetery, Lebanon. He had been preceded in death in 1941 by his wife, the former Laura Keiper. The Millers were the parents of two sons. Dr. FREDERIC K. MILLER, President of Lebanon Valley College from 1950 to 1967, and the Rev. Paul A. Miller.

BRUCE C. SOUDERS

MILLER, LOIS C. (1918-), daughter of an E.U.B. minister in the Kansas Conference, was born in Wichita, Kan. She received her collegiate education from York College (now WESTMAR COLLEGE), where she received the B.A. degree. Westmar College later gave her an honorary doctorate.

Miss Miller served briefly as a teacher in the NEW MEXICO Mission and ten years in weekday religious education in CALIFORNIA and OHIO. Then followed a three-year service as bookstore manager for the OTTERBEIN PRESS, prior to becoming in 1955 secretary of missionary education for children and youth in the Women's Division, BOARD OF MISSIONS. From 1963 to 1968 she was secretary of Interpretation and Education for the E.U.B. Board of Missions. With the formation of the United Methodist Church in 1968, she became associate general secretary of the Joint Commission on Education and Cultivation, Board of Missions.

A delegate to the 1968 Assembly of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (Uppsala), Dr. Miller was elected to the World Council Central Committee. She has also been active as a member of the Department of Education for Mission, NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in America.

JOHN H. NESS, JR.

MILLER, WILLIAM (1775-1846), American bishop of the A.M.E. ZION CHURCH, was born in Queen Anne County, Md., Aug. 23, 1775. He was converted March 4, 1788, and was licensed to preach in New York City in 1808. He joined the conference June 21, 1821 and was ordained deacon June 22, 1821. He received his elder's orders in 1823 and was elected a superintendent (full) in 1840. He died June 10, 1846. Flood has his death listed in PHILADELPHIA in 1849, while Moore reports his death in the twenty-sixth Conference (New York, 1846). We feel that the first account (June 10, 1849) is therefore incorrect.

DAVID H. BRADLEY

MILLS, ALFRED AVERY (1877-1963), Australian minister and President of the QUEENSLAND CONFERENCE 1930 and 1947, was born in Bendigo, Victoria. He was a diligent minister from 1907-1948. He served as circuit minister, military chaplain, Secretary of Home Missions and Connexional Secretary. He established many circuits, extended the work of the Church and inspired and directed new and aggressive enterprises. He was statesmanlike and zealous in determining the future pattern of the Church in Queensland.

MILLS, EDWARD LAIRD (1875-1959), American minister and church leader, was born on March 30, 1875, at Ryegate, Vt. He was reared and partly educated in the western United States. He graduated from WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in 1898, and from BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY in 1902. Following his ordination in the same year he went to MONTANA where he served various churches until 1910, when he was appointed superintendent of the Butte District of the MONTANA CONFERENCE. In 1914 he became superintendent of the UTAH Mission.

Edward L. Mills was elected superintendent of frontier work under the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension (ME) in 1916, which office he held until 1920, when he was elected editor of the Pacific Christian Advocate, a position he filled admirably until his retirement.

He was author of the book, The Advancing Church, and also Plains, Peaks and Pioneers. The D.D. degree was conferred upon him in 1911 by WILLAMETTE UNIVERSITY and by Wesleyan University, his alma mater, in 1921.

He was a wise and efficient leader, a fearless advocate of civic righteousness, and a keen and constructive ecclesiastical statesman. He died on Nov. 7, 1959.

MILLS, JACOB (1842-1925), American minister, was born Nov. 18, 1842, near Topham, Vt. He lost an arm in the Civil War, then served eleven years in internal revenue and customs. He married Jennie Forrest, Nov. 17, 1870. They had three children: EDWARD LAIRD, George, and Edith. Answering an advertisement by Col. Wilbur F. Sanders, he invested in a horse ranch in Montana. After he was called to preach in 1881, he responded to an appeal by F. A. RIGGIN for ministers for MONTANA, went west in 1882, became the first resident pastor at Fort Benton, built the Benton parsonage and the Sun River church (the first Methodist buildings in northern Montana), and was ordained elder in 1885. He was presiding elder of Bozeman District, 1887-93, and of the Helena District, 1899-1905. He secured the organization of the Great Falls District, later North Montana Mission, and the organization of Kalispell Mission. He was twice delegate to GENERAL CONFERENCE; was conference evangelist, 1907-14, and died at a cottage prayer meeting, Oct. 28, 1925. Burial was at Forestvale Cemetery, Helena.

MILLS, JOB S. (1848-1909), American U.B. minister and bishop, was born Feb. 28, 1848, in Washington County, Ohio, of Quaker ancestry.

He received a license to exhort in 1867, a quarterly conference license to preach in 1868, and joined the Scioto Conference, CHURCH OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, in 1870. He became college pastor at Westerville, Ohio, in 1874, and served a six-year term, and another two-year term later. For a period of time Job Mills was a presiding elder of the Central Ohio Conference. In 1887 he became professor of English literature and rhetoric in Western College, at Toledo, Iowa, when two years later he was made president of that institution, serving three years. This was followed by one year as professor of philosophy there.

Mills was elected bishop in 1893 and re-elected quadrennially until his death in 1909. In 1896, and again in 1903, he embarked on visitation tours to the mission fields in Africa and GERMANY. In 1902 he visited PUERTO RICO. In 1907 he visited the missions in JAPAN, CHINA, and the PHILIPPINES.

Largely through private study and upon examination he received A.M. and Ph.D. degrees. One of his friends said of him, "His messages were backed by the force of clear thinking, full information, and an impressive personality." In 1870 he married Sarah A. Metsgar, who died in 1874. In 1876 he was married to Mary Keister, of Scottsdale, Pa. To them were born two sons and three daughters.

Bishop Mills died at Annville, Pa., Sept. 16, 1909.

MILLSAP, KATHRYN ANNA (1890-), American deaconess, was born in Benton, Kan., on Jan. 30, 1890, the daughter of John Riley Millsap, a Methodist minister in the SOUTHWEST KANSAS CONFERENCE, and Katie E. Dugan.

Miss Millsap attended the Wichita (Kansas) College of Music but, having decided to become a Methodist deaconess, she enrolled in the Kansas City National Training School for Deaconesses and Missionaries (later NATIONAL COLLEGE) and graduated in 1914. She first served as pastor's assistant in St. Paul, Minn., then as missionary on the Carthage (Missouri) District for four years. In 1926-27 she was pastor's assistant at Bethel Church, Wichita. In 1927 the Southwest Kansas Conference appointed her chaplain of Wesley Hospital, Wichita, and she served there continuously until her retirement in 1959. She received specialized training at Wichita University; ILIFF SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY; took clinical training under Dr. Anton Boisen, Elgin (Illinois) State Hospital; and studied at Columbia University and Union Theological Seminary, New York City.

She pioneered in the midwest in new concepts of pastoral care and counseling in hospital ministry, and her work received national recognition. She initiated the organization of Ministers and Physicians Clinic at Wesley Hospital which has met annually since 1944. She was a charter member of the Protestant Hospital Chaplains Association and served as member of hospital committees of national import; she has been called on for addresses at Conferences of Ministers, National Hospital Organizations, Mental Hygiene Societies, Ministers and Physicians Clinics, and other groups.

She was lay delegate from the CENTRAL KANSAS CONFERENCE to the GENERAL CONFERENCE (TMC) and the South Central JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE of 1940. Upon retirement from active service she was appointed Chaplain Emeritus and Consultant to the Chaplain's Department by the Central Kansas Conference.

MARY F. SMITH

MILLSAPS, REUBEN WEBSTER (1833-1916), American layman and philanthropist, was born May 30, 1833, in Copiah County, Miss., a son of Reuben and Lavinia Clowers Millsaps. Young Reuben left his home at the age of seventeen, walked to Natchez, a distance of about sixty miles, where he took passage on a steamboat for Madison, Ind., to enter Hanover College. After two years at Hanover he transferred to DEPAUW UNIVERSITY, from which he graduated in 1854. He went back to MISSISSIPPI and taught school for two years, saving every penny he made so he could go to Harvard Law School. After receiving his law degree at Harvard, he practiced law in Pine Bluff, Ark., from 1858 to the beginning of the Civil War. He saw extensive service in the Confederate Army and came out at the close of the conflict with the rank of major. After his discharge, he returned to south Mississippi and entered the business of cotton buying and transporting. From that he entered merchandising at Brookhaven. In 1880 he sold his business and went to ST. LOUIS, Mo., where he established a wholesale grocery and cotton commission business. In 1885, he returned to Hazlehurst, Miss., and established the Merchants and Planters Bank, then moved to Jackson, Miss., in 1887 and became president of the Capitol State Bank.

In 1869 he married Mrs. Mary F. Younkin, daughter of Horace Bean, a wealthy banker of NEW ORLEANS. They had no children, but reared a niece whom they adopted.

Major Millsaps was a stalwart Methodist and a loyal churchman. He was a constant attendant at the business meetings of the church from the local Church Conference to the GENERAL CONFERENCE. No layman in Mississippi was more frequently elected a delegate to the General Conference than he.

His great work was in laying the foundation for MILLSAPS COLLEGE with an initial gift of $50,000, in 1889. All told, he gave more than ten times that amount to the college which bears his name and took a prominent part in its first Board of Trustees. In addition, he gave the property on which the Mississippi Methodist Children's Home is located, and gave financial help to other educational and religious institutions.

He died on June 28, 1916, and was buried in a mausoleum on the campus of Millsaps College.

MILLSAPS COLLEGE, Jackson, Mississippi, was chartered in 1890. It was named for its chief benefactor, Major REUBEN W. MILLSAPS, a graduate of DEPAUW UNIVERSITY, who offered $50,000 for endowment, provided Methodists of MISSISSIPPI matched it, and who gave to the college additional amounts totaling over $100,000. Its first president was WILLIAM BELTON MURRAH, later a bishop of the M. E. Church, South. Bishop Murrah, Bishop CHARLES GALLOWAY, and Major Millsaps are generally recognized as the founders.

During the 1930's a study of the educational work of Mississippi Methodists resulted in consolidating with Millsaps College the two junior colleges under control of the Methodist Conferences in Mississippi—Grenada College and Whitworth College. In 1966, the Ford Foundation made a challenge grant of $1,500,000 to the college which the college more than met in the subsequent months. It now offers the B.A., B.S. and B.M. (Music) degrees. The governing board has sixteen members elected by the MISSISSIPPI and NORTH MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCES.

MILNE, ANDREW MURRAY (1838-1907), pioneer missionary and South American Bible agent "from Cape Horn to Quito," has been called "the most noted Bible agent of his generation."

Born in SCOTLAND in a pious home, he entered upon a life of consecration to Christ during the religious awakening of 1857-58, and became an active member of the United Presbyterian Church. He came to BUENOS AIRES in secular work and was sent to GUALEQUAY, where he, "though unable to speak the language of the country, embraced early opportunities for distributing gospels and tracts to the lightermen with whom he had to deal." Back in Buenos Aires, Milne was recounting his experiences to WILLIAM GOODFELLOW, whose church he had joined upon arrival in ARGENTINA, when the latter suddenly turned to him and said: "How would you like to be engaged in such work all the time?" Milne replied that it was just the work he would delight in. The AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY had been in correspondence with Goodfellow about opening Bible work in the River Platte region; Milne applied and in February 1864, was appointed agent of the society.

The appointment indicated MONTEVIDEO, but since an agency of the BRITISH and FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY was already there, Milne established himself at ROSARIO, Argentina. From that up-river port he visited new towns and cities. Later (1869-79) he spent eleven years in Montevideo, then came back to Buenos Aires to establish the River Platte Agency in 1880. He wrote in a letter in 1904:

Since the establishment of this agency, there has fallen to the agent the very distinguished honour of planting the flag of the society's permanent operations in all the capitals and in many of the chief cities of the ten republics of South America. . . . In carrying out the instructions of the managers, the agent has circumnavigated South America once, crossed the Cordilleras [the Andes] ten times, and passed from the Atlantic to the Pacific or vice versa still oftener, and with his own hands sold tons of Scriptures. . . . Many years ago we expressed a desire to see Ecuador opened to the Gospel; to see the American Bible Society's work established in every country of South America, to see the work of this agency efficiently established from Ecuador to Cape Horn, and to have a hand in the opening of the Fountain of Life to the 3,500,000 Quichua Indians of Bolivia, Peru and Ecuador. In His amazing grace God has permitted us to see all of these desires realized.

On the last day of 1864, Milne had been married to Harriet Leggat, born in Aberdeenshire. She lived to complete forty years of joint service with her husband, taking full charge of the agency during his long absences on Bible work. Milne died in Buenos Aires on Aug. 22, 1907.

MILWAUKEE, WISCONSIN, U.S.A., the largest city in the state, was founded by Solomon Juneau in 1818 and was incorporated in 1846. Mark Robinson was admitted on trial in the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE in 1835 and was appointed to the "Milwaukee Mission." The WISCONSIN region was then included in the Chicago District. Robinson preached the first Protestant sermon in Milwaukee and organized a class with four members. At the 1836 conference session Robinson reported fifty-three members for Milwaukee, the figure including members at other points on the circuit. In 1837 the Milwaukee District was formed with Salmon Stebbins as presiding elder. That year a board of trustees was appointed for the Milwaukee church, and in 1841 a church building was dedicated. It was rebuilt in 1844 at a cost of $10,000. Originally called Spring Street, it later became First Church. In 1847 some members withdrew and formed a Wesleyan Methodist church. In the same year a second M. E. congregation called Walker's Point was formed with nine members. Two years later it had thirty members. In 1848 the WISCONSIN CONFERENCE was organized.

In 1880 the M. E. Church had four English-speaking churches in Milwaukee with a total of 839 members and three German-language congregations with 475 members. In 1920 there were eleven English-speaking churches and six German with 4,047 and 909 members, respectively.

In 1969 The United Methodist Church had twenty-five congregations in Milwaukee, twelve of them from the former Methodist Church and thirteen from the former E.U.B. Church. The first group reported 5,904 members, property valued at $7,705,881, and a total of $214,213 raised for all purposes during the year. The former E.U.B. churches reported 4,949 members, property valued at $3,958,727, and $509,246 raised for all purposes during the year.

First Church is the city's oldest congregation. The first Methodist service was held in the Solomon Juneau trading post in 1835, and the church was organized in 1836. During its history, First Church has occupied church facilities in eight locations, and it is presently in the process of building the first major downtown church edifice to rise in a metropolitan area of more than a million people within twenty-five years.

First Church "established" the government of Milwaukee and housed the first city hall. The city council met in the sanctuary and the city offices were in the church basement. First Church claims to have started the first kindergarten in the world, and it had the first public library in Milwaukee. The church has long exerted great influence in the city.

When an expressway removed its older building, First Church purchased a complete block in the center of the city, a site valued at more than $2,000,000. Present plans call for the erection of an impressive church edifice with adequate parking facilities. In 1969 First Church reported 712 members and $26,462 raised for all purposes during the year.

Kingsley Church is the largest Methodist congregation within the city limits. Its stately nave in German Gothic is impressive. The church began as a store-front mission at Lisbon Avenue and 28th Street in 1891 and it grew rapidly. The first building was erected at 29th and Brown Streets in 1893. In 1907 the cornerstone of a new edifice was laid at 33rd and Walnut Streets, and the present sanctuary was erected. As the years passed the area around the church developed into a thriving residential district. In 1908 the church had 246 members.

With changing times and an altered environment the mission of Kingsley Church changed. The area to the east became the inner core of the city inhabited largely by Negroes. The residential area in the immediate neighborhood of the church became a "port of entry" for white families from the rural districts and from the South, as well as for young couples starting out in married life. The church has steadily tried to serve the needs of the population around it. A large and well-equipped gymnasium offers recreation to city boys and girls who are without playground space and who are often, because both parents work, without much parental care. A day care center is maintained. Various activities are provided for teenagers. The congregation aggressively seeks out new couples and others in need of guidance, encouragement, fellowship, and Christian nurture. It has been successful in training these newcomers for church leadership. Many of them, as they acquire more economic resources, move out to the suburbs and strengthen the churches there. Methodist churches west of Milwaukee have many former Kingsley Church members as leaders in their congregations.

In 1969 Kingsley Church reported 979 members, property valued at $728,641, and $40,033 raised for all purposes during the year.

MINISTERIAL CALL. It is the acknowledged position in the Church that "only Christ can make a minister." Therefore the indispensable qualification for a man to take upon himself the ministry of the Word and Sacraments is that he be called by the Holy Spirit. This traditional Christian doctrine is reflected plainly in the Ordinal of the Church of England, where the first question addressed to him who presents himself to be ordained Deacon or Priest, or consecrated Bishop, is to this effect: "Do you trust that you are inwardly moved by the Holy Ghost to take upon you this office and ministration—?" and this question is retained in this leading position in the Ordinals of the Methodist Churches.

The reason for this is plain. No man is good enough or wise enough to become a Christian minister on the ground of personal qualification. The minister is not one who has mastered the subject of religion, and who on this account offers good advice to those who have not. In this he is in a position fundamentally different from the practitioners of other learned professions. Though the minister certainly ought to be inwardly devoted to Christ, and outwardly of upright conduct, yet in the end he is in as great need of the Gospel as those who listen to him, or who receive the sacraments at his hands. As he preaches he is offering to the people good counsel which he himself finds it desperately difficult to take, and he is aware that unless he constantly watches unto prayer, self-examination, and the discipline of the moral life, he will shamefully compromise the standards which he holds out to others. Thus the man who preaches or gives spiritual counsel, or who administers the sacraments, because he imagines that his own spiritual, theological, or moral attainments entitle him so to do, is convicted of the basest hypocrisy. There is only one possible honest reason for offering for such a task, and that is a deep sense that God has chosen one to be His messenger and agent, and that to refuse the task would be to do despite to the Spirit of grace.

No minister, however devout, or eloquent, or learned, can "convert" one of his hearers to God, or evoke in him the gift of saving faith, for faith is the gift of God alone. Thus when the preacher stands in his pulpit he is inviting God to use him to work a miracle. If this be so, he cannot go as a well-intentioned volunteer, but as a man impelled by God.

Biblical Doctrine. This is the position of the Bible. Though the sense of personal divine call is most clearly expressed in the case of the more individual ministry of the prophets (Isaiah vi 8, lxi 1, Jeremiah i 4-10, xx 7-9, Ezekiel iii 4-11, xxxiii 7-9, Amos vii 14-15), yet the same is true in principle of the continuous hereditary priesthood, for the house of Aaron owed its position to the circumstance that it was chosen by God from among Israel to be priests before Him (Numbers xvi 4-11, ff., Hebrews v 4). The New Testament Church, likewise, lived under a very distinct sense of the guidance of the Holy Spirit in all its actions, and in nothing was this more plain than in the choice and commissioning of the Christian ministry (Mark iii 13-19, John xv 16, xx 19-23, Acts i 21-6, ix 15, xiii 2-3, Galatians i 1, 11-17, 1 Corinthians ix 16-17).

There is, however, another important spiritual principle complementary to the above. The true and profitable servant of Christ is not an autonomous Christian individualist, but a loyal member of the disciplined and ordered Body of Christ. His concern in Christian service must always be not to please himself, or merely "to express himself," but to do that which is useful for the building up of the whole Body (1 Corinthians xiv 1-5, 13-18, 26-8). In bestowing the gift of the ministry upon the church, God has granted a great variety of spiritual office and equipment, which are complementary one to another. It is most necessary, therefore, for all Christ's servants to cooperate with one another in due order for the advantage of the whole church, behaving one towards another with unselfish modesty and corporate loyalty, forswearing the natural instincts of rivalry, and the sinful desire for status and pre-eminence (Luke xxii 24-6, 1 Corinthians xii 28-31, Ephesians iv 7-8, 11-16, 1 Peter v 1-6, 3 John 9-10).

There thus rests upon the disciplined corporate church both the right and the duty to make careful examination of those who profess to have received a call to the Christian ministry, to determine both their integrity of purpose and their suitability to particular tasks. JOHN WESLEY, himself, emphasized this duty of examining those who "think they are moved by the Holy Ghost to preach." Among other things, Wesley said that inquiry should be made, not only regarding their own religious experience, but also, "Have they gifts (as well as grace) for the work? Have they (in some tolerable degree) a clear, sound understanding? Have they a right judgment in the things of God? . . . A just conception of salvation by faith? And has God given them any degree of utterance? Do they speak justly, readily, clearly?" (Wesley's Works, Vol. V, p. 230).

These questions are yet kept in the present Book of Discipline of The United Methodist Church and will be seen to be sensible, as well as practical.

It is sadly possible for one who has a distinct sense of "call" to be the victim of delusion. Thus the man who perhaps quite sincerely feels himself called of God, yet whose general moral reputation may be called in question, is clearly the victim of a dangerous self-deception, and his call must be rejected (1 Timothy iii, 1-12). Likewise, no man can be accepted into the position of a public teacher in the church if his doctrine subverts the given and fixed principles of the divine revelation in Christ (Galatians i 8, ii 4-5, 1 Timothy vi 3-5). Furthermore, that a man is authentically called to the ministry does not involve that he is the sole judge of the kind of ministry to which he is called. This choice depends to a large extent on what practical tasks there are to do in the church at the time, and what talents and equipment of personality are possessed by the available ministers. Not all have the gifts which make good preachers, or teachers, or administrators, or pastoral counsellors, or choristers, though all these functions are necessary in their place, as equally are those gifts which are less conspicuous in public, such as prayer, attendance at worship, and kindly aid to one's neighbors. The church cannot send a man to a task of which he is incapable simply because he feels a desire to do it. His sense of "call" needs to be educated and guided by the advice of his fellow-Christians. In making acknowledgement that the Holy Spirit has called a man, the church has to exercise the duty, also under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, of deciding to what form of ministry he is to be sent. And one of the leading marks of the man who is truly called is cheerful loyalty to the church in this matter.

The Examination of the Call. Thus in the Anglican Ordinal the leading question regarding the divine call is coupled with another, no less searching, regarding ecclesiastical Order: "Do you think in your heart that you be truly called, according to the will of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the order of this Church of England—?" The same effect is conveyed in the question in the Methodist Ordinal, reflecting as it does (in the British office), a characteristic phrase of Wesley: "Will you submit yourselves as sons in the Gospel, to those whom the Methodist Church shall appoint to have the rule over you?" However, this balance between the individual call and the corporate order is not always easy to maintain in practice, because the church and her servants are not always and everywhere fully guided by the Spirit, being frail and human. Therefore all too often the peace and spiritual health of the church have been wounded by sad collision between the zeal of someone who wishes to serve in some perhaps novel or irregular way, and the prudential conservatism of authority within the established church. The one can easily fall into impatience and self-pleasing, the other into defensive jealousy for status, and self-seeking. This, the chief cause of the crippling divisions of the church, is a tragedy of church life. The welfare of the Christian church largely depends upon keeping this just balance between the rightful claims of prophetic zeal and of church order.

It may be well to consider the way in which this has worked out in practice within the church, and within Methodism. In the great institutional churches, such as the Roman Catholic, the balance has tended to come down heavily in the direction of institutional loyalty and regular ecclesiastical order. Thus the activity of the Spirit of Christ in making a minister has been interpreted chiefly as the due selection of candidates to go into the seminary, their proper training, and the regular act of ordination. An overwhelming conscious personal impression that one must be a minister of Christ has been considered rather as the characteristic of a few outstanding saints. In the "revivalist" denominations and religious societies, on the other hand, the balance has come down in the opposite direction of individual prophetic call. It has often been assumed that any man who feels within himself an urge to preach, and who shows the ability to draw after him a group of followers, has a Christian right to form his own congregation, and give to it what standards of doctrine and discipline he sees fit. Methodists feel that both these positions are defective, the one by swallowing up the sense of a conscious personal call, the other by swallowing up ecclesiastical discipline and cohesion.

It may without immodesty be claimed that authentic Methodism, such as reflects the true spirit of Wesley, has found a salutary balance in this important matter. The standard has been upheld before the people that he who offers himself as a candidate for the ministry should have as his indispensable qualifications a genuine conscious experience of saving faith in Christ, showing itself in a morally strict and upright life, and a whole-hearted devotion to Christ, a faithful and loving zeal for the welfare of the church, and some degree of evident divine blessing upon the witness he has already made for the Gospel, and upon the service he has already rendered to the church. And to this must be added some real measure of inward spiritual compulsion to offer for the work of the ministry, though it need not be supposed that this must necessarily come through the medium of some sudden and startling spiritual impression. The growing sense of a task before one crying to be done may be sufficient to bring a genuine sense of call, and such a candidate should not be deterred from offering because he has not "heard a voice."

At the same time it has always been made clear within Methodism that this ministry is to be exercised within the controlling and sustaining discipline of a closely-knit connexional polity. The man offering for the ministry is to be prepared to lay aside all self-pleasing and self-seeking, to put the welfare of the church and her people first in his loyalties, and to give himself cheerfully to that part of the work not which he would choose, but which the church shall choose. And he is to be a preacher not of his own notions but of the church's faith, revealed authoritatively in Christ, recorded in Scripture, and interpreted according to the mature wisdom of the church.

The Call to the Ministry in Methodism. It has not always been easy even within Methodism to keep this balance. During the long years when, at any rate in British Methodism, there were normally more candidates for the ministry than could be found room for in the connexion, the natural custom was to examine all candidates carefully, and to choose the required number on the basis of the selection of those who had already been most blessed by fruits to their work, or who appeared to have the most promising personality and gifts. There was no particular evidence that many of the rejected candidates were not just as sincerely devoted to Christian service, and authentically called, as those accepted. Thus it could be objected by the critic that the church was in fact inconsistent with her professed principles, and made acceptance to the ministry a matter of ecclesiastical expediency, rather than of recognition of the work of the Spirit. This is indeed a hard question, and it often caused bitter disappointment to good men.

There is perhaps no completely satisfactory solution which will resolve all hard cases, for the reconciliation of elevated spiritual principle with practice can never be complete in an imperfect church operating in an imperfect world. First it must be said that no man has a right to become a minister of a particular church so that if the right be denied by the church he has a cause for umbrage. The ministry is not a matter of human right, but of divine duty. The notion that the right to preach the Word and administer the Sacraments in the congregation is in effect a sort of professional status-symbol conferred upon the fully accomplished Christian worker is a revolting profanation of sacred things, and an idea to be fought tooth and nail in the Church. The office is an obligation laid upon one of the servants of God, and involves, if rightly understood, a call to self-sacrifice such as will certainly be shunned by the man who is in fact seeking his own gratification.

Furthermore, a call to the ministry does not necessarily mean admission to the ministry of the church in a particular place, or even of a particular branch of the church. Thus many candidates for whom there was in former years no room in England went abroad and entered the ministry of Methodist and other churches in the dominions overseas, or in America. This is surely a wise administration of the church's talents, fully in keeping with the doctrine of the divine call. Finally, failure on account of family or other circumstances, or age, or health, or gifts, to be eligible for the separated and ordained ministry does not involve in Methodism exclusion from the ministry of the Gospel. There is also the ministry of the laity, and the consecrated and qualified Methodist layman can normally preach or teach as often as he will, knowing full well that there are parts of the Gospel message which can be declared with more effect by a dedicated lay preacher who is known to earn his living in the world, than by the separated minister. It is most necessary to resist the very un-Methodist notion that lay preachers are in some way "amateur" or "stop-gap" preachers. The ministry of the laity and the separated and ordained ministry is all one colleagueship together in the service of Christ. Thus a lay preacher of perhaps modest gifts and education, who understands the message of the Bible, and who faithfully declares the Gospel, has exactly the same divine Gospel-authority as the ordained minister, and may be used by God to do as much good in the church, though he may not be equally qualified for every pulpit. Conversely, he who stands in the pulpit and is so taken up speaking of his own notions that he forgets to declare God's revelation in Christ has forfeited his Gospel-authority, even though he may have had hands laid on him in ordination, and be a member of a conference, and be appointed by a bishop, and the possessor of ecclesiastical vestments and a Ph.D.

If we turn to modern conditions, particularly in the large and institutionally secure American Methodist Churches, another problem can present itself. There is a very rightful desire to improve the educational standards of the ministry, as well as its technical standards in professional training. This is in keeping with the doctrine of the call, for the man who is authentically called by God will certainly want to do everything in his power to improve his talents, and to be as widely useful a servant of Christ as he may. Nevertheless, in these circumstances the idea can creep in unawares that the accepted practical qualification for the Christian ministry is a degree in theology, and that the higher the degree the more dignified the ministry for which a man is qualified. This is to look upon the ministry as a professional occupation comparable to other professional occupations, the status of which depends upon membership of some body which alone has the right to practice some skill, on account of some special training. There is a dangerous invasion of the church by unspiritual ideas of status derived from the usages of secular society.

An attempt to fortify the position of the church by establishing a system of "secure professional status" for the Christian ministry is foredoomed to failure, because the true minister of Christ may expect often to find himself an object of contempt in the eyes of the men of this world, not on account of his incompetence but on account of his competence. This is because the Gospel itself is an object of offense to those who are foolish enough to account themselves wise, or capable, or sophisticated—as was our Lord Himself despised. Accidental circumstance may indeed from time to time have brought the church and its ministry into a position of communal prestige, but these have generally proved to be occasions of spiritual peril. The true status of the Christian minister is one only to be discerned by those awakened souls who are seeking for God, and to these the minister of the Gospel has a status which cannot be enhanced by professional qualifications, prestige in society, or money. The office of speaking to men and women on behalf of God Himself, and of giving to needy souls the sacrament of the body and blood of the Lord, is a privilege far above any human deserving, which far out-tops any distinction of birth, or rank, or public office, or academic degree, or wealth, though this can only be seen to be so by those having eyes to see.

The Call of Women. A question which has been much discussed in some circles is how far the church can rightly recognize a call to the ministry in a woman. One issue which is often forgotten in this discussion must first be clarified. This is that in the Order of Deaconesses the Methodist Church already has for long had a ministry of women, ordained (the Book of Discipline used the word consecrated) by laying on of hands, who can be pastors of congregations, and who, if qualified so to do, can preach, and who in certain appointments (in Britain) are by regular custom given by the conference a special dispensation to administer the sacraments. Thus the distinction between such a ministry and the itinerant ministry of men is not in any clear sense a theological or spiritual distinction. It is a distinction chiefly consisting in conference membership and sphere of administration, i.e. a distinction of Order. However, what is meant in the present discussion is the issue as to whether women can be called into the same Order of ministry as the separated and ordained ministry of men.

It would certainly seem that this is a matter of the due Order of the Church, rather than of theological principle, because the efficacy of the preached Word and of the Sacraments depends upon the action of God, and not upon the personal characteristics of the minister. The church has in fact had a very long and dignified tradition of the ministrations of women in the church, as deaconesses, but more particularly, in the monastic Orders. The custom whereby women have not been admitted to the priesthood clearly goes back to the religious and social ideas prevalent in and natural to the Jewish background of Christianity. That this custom has so largely endured into a modern world in which women have made good their claim to enter many occupations and callings is a mark of the traditionalism and conservatism which is natural to organized religion. This conservatism is almost as manifest in those parts of the church which have officially admitted women into the separated ministry, because it must be admitted that in these cases church leaders have generally been more willing to ordain women than have local congregations to accept them as pastors. On the other hand, those institutional churches which are furthest from admitting women to the priesthood have in point of fact experienced more of the ministry of consecrated women!

Though there does not seem to be any spiritual or theological reason why a call to the ministry should not be recognized in a woman, the common argument of "sex equality" can hardly be admitted as a theological or spiritual reason why it should be recognized, because, as has been observed above, admission to the ministry is in no sense a mark of Christian status. The woman who tacitly says, "I am willing to devote my full time to the service of the church on condition that I can be given equal status with the men, but I am not prepared to serve in a different Order of ministry, such as a deaconess," clearly does not fully understand what is involved in the conception of the call to the ministry. This form of argument almost answers to the notion (just as wrong in a woman as in a man!) that one is doing a favor to the church by offering for Christian service, and a favor which ought to be "recognized." And this manner of thought, derived from the standards and customs of the world, is totally opposed to the conception of the ministry as a divine call. The true minister of Christ is not primarily rendering a service to man, but fulfilling an obligation to God.

However, one must have the deepest sympathy with a devoted Christian woman who is moved by a strong sense of call to the ministry, yet who finds her call tragically frustrated by a difference of judgment expressed in the order of her church, which is not prepared to accept her. Yet she is in the same position as many men who have felt this call, yet who have not been accepted by the church into the separated ministry. The chief argument against the admission of women to the separated ministry would appear to be one of expediency, namely, that for particular denominations to do this apart from the general body of Christendom increases occasions of ecclesiastical separation within the church, and is an uneconomical action. Admission is something which ideally ought to be done by the whole church together. A salient example of this is the situation in British Methodism, where the main reason for delay in admitting women to the itinerant ministry is undoubtedly that to do so would present added difficulty in the establishment of a common ministerial order with the Church of England. And the reason in turn, though often unavowed, why the Church of England is so far from admitting women to the priesthood is that this would occasion a further degree of separation between Anglicanism and the Roman Catholic and Eastern Churches.

Prospective Ministerial Calls. It has been noticed that in some parts of the church there has during the mid-century years been a decline in the number of those professing a call to the ministry. This is a token of something seriously wrong in the church, either in the past, or else in the present. It can be argued that in some parts of the church entrance upon the Christian ministry was formerly a way in which young men lacking money and position could rise to a place of honorable status in the community, and that this made it easier for them to respond to the sense of call. Nowadays, however, with wider education opportunities open to the people, and a much greater variety of professional and semi-professional occupations in which a Christian can render useful service to the community, this incentive has been relaxed. It has in short become harder for young men to resolve to enter upon a calling which has little to offer in advancement, or worldly status, or income. In so far as this is indeed the case, here is a condemnation of the past, and a sign that the church has not always succeeded in living up to the principle she has professed. And if this be so, the church may have to get used to organizing herself with fewer separated ministers. From the spiritual point of view this might prove to be no bad thing, because the ministry of the laity is just as vital for the welfare of the church as is the separated ministry. Furthermore, these many occupations of public responsibility and welfare are often in fact important parts of the ministry of the laity. And in any case, the church is certainly better off if its official ministry is rid of the type of man who can be moved by considerations of worldly advantage and status. In considering the supply of candidates for the ministry, the church must consider first and foremost the welfare of the Gospel, and not the institutional convenience of her established organization.

There is some ground for fearing, however, that when there is a decline in number of candidates for the ministry this may sometimes be due to more serious causes. That is to say, the sense of divine calling may have disappeared, and the Christian ministry appeared as a mere human occupation. Some of the Christian laity have perhaps been too much inclined to speak of their minister as though he were a lecturer on miscellaneous subjects of his own choosing, airing his own opinions in the pulpit with the aim of "keeping the people interested," and as such, a fair target for criticism. His pastoral activity has been represented as though he were the "organizing secretary" employed by a little local organization, whose chief concern was to keep "the going concern" going. And it is sadly to be admitted that some ministers have at times fallen into attitudes, policies, and preaching which have encouraged their people to suppose that all this is indeed the case. If so, the spiritually earnest and sensitive man, who of all men most ought to become a Christian minister, will certainly not feel called to enter upon so ignominious and compromised an occupation. In the last resort a church gets the ministry it deserves. If the Christian community evidently and sincerely looks upon the minister of the Gospel, even though he be modestly paid and of no importance in the sight of the world, as a man of God, summoned by God Himself to the most august task in human experience, and if the ministers by the whole course of their life and preaching make this exalted view credible to their people, then the church will never lack a sufficiency of men called into the ministry. The whole history of the church plainly shows that what matters for the welfare of the Gospel is not how numerous, or how clever, or how endowed with prestige are God's servants, but whether they are the sort of men and women whom God can use to perform His own work.

MINISTERIAL SUPPORT. The early Methodist preachers went forth to preach the gospel moved by a divine impulse, and without at first having societies upon which to depend. JOHN WESLEY supported himself by a fellowship which he held in Oxford University, and by the profits on books which he published from time to time. He also aided his ministers by giving away all that he could possibly spare, limiting himself merely to the supply of his own wants. Many of the early preachers were engaged in business employment. They were called "lay preachers," and simply gave their Sabbaths or week-day evenings for service, acting as the "LOCAL PREACHERS" in America came to do later. As Methodist societies were organized, and as they became strong, they contributed for the support of their ministers, who were thus in time enabled to devote their whole time to their specific calling.

The support of the early preachers in the United States was exceedingly meagre. The membership was generally poor, and the ministers were unmarried men, who traveled from place to place, living among the people, and subsisting on small contributions. In 1774, before the M.E. Church was organized, we find an enactment that each preacher should have $64 per year and traveling expenses; indeed, the earliest preachers did not receive this sum. Captain WEBB, who founded many of the societies, and who, more than any other person, gave great help to American Methodism, supported himself as an army officer and by other means, besides contributing to the erection of church edifices. EMBURY and STRAWBRIDGE were married men, but were local preachers—called "lay preachers"—the one being a carpenter and the other a farmer, and they were in part supported by their labor. ASBURY, BOARDMAN, PILMORE, RANKIN, ROBERT WILLIAMS, and SHADFORD were single men. Williams subsequently married and located, and of him it was said, "He was the first American Methodist preacher that published a book, got married, and died" (Simpson, p. 616).

In 1774 the stipend for an itinerant in full connection was set at six pounds per quarter. The preacher had the right of ownership and use of his horse, even though the animal may have been provided and provisioned by the circuit.

In 1778 paper money had during the war depreciated, and the ministerial salary was thereupon raised to thirty pounds per year, which was nearly equivalent to eighty dollars. As some ministers, being greater favorites, received gifts which added to their support, the Conference of 1782 desiring to equalize the allowances adopted a resolution that "all the gifts received by the preachers, whether in money or clothing, should be brought into the quarterly meeting and valued by the preachers and stewards, and the preacher who had received the gifts should be considered as having received so much of his quarterage, and if he is still deficient he shall carry to the account such deficiency, that if possible he shall have it made up out of the profits arising out of the sale of books and the annual collections" (Simpson).

In 1780 the first notice occurs of the wives of preachers, the fourteenth question reading, "What provision shall be made for the wives of married preachers?" A. "They shall receive an equivalent with the husband if they stand in need." In 1783 we find the answer to the question, "How many preachers' wives are to be provided for?" is "Eleven, and the sum needed for their support is 260 pounds." As regards this sum it was said, "Let the preachers make a small collection in all the circuits." That purpose was to equalize the support, or rather that all the circuits should combine in sustaining the families. In 1784 thirteen preachers were reported as married, and 302 pounds were apportioned to different charges. A collection was also ordered to be taken up in every charge, prior to Conference, to meet the deficiency. This was called the "Conference collection," a name that was destined to last in American Methodism for a long time, but to be more broadly applied. A year after the organization of the church this collection amounted to 300 pounds, which was applied to making up the quarterly deficiency and sending out two missionaries.

The English Wesleyans for a time had a system of equalization so that large families could be supported by small circuits; the Children's Fund and the Educational Fund was taken up on all the charges, and was distributed according to the number of the family. This system did not prevail in the United States. In 1785 the thirty-seventh question of the minutes reads, "What shall be the regular salary of the elders, deacons, and helpers?" To which answer is made, "$64, and no more; and for each preacher's wife $64; and for each preacher's child, if under the age of six years, there shall be allowed $16; and for each child over the age of six and under the age of eleven years, $21.33." This rule in reference to children created dissatisfaction, and the Conference of 1787 resolved that no provision should be made in future for the children of married preachers, and this appears to have been the practice of the church until 1800.

In those early days they were strict, even beyond propriety, in reference to all financial matters. One of their rules reads, "We will on no account whatever suffer any deacon or elder among us to receive any fee or present for administering the ordinance of marriage, baptism, or the burial of the dead; freely we have received, freely we give." It is probable that this rule was adopted to prevent jealousy among the ministers, as but few at first were elected to orders. A few years subsequently it was agreed that a present might be received for the marriage ceremony, but it must be reported to the stewards of the circuit, to be applied to the quarterage. This rule continued in force until 1800. At this day it seems surprising how so great a work could have been sustained on such small means. Brave and self-denying were the men who laid the firm foundations of the edifice of Methodism; yet it became almost impossible for men with families to remain in the traveling ministry, and hence nearly all of them located. The loss of so much talent and experience out of the ministry of the church by location greatly grieved Bishop Asbury and other leading minds. In part to remedy this evil, in 1796 the GENERAL CONFERENCE organized the CHARTERED FUND, appointing for it a board of trustees. Its design was to supplement the salaries, and to afford some support for the worn-out preachers, their widows and orphans. Prior to that time an effort had been made to support a Preachers' Fund, by requiring every person when admitted to pay $2.67, then one pound American currency, and to contribute annually $2. This organization was on the principle of a mutual aid society; but in 1796 it was merged into the Chartered Fund. An appeal was issued on behalf of this fund, in which we find the following paragraph: "It is to be lamented, if possible with tears of blood, that we have lost scores of our most able married ministers; men who, like good house-holders, could upon all occasions bring things new and old out of their treasury, but were obliged to retire from the general work because they saw nothing before them for their wives and children, if they continued itinerant, but misery and ruin."

Until 1860 the salary of a preacher was fixed at $100, and $100 for his wife, and a small allowance was made to the children. The circuits or stations were also required to estimate a sufficient amount for the family expenses. But in 1860 in the M.E. Church the rule for specific allowances was removed from the Discipline, and the stations and circuits were allowed to determine what they considered necessary for ministerial support. The same plan was followed by the M.E. Church, South, which in 1854 directed that "the claims of preachers shall be estimated by their respective Boards of Stewards" (Peterson, p. 102), and this was followed by clarifying legislation along the same line in succeeding General Conferences. Thus by stages came the system which has prevailed in American Methodism since that time, of each local charge whether circuit or station fixing and paying the salary of the minister appointed to them. Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON felt that this created great inequality in the charges, and added to the embarrassment of arranging the appointments. In too many cases the estimate made was not fully met; but even then the preacher had no claim upon the property of the church as a compensation for his services. The Discipline expressly provides that the church property shall not be mortgaged or encumbered for current expenses.

The difference in the salaries paid by the various charges has been criticized as establishing a financial grading for ministers and ministerial appointments, thus making money somewhat the measure of ministerial evaluation which it should not be. From time to time a move is made in present-day American Methodism to equalize salaries as they were equalized in the earlier days, and this move has been largely successful in the matter of the district superintendents' salaries in the respective annual conferences. In conferences where these salaries have not been equalized, the district stewards decide what their district shall pay their superintendent. Where a conference equalizes the superintendents' salaries, these are paid out of a general fund raised by the conference as a whole, the amount being decided by the conference following the report of its World Service Commission.

Recent disciplinary regulations provide that the salary which is to be paid the preacher-in-charge be fixed by the charge conference and made a matter of record before each annual conference year begins. It is the duty of the official board in each local church "after consultation with the Committee on Pastoral Relations, or with the pastor if there is no such committee, and after all matters pertaining to his efficiency, to recommend to the Quarterly [now Charge] Conference, at the session next preceding the Annual Conference, the salary and expense allowance of the pastor, and of the associate pastor or pastors if any." (Discipline, 1964, Paragraph 215.2.) The fixing of the salary in advance gives the appointive power and the preachers involved, a sure commitment as to what may be counted upon as each appointment is made. It may be noted that any additional income, as for instance fees for preaching and even wedding fees, must be counted by each minister as taxable income by the U. S. Internal Revenue Service.

In early days, due to the smallness of the remuneration paid preachers, the people made up something of this by a certain generosity in gifts of produce. A "pounding" was the somewhat colloquial word used to describe concerted gifts on the part of the people of provisions, produce, etc. At the same time merchants began to allow a "ministerial discount" to ministers and their families in the purchase of goods, and physicians usually refused to accept payment for their services to the parsonage family. As better salaries began to be paid, "poundings" and ministerial discounts, etc., have become less and less in evidence. The ministry as a whole expresses satisfaction over this, preferring an adequate salary and housing, with the responsibilities that go with these, to the well-meant but desultory support of former days.

MINISTERIAL TRAINING (British). The Minutes of the first Conference (1744) includes: "Q. Can we have a seminary for labourers? A. If God spare us until another Conference." In 1745 to the same question the answer was: "Not till God give us a proper Tutor." Lists of books were drawn up to guide the preachers' reading, and they were expected to read as well as sell the Christian Library Courses were sometimes held for preachers in London, at KINGSWOOD SCHOOL and at the Orphan House, Newcastle. It was not until the Conference of 1834, however, that the Wesleys resolved to set up "The Wesleyan Theological Institution for the Improvement of the Junior Preachers." After some controversy (see SAMUEL WARREN) this led to the inauguration of several THEOLOGICAL COLLEGES, and nearly all candidates accepted for the ministry are sent to one of them. Each college is closely linked with its local university, and those students who are qualified to do so usually take a degree locally or else take the divinity degree of London University, which one may do as an external student.

The curriculum of the colleges stresses biblical studies, church history, and systematic theology; in recent years there has been more emphasis on homiletics, pastoral theology, etc. In his fourth and final year, the student normally spends two months gaining practical experience in circuits. Each college is a community, with its devotional life centered in its chapel, and the students preach frequently in nearby circuits. On leaving college a probationer is stationed in a circuit under the supervision of a superintendent for the remaining years of his probation, usually not more than two in number; he also engages in courses of study under the direction of another minister in the district. On the successful completion of his probation, he proceeds to ordination and full connexion. The Ministerial Training Department in London, which has a full-time ministerial secretary, supervises the whole system.

MINISTRY, American Methodist. The M.E. Church in America organized with and was organized by a ministry as set forth in actions published in the Minutes of the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE. The words are historic: "We will form ourselves into an episcopal church under the direction of superintendents, elders, deacons and helpers, according to the forms of ordination annexed to our liturgy and the form of discipline set forth in these Minutes." The word "preachers" was not used in this connection, though Methodist ministers everywhere have been known by the term preacher, as they were in Wesley's day in England.

The ministry in America stemmed from the ordinations of JOHN WESLEY himself and whatever may have been the view regarding these ordinations in other lands, American Methodist ministers have always been proud to trace their ecclesiastical descent back to the founder of Methodism. He ordained THOMAS COKE to be a superintendent, and RICHARD WHATCOAT and THOMAS VASEY to be elders, and instructed Coke to ordain ASBURY also a superintendent, and provided him and the American Methodists forms for the ordination of superintendents, ELDERS and DEACONS, which forms were used at the Christmas Conference and ever afterwards. The word "helpers" which occurs in the Christmas Conference Minutes, was really the equivalent of "preachers," and was absorbed and lost in the term preacher in a very few years.

In early American Methodism, there was for a time a bit of uncertainty on the part of some churchly elements because of the influence of the Church of England, and that of the Protestant Episcopal Church, its successor in America. For a time these denied the validity of Methodist orders since Wesley was not a bishop. Thomas Vasey himself, whom Wesley had ordained, on his return to England, later besought orders from and was ordained by a bishop of the Established Church. However, the great success of early Methodism, and the signs of spiritual strength and of God's effective presence in its work, soon swept away any criticism on ecclesiastical grounds. Methodist orders established themselves not by resting upon past descent, but by immediate strength and power. "The test of Apostolic Succession is apostolic success," some Methodists have liked to put it.

In American Methodism from the day when Francis Asbury refused to allow himself to be consecrated a bishop unless and until his brethren should elect him to that position, all ordinations whether of bishops, elders or deacons, have depended upon the enabling vote of a Conference. In the case of bishops, electing was always to be done by a GENERAL CONFERENCE, or, as it is at present, by JURISDICTIONAL or CENTRAL CONFERENCES. In the case of elders and deacons, the clerical members of an Annual Conference itself before the Union of 1939 sometimes voted orders for men, as was shown by its direction known as the "missionary rule" by which those to go as missionaries might be ordained by special appointment; and also by the empowerment given to the War Work Commission (MIES) in the first World War to authorize the ordination of CHAPLAINS for the armed services in a time of emergency. However, with these rare exceptions no General Conference has ever endeavored to take away from the Annual Conferences their right to vote orders for deacons and for elders. Under the present Constitution of The United Methodist Church, this right is specifically granted to the annual conferences. Also no power to elect a bishop can inhere in the General Conference, but only in the Jurisdictional, or Central Conferences.

Wesley sent over three forms of ordination, and while that for the bishop or "superintendent" is an exact replica of that "For the Ordaining and Consecrating of a Bishop or Archbishop" in the Church of England, the Methodist Churches in America, following and stirred by the episcopal controversy of earlier years, decided that the bishop in Methodist polity is not a member of a third order, but simply an elder who has been set apart for a special type of administrative work. Various actions by General Conferences have strengthened and certified this principle, and a rubric at the beginning of the office for the consecration of a bishop in the M.E. Church during its later years stated flatly "this service is not to be understood as an ordination to a higher order in the Christian ministry beyond and above that of Elders or Presbyters, but as a solemn and fitting consecration for the special and most sacred duties of Superintendency in the Church" (M.E. Discipline, 1920, paragraph 533).

Francis Asbury, anxious to strengthen Methodist episcopacy by every means possible, not primarily for its own sake but to have the power to establish itinerancy firmly in American Methodism, leaned a bit toward the idea that a bishop did possess something of unusual status in regard to orders. However, in the unremitting struggle carried on through the years to limit Methodist episcopacy, not because of its name or status, but because of its absolute power in making appointments, it came about that even in the M.E. Church, South, where the bishop was traditionally in much stronger position than he was in the M.E. Church, bishops were never held to be a "third order." (See EPISCOPACY.)

The Methodist eldership, comparable to the priesthood in the Church of England, has ever been held in high repute among American Methodists, and to be ordained elder is the ultimate goal of each minister who gives himself in life service to the church. And just here comes in the unusual relationship which has existed between Conference membership on one hand, and ministerial orders on the other, which has been a marked feature of American Methodism, and which has, at times, led to embarrassing involvements. Conference membership, or the admission into an Annual Conference by vote of the Conference, is a process entirely apart from ordination. Yet this was—and still is in many ways—the rule for long years in all American Methodism. This situation stemmed from John Wesley's own policy of admitting men to Conference long before he agreed to allow them the privileges of the ordained. As it was, in actual practice in American Methodism, once a man was formally admitted to the Conference, after progress had been made in certain studies or sometimes in work accomplished, the brethren would vote that that person should be ordained, first deacon and then elder. Thus there have always been two distinct types of initiation for Methodist ministers. One is when a Conference is entered by vote of the ministers of that Conference and after answering the questions which Wesley said all should answer who joined his own "connexion." The second is when one has been voted orders, and takes the vows of ordination, and by the imposition of hands of a bishop, and other presbyters, is made a deacon or elder. For well over the first hundred years of Methodism in America, preachers might belong to a Conference and yet never be ordained; and in time some could be ordained as "local elders" who never joined the Conference at all or came within the traveling connection. Also ordained conference members may "locate" without losing their orders. Instances, however, have been known when such a person no longer under the control of the Conference has presumed upon his orders and this has led to embarrassment. This situation in time caused confusion, not only in the keeping of Conference records, but in the whole matter of Conference relationship and orders. To clarify ministerial status at least two different Commissions have been appointed within recent years (TAMC) to study the ministry and make appropriate recommendations. The study has been continued by The United Methodist Church.

Also, within recent years, in order to enforce more firmly the regulation that each minister must complete a certain COURSE OF STUDY, it was provided that one must be ordained a deacon before he may be admitted on trial in an Annual Conference.

Ordained ministers of the Methodist churches are recognized as of equal status with the ordained ministers of other Christian denominations everywhere; and in turn, provision is made for admitting into an Annual Conference ministers from other denominations who have themselves been ordained, provided that they take the requisite vows. They are not, however, asked to submit again to the imposition of hands. It is thus clear that admission to an Annual Conference thereby putting a man into the traveling preacherhood is one thing—a special Methodist situation; while ordination as a deacon or elder really puts a man into the ministry of the general worldwide Church, and his ordination is so regarded by other Christian brotherhoods.

As part of the fight against the strong Asburian episcopacy of early days, an attack was made upon the Methodist diaconate. It was asserted to be no ministerial order but an "office"—as Baptists for instance hold. Indeed, the M.P. CHURCH when organized (with, of course, no bishops) decided also that they would have no deacons but simply one order of ministers, namely elders. The Methodists in GERMANY also decided that they would not have deacons as a separate order, but elders only. The JUDICIAL COUNCIL of the Methodist Church, when the right of the General Conference to agree that in the Germany Central Conference the ordination of an elder might be one's final ordination, and ordination as a deacon might be omitted, decided that granting this power to the Germany Conference was a constitutional right of the General Conference and did not break fundamental Methodist law. (Decision 58, May 6, 1948.)

At the 1964 General Conference a strong effort was made to declare the Methodist diaconate simply an office, and not an order. There was a minority and majority report from the Committee on Ministry presenting opposite views upon this matter. The situation was deferred by referring the whole matter to a commission empowered to further study the ministry.

The influence of other great ecclesiasticisms which have only one order—but not of course the Protestant Episcopal Church—is very strongly felt in American Methodism, and this tends to hold the deacon to be more of a lay officer than a ministerial order. The move to denature the traditional Methodist diaconate has also been abetted by the argument that many supply ministers—now local pastors—might be allowed to hold the office of deacon and be called deacons with no ordination, if the diaconate shall ever be called an office. It is worthy of note however that in the episcopal controversy of 1810-1830, Bishop ROBERT EMORY in his Defence of Our Fathers defended the order of deacon by saying that whatever happened to Methodist episcopacy, the deacon should be left untouched in his own order.

Local Preachers was the name given to those assistants of Wesley who "assisted us only in one place" as over against those who traveled about at Wesley's command. The local preacher was usually termed a "lay preacher" in Britain.

In American Methodism, the term local preacher historically came to be given to those who are licensed to preach but not members of an Annual Conference and so not under the appointment of a bishop. When a Conference member dropped out of the traveling connection, he was said to "locate" and became again a local preacher not subject to appointment. However, "location" always was at the vote of the Conference which alone had the right to grant location when this was requested; or which could "locate" a man against his will if it found him unacceptable. Occasionally men were forced to locate or located by Conference action as a disciplinary measure against them for certain improper actions not deemed worthy of a trial. However, Bishop COLLINS DENNY said that the status of a local preacher was so estimable that "location" should never be used as a penalty since the local preachers of Methodism have done such heroic ministerial service. In The United Methodist Church, the Uniting Conference of 1968 changed "local preacher" to "local pastor," keeping the status itself much as it had been. When a man is first licensed to preach, he becomes a local pastor and holds such status until he is admitted to Conference membership, and thus goes into the traveling connection. As a pastor, he is under the direction of the minister over him, and he must make a report of his activities from time to time as the Discipline provides.

Men who have been Conference members and locate because of health or family reasons, or for other valid reasons, continue to hold their orders if they have been ordained. It should be said that regular Conference men who are retired or superannuated on account of age or infirmity are not considered local preachers—or local pastors—as are those who have never joined a Conference, or who have dropped out before they reach the age of retirement.

Supply Pastor. A supply pastor is a preacher appointed to a pastoral charge, usually as a substitute either because of an emergency between sessions of the Annual Conference, or because there is a shortage of Conference ministerial members at the time of the Conference, and the appointment otherwise could not be filled. (The name "Lay Pastor" was given to this type of minister at the Uniting Conference of 1968, but we describe the development here under the old name of Supply Pastor.)

The use of supply preachers came about gradually and was usually due to some aforementioned emergency when the bishop or, as was frequently the case, the district superintendent, put into a local pulpit a man who was asked to "supply it" until the next session of the Annual Conference. When that time came it was expected that a regular Conference member would be appointed and usually was. But with the great growth of the Church and the proliferation of many small and circuit charges for which regular ministers could not be secured, there grew in the Methodist Churches a large, and to a certain extent, a permanent body of "supply preachers." The most of these have been men who could not get into the actual Conference membership by reason of stipulated educational or other requirements which the General Conference in later years has seen fit to enact. They have been, nevertheless, men of ability and consecration, and the usual Annual Conference has a great number of "supplies." In The Methodist Church, before its reorganization as The United Methodist Church, there were Approved Supply Pastors. These were local preachers who on recommendation of the Board of Ministerial Training and qualifications of each annual conference—or a similar body—were approved by the annual conference as eligible for an appointment during the ensuing year as "supply pastor" of a charge. In 1968 the name Approved Supply was dropped in favor of Local Pastor, though the office itself can scarcely be. Indeed it is generally admitted that The United Methodist Church could not do its work nor man its charges were it not for these men. Their aim is of course, when possible, to secure membership in the annual conference itself, and within recent years less stringent regulations have been passed regarding educational requirements, so that more of the better qualified local pastors, as they are now to be called, may be admitted by conference vote.

Superannuates, or Retired Ministers, are those who are officially placed in the retired relationship and have thereby "ceased to travel." A superannuated minister in The United Methodist Church "is one who at his own request, or by action of the ministerial members in full connection (in his Conference) on recommendation of the Board of the Ministry has been placed in the retired relation" (Discipline 1968, Paragraph 359). Every ministerial member of an annual conference whose seventy-second birthday precedes the first day of the regular session of his annual conference must be automatically retired from the active ministry at the said conference session; and at his own request and by vote of the annual conference, any ministerial member who has attained age sixty-five or has completed forty years of full-time approved service prior to the date of the opening session of the conference, may be placed in the retired relation with the privilege of making an annuity claim upon the pension funds of the church (Paragraph 362). An annual conference has the right to place any ministerial member in the retired relation, with or without his consent and irrespective of his age, if such relation is recommended by the conference Board of the Ministry (Paragraph 360).

It is possible and quite frequent for a superannuate minister, if he is willing, to be assigned to active duty by the bishop, and thereby to be known as a "retired supply." Every Superannuate is a member of the local charge conference and has all the privileges of membership in the local church where he resides, except as the Discipline may set forth otherwise. He must report to the charge conference and to the pastor all marriages performed and baptisms administered, if any. If he resides outside the bounds of his annual conference, he must forward annually to his conference a certificate of his Christian and his ministerial conduct, must tell something about the number and circumstances of his family, and the district superintendent or the pastor of the charge within whose bounds he resides must sign his report. (Discipline, 1968, Paragraph 364.)

In the early days, retirement or superannuation entailed great hardship upon ministers since there was then small provision for their support. At a very early period in English Methodism, a collection was taken in the various societies for the support of the superannuated preachers and the American Christmas Conference of 1784 adopted the same provision. This was long continued. After a time there was organized a CHARTERED FUND for the purpose of aiding the retired ministers, but the income from these sources was so scanty that those who could manage their own support either from property or by business which they were able to follow were not considered claimants on the conference funds.

Later on, in the growing Methodist churches, much better provision was made for the support of retired men, and in time a BOARD OF PENSIONS was created to look after this matter on the part of the general church; each annual conference came to set aside in its annual budget each year a certain amount for conference claimants. The annual conferences within recent years have been making much better provision for their claimants, including superannuates, basing the annuity amount usually upon years of active service.

Superannuated ministers continue to hold membership in their annual conference and often take an active part in its deliberations and in voting at each annual session. Every ministerial member, active or retired, is "active" until the conference session ends, and his status announced or reannounced in the appointments or minutes. As is the case with all conference members, their retired relation depends upon the vote of the conference, though the provision retiring men automatically at seventy-two years of age is fixed law of the whole church.

Bishops often use the superannuate ministers when they are willing to fill pulpits made vacant by death or for other reasons, or sometimes use retired men for appointments where their services will greatly help the work. Incidents have been known, however, where a man in a strong pulpit who reached the retirement age but wished to be reappointed to his same pulpit as a "retired supply" was not allowed to do so. The COUNCIL OF BISHOPS itself has acted upon this matter in certain instances and stated that "a bishop could not do by indirection what the General Conference said could not legally be done in re a man's retirement at seventy-two."

The annual conference pauses usually at each of its sessions to pay tribute to the men who are at that time retiring, and the superannuates are held in high honor in every Methodist conference.

Supernumerary Minister is one who by reason of impaired health, or other equally sufficient reason, is temporarily unable to perform full work. (Discipline 1968, Paragraph 358.) The relation, of course, is one to be granted by the man's Annual Conference and cannot be granted for more than five years in succession, except by a two-thirds vote of the conference, and on recommendation of the Committee on Conference Relations. A supernumerary minister may receive an appointment or be left without one, according to the judgment of the Annual Conference of which he is a member. He is subject to all limitations of the Discipline in respect to reappointment and continuance in the same charge as those that apply to effective ministers. If he is given no pastoral charge, he has a seat in the local Charge Conference, and all the privileges of membership in the place where he resides. He must report to the Charge Conference and to the pastor, all marriages performed and all baptisms administered. Should he reside outside the bounds of his Annual Conference, he must forward to it annually a certificate telling of his work, and the like, and if he fails to make such a report, the Annual Conference may locate him without his consent. A supernumerary minister has no claim on the conference funds except by vote of the conference itself.

The English Minutes originally defined supernumerary preachers to be "those who can preach four or five times a week" (Simpson's Cyclopaedia). This definition was adopted when ministers were expected to preach not only three times on the Sabbath, but almost as often on every day of the week. In the M.E. Church in the United States, the first definition of those who are supernumeraries came in 1792 when it was affirmed that a supernumerary preacher was one "so worn out in the itinerant service as to be rendered incapable of preaching constantly: but at the same time is willing to do any work in the ministry which the conference may direct, and his strength enable him to perform." In 1800, on motion of Thomas Coke, supernumerary preachers, their widows and orphans, were to have the same support which was then accorded to effective preachers.

In early days the supernumerary relation gave the M.E. Church little trouble, as there was no tendency to remain in the Conference unless one had the ability to labor effectively. Indeed, in those days the great embarrassment of the Church was the constant tendency in the ministry to seek location. However, as the funds of the Conferences increased, and as a connection with the Conference became more desirable, some who desired to seek rest for a few years, for travel or to engage in various work—even in business—desired to maintain their connection with the Conference but to be placed on the supernumerary list. Because of the difficulties this caused, the 1860 M.E. General Conference abolished the relationship so far as the Annual Conferences were concerned, but the phrase still remained in the RESTRICTIVE RULES in relation to the General Conference appropriating the produce of the PUBLISHING HOUSE "to any purpose other than for the benefit of the traveling, supernumerary, superannuated, and worn-out preachers, their wives, widows and children." In 1864 the former relation was restored, however, but with the definition which has lasted to the present and the provision that the supernumerary preachers "shall have no claim upon the beneficiary funds of the church, unless by vote of the Annual Conference." (Discipline 1968, Paragraph 358.)

The supernumerary relationship is one not often sought today, as superannuation, even for those who are disabled physically, will usually be granted by the Annual Conference if the Board of the Ministry so recommends. Since a supernumerary minister has no claim on Conference or general church funds except by special vote of his Conference, and since a regularly retired or superannuated minister does have a claim when the Conference grants him superannuation, the latter status is usually sought rather than the supernumerary relationship. Five hundred and forty-three supernumeraries were reported in the ministerial membership of the five Jurisdictions of The United Methodist Church in the United States in the General Minutes of 1970.

MINISTRY, British Methodist. JOHN WESLEY's initial reluctance to allow laymen to expound the Scriptures was overcome in 1739. In 1744, at the first Conference, he and his brother and four other clergymen of the Church of England began by inviting four of the laymen to join them. The business included the following: "Q. Are Lay Assistants allowable? A. Only in cases of necessity." There followed an account of their office, "in the absence of the Minister," and the "Rules of an Assistant," later known as the "Rules of a Helper."

The Minutes of 1745 contained a list of these assistants. The Minutes of 1745 contained the following: "Q. In what view are we and our helpers to be considered? A. Perhaps as extraordinary messengers, designed of God to provoke the others to jealousy." The tests of those called of God to preach were said to be grace, gifts, and success (later called fruit). The Minutes contains the stationing of the assistants in circuits. In 1747 a distinction was drawn between "our present Assistants" and "those that assist us only in one place." Thus arose the distinction between the Traveling Preachers and the Local Preachers.

The traveling preachers, who were the forerunners of the Methodist ministry, were eventually divided into the Assistants (the assistant being the traveling preacher in charge of each circuit) and the other traveling preachers, who were called helpers, a term which did not long survive. The traveling preachers included preachers on trial, also called probationers. The term "probationer" was also used occasionally for local preachers on trial. When they had successfully completed this period of probation, which at first was one year, but was later extended to four years, they were received "into Full Connexion" with John Wesley and the Conference. They received allowances for themselves and their wives and were forbidden to engage in trade.

Wesley insisted, especially in his "Korah" sermon on the ministerial office, that they were not priests and had no right to administer the Sacraments; but he was equally emphatic, in the face of much opposition, in asserting their right to preach and to exercise an itinerant rather than a parochial ministry. The principle of itinerancy was expressed in two ways: they traveled around the large circuits, often spending each night in a new place, and they were not stationed in the same circuit for many years together. But when a preacher was too worn out to travel any longer, his name was printed in the circuit in which he resided, with the title of Supernumerary.

In 1784, to meet the needs of the people of North America, Wesley ordained deacons and elders by the imposition of hands, and by the same method set apart as a superintendent THOMAS COKE, who like himself was a priest of the Church of England. Wesley had been persuaded by the works of Lord Chancellor PETER KING, which he read in 1746, and by other books, that presbyters have the right to ordain, and he defended his action by claiming it was scriptural. He also sent to America The Sunday Service of the Methodists in North America. This was in reality an abridgment of The Book of Common Prayer and included services of ordination for deacons, elders, and superintendents. In the following years he ordained men for SCOTLAND and other places, and after 1788 for England. He ordained men as deacons and as elders (or sometimes as presbyters), and probably ordained ALEXANDER MATHER as superintendent for England. In all Wesley ordained at least twenty-seven men, and many of the certificates survive.

After his death some ordinations were performed by those whom he had ordained, but ordinations were soon stopped, and the distinction between ordained and unordained preachers was dropped. Coke, however, and later others, often ordained by the imposition of hands those who were going as missionaries overseas. The title of the chief preacher in each circuit, which in Wesley's lifetime had been assistant, was changed a few years after his death to Superintendent. Certain preachers were chosen as chairmen of districts, and eventually overseas some of these were given the status of general superintendent.

In 1795 by the PLAN OF PACIFICATION the traveling preachers in Full Connexion were permitted to administer the Sacraments where this was desired locally, subject to the control of the Conference. Hitherto, this had been permitted only occasionally amid much controversy, but now quickly it became the universal practice. Thus the connection acknowledged that its traveling preachers performed the usual function of Christian ministers and so claimed its independent place within the universal Church. Reception into full connexion received even greater emphasis and came to be described as "virtual ordination."

In 1836 the Wesleyan Conference resolved that the men to be received into full connexion should be ordained by the Scriptural method of the imposition of hands; in subsequent years the reception into full connexion and the ordination were separated by a few hours. In 1846 the three ordination services, which had survived in most editions of The Sunday Service, were replaced by a single service.

The other Methodist bodies all followed the same pattern. At the end of his probation a candidate was voted "into Full Connexion," "to the approved list," or the like, by the Conference; or, among the PRIMITIVE METHODISTS, by the District Meeting. The public ordination which followed the same evening usually included some outward sign, such as the giving of the ordination Bible, or the right hand of fellowship, but not the imposition of hands.

The ministry in Great Britain is heir to all these traditions. Generally speaking, those who have completed their probation are received into full connexion by the Representative Session of the Conference, which resolves that they shall be ordained by the imposition of hands the same evening; and this is done by the president or his representative, assisted by other ordained ministers. The itinerancy has been somewhat modified, in that ministers change circuits less frequently, and to some extent concentrate on particular churches within a circuit. Chairmen of districts are now recognized as pastores paritum.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINNESOTA, U.S.A., in 1970 had a population report of 431,977. Greater Minneapolis takes in several suburbs of considerable size and increases the population to more than one million. The city is a grain, flour and trades center, for Minnesota is a strong agricultural grain state. The State University of Minnesota is located in Minneapolis, one of the very largest in the United States. Besides the University, there are numerous business, trades, technical and other training schools in the city. There are numerous articles and machines manufactured in Minneapolis; and many of the Northwest offices for distributing companies are located in the downtown loop. Minneapolis is known as the City of Lakes with its scenic drives around the lakes, along the Mississippi River and through some of the finest residential areas in America.

The first Methodist Mission was located at St. Anthony and was established in 1849. After the first small log structure was outgrown, a much larger stone church was erected on the same site, and in 1955 a $500,000 addition was added which made all parts of this historic church up-to-date and beautiful in its many serviceable parts. A WESLEY FOUNDATION is housed here, and has pretty well taken over the occupancy of the entire building. Whereas this used to be a strong residential church, it is now used by students at the University of Minnesota, for it is centrally located on the campus.

Wesley Church was the second church organization and building in the city. It is located at Marquette and Grant Streets and is now considered an inner-city church. In the past fifteen years, the membership of Wesley Church has decreased to its present membership of 691 (1970 Minutes). There is a large office building built by the Wesley Church Corporation located next to this handsome, red stone church and the complex is known as The Wesley Temple. This church has been a strong influence in the building of Minneapolis, its government and high standards.

Richfield Church, located at 58th and Lyndale Avenue, was a pioneer Methodist church in 1854. In the past twenty years, this church has grown to 2,579 members and is still a powerful church in the city's life.

North Church, located on the north side of Minneapolis confronting one of the city's beautiful parks, was another early church with its history beginning in 1854. It has a membership of 754. Their building has been modernized and made usable for worship, educational programs, social relations, office facilities and many serviceable contributions to people in North Minneapolis.

Aldersgate in St. Louis Park, West Minneapolis, has a membership of 1,392, a fine church edifice with facilities for worship, Christian education, administrative work and a beautiful chapel.

Brooklyn Center is another early pioneering church that began in a truck-farming suburb of Minneapolis in 1854. Like these other churches described, this one-time rural church has been modernized and made into one of our most attractive suburban churches with a membership of 1,213.

Columbia Heights is a well situated church in Northeast Minneapolis that has grown with strides to 860 members in the past twenty years.

Hillcrest Church, likewise, has sprung forward in leaps and bounds possessing a beautiful church property which enables them to serve their 1,093 members with great efficiency and strong leadership.

Simpson Church is another inner-church that has decreased in membership to 413 members after an illustrious past giving strong leadership to all phases of the city's life and growth.

Hobart Church was named for CHAUNCEY HOBART, who was appointed the first district superintendent of the Minneapolis district in 1853. Hobart is known as the father of MINNESOTA Methodism. Hobart Church is located in a fine residential part of Minneapolis and is considered one of the finest of the smaller metropolitan churches. Its membership is 445.

Lake Harriet Church is another larger church with a membership of 1,368. It has a church property of great value to enable it to carry forward the best type of Methodist church program—which it is doing.

Hennepin Avenue Church is one of the architectural and religious landmarks of the city. An unusual octagonal Gothic structure, with its slender spire rising more than 200 feet above the hillside on which it stands, it is one of the commanding religious edifices of Minneapolis. Members of the congregation have historically been active in the life of the city, giving the church an equally impressive place in the community.

The church was first organized in 1875. It was formed as a Sunday school, organized by seventy-six members of an already-existing Methodist church. Apparently there had been some dissension concerning the doctrine of SANCTIFICATION.

In 1911, the members of the congregation were talking about the wisdom of relocating. They were given a piece of property on Lowry Hill, a prominent location in the growing city, but very close to Fowler Methodist Church, which had been organized in 1892. The two congregations agreed to merge and build a new structure on the donated property. The present buildings were dedicated on Oct. 22, 1916, and a modern church school building was added in 1950.

The Walker Art Gallery in the Hennepin Avenue Church is a renowned assembly of religious art of great value. The collection was presented to the church by Mr. and Mrs. T. B. Walker in 1914, and includes a series of more than two hundred lithographs. These are displayed on the stone walls and corridors and rooms of the church buildings, and are said to be the only set in America of the famous engravings of the Holy Land, Arabia, Egypt, and Nubia done by Louis Haghe from water colors painted in 1838-39 by David Roberts of the Royal Society.

Families of the church have been active in instituting and developing such Methodist institutions as Walker Home for the Aging, the Methodist and Asbury Hospitals.

Four bishops have been elected from among its pastors: CHARLES BAYARD MITCHELL, CHARLES WESLEY BURNS, RICHARD C. RAINES and DWIGHT E. LODER.

The congregation has numbered approximately four thousand for more than a quarter century. Its membership is inclusive of all races, particularly since 1956 when members of the Border Methodist Church (Negro) became members of this congregation. The church has long been numbered among the denomination's leaders in WORLD SERVICE and ADVANCE SPECIALS giving. Membership in 1970 was 4,158. Chester A. Pennington has been senior pastor since 1955.

There are forty-three United Methodist churches in greater Minneapolis with a total membership of 22,293. Methodism claims a strong fifteen percent of the population of greater Minneapolis, and, with the population gains through the years, has kept pace. Methodism is well thought of in Minneapolis by people in all walks of life and from its beginning has given strength and power to the religious life of the city.

Walker Methodist Residence and Nursing Home, Inc., began in 1945, under the auspices of the MINNESOTA CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church. What is now known as the "A Building," a three-story brick building conveniently located in South Minneapolis, had formerly served as a maternity home and hospital. From the beginning of this Home, it was decided that never would a lack of finances be a deterrent in the admission of any worthy Methodist. Consequently the financial structure was established on a monthly payment basis, with a membership fee of $300. Residents were encouraged to furnish their own rooms, in order that this might be a building of many homes. There were only a few double rooms, indicating that privacy was an attribute recognized and appreciated by the official family.

The Administrator, who had a medical casework background before going into administration, recognized the need for a Social Service Department and an occupational therapy program, and as a consequence these two ancillary services were immediately available to residents.

It was originally requested that the applicant be a member of a Methodist church for the past five years, and because the rate was set at $50 a month, the recipients of Old Age Assistance were able to enjoy the same benefits and privileges as those of greater financial resources. The Elm Home, the property of the Norwegian-Swedish-Danish Conference of the Methodist Church, was closed, and its occupants became the first residents of the Walker Methodist Residence. A waiting list developed immediately. Consequently in 1951 the "B Building," adding one hundred beds, each with an individual full bath, was erected. At this time a recreational director was added to the staff, and a dietitian.

In 1957 the "C Building," containing nineteen apartments for gracious living (but not light housekeeping), in addition to sixty private rooms, was built and occupied.

The need for a Health Center facility was recognized, and so in 1964 ground was broken for the present Health Care Center, which was occupied for the first time as of May 25, 1966. Here again privacy was recognized as a form of therapy, and there are double rooms provided for couples, where the hale spouse may occupy the room with the one who is ill, or if both are ill, they may receive care together. Three of the five floors are carpeted, and there is air conditioning on these floors also.

A basic premise of the Board of Trustees has been that those who have attained maturer years need and deserve recognition, understanding and the opportunity for creative living. The Residence has participated actively in community programs in the geriatric field, and has served as a center for activities for older people.

MINNESOTA, the twelfth largest state in the Union, is located in the north central section of the United States. It is bounded by CANADA on the north, Lake Superior and WISCONSIN on the east, IOWA on the south, and SOUTH and NORTH DAKOTA on the west. It was admitted to the Union in 1858, and in 1970 its population was over 3,760,000. Its area is 84,000 square miles. There are more than 10,000 lakes and thirty-four major parks in the state. Its sandy soil is very fertile. While primarily an agricultural state, Minnesota leads the nation in the production of iron ore. It also has considerable deposits of marble, limestone, granite, jasper, sandstone, mica, feldspar, travertine and clay. Among its most important industries are livestock, meat packing, grain, flour, machinery, printing and publishing.

Minnesota was originally occupied by the Ojibway and Chippewa Indian tribes in the north and by the Dakota or Sioux tribes in the south. The first whites to enter the region were Frenchmen, P. E. Radisson and M. Chouart, who may have visited the territory as early as 1655. In 1679 Father Louis Hennepin accompanied the explorer Duluth (Duluth) into the area and later wrote the first published book describing the state. In 1762 the land was ceded by France to Spain in a secret treaty, but English leaders explored the eastern section where they established trading posts. The British ceded the territory to the United States after the Revolutionary War, although the English flag flew from the trading posts until after the War of 1812. In 1803 the United States purchased the western section of the country from France which had regained the territory from Spain.

The first Methodist mission in Minnesota was opened in May, 1837 at the Sioux village of Kaposia (now South St. Paul) by ALFRED BRUNSON of the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE. Here the first Methodist society in Minnesota was organized in 1837 with thirty-four members. One of the converts, Jacob Folstrom, a Swedish fur trader whose wife was an Indian, was said to be worth the whole cost of the mission. Folstrom became a local preacher and proved to be an invaluable guide and interpreter for the missionaries. In 1838 a mission was begun among the Chippewa Indians at Elk River on the Upper Mississippi by G. W. Brown, and in 1839 and 1840 missions were opened at Sandy Lake and Fond du Lac by Samuel Spates and John Johnson. In 1853 missions were started at Millie Lac and other places. Though these missions were productive of much good among the Indians, all were eventually abandoned.

The first Methodist work among the whites in Minnesota began in 1844 when the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE appointed Joseph Hurlburt to the St. Croix Mission which included all the settlements of the Mississippi and its tributaries above the head of Lake Pepin. Hurlburt preached at Fort Snelling, RED ROCK, Stillwater, Marine, Osceola, and St. Croix Falls. In 1846 Hurlburt was succeeded by Jonathan W. Putnam who added Point Douglas and St. Anthony Falls to the circuit. Three years later Minnesota became a district in the WISCONSIN CONFERENCE, and in June, 1849 CHAUNCEY HOBART, called the "Father of Minnesota Methodism," was appointed presiding elder of the Minnesota District and pastor at St. Paul. Methodist churches were organized in 1849 at both St. Paul and MINNEAPOLIS, and in that year Hobart built the brick Market Street Church in St. Paul, the first Methodist church building in the territory of Minnesota.

In 1852, a treaty with the Indians opened the rich country between the Mississippi and Minnesota Rivers for settlement, and thereafter the Minnesota District expanded rapidly. In 1855 the Minnesota District of the Wisconsin Conference was set off as the MINNESOTA CONFERENCE. In 1856 the Jackson Street Methodist Church was erected in St. Paul. Now used only for business, it is the oldest standing Methodist church building in Minnesota. The church at Montecello, built in 1857, is the oldest Methodist church edifice in continuous use in the state.

In 1894 the Minnesota Conference was divided to form the NORTHERN MINNESOTA CONFERENCE, the latter comprising about two-thirds of the state. The two bodies continued separately until 1948 when, after prolonged study by a merger commission, they united to form again the statewide Minnesota Conference.

In 1859 the Minnesota Conference formed a Scandinavian Mission District, but as time passed all foreign language work was assigned to foreign language annual conferences. In 1877 the Swedish churches became a part of the Northwest Swedish Conference which covered ILLINOIS, IOWA, and some other states. This conference later divided to form several Swedish conferences, one of which, the NORTHERN SWEDISH CONFERENCE, was fairly strong in Minnesota. The Northwest Norwegian Conference, covering Minnesota, Illinois, Wisconsin, and other states, was formed in 1880. Five years later it became the NORWEGIAN AND DANISH CONFERENCE which continued until 1943. The NORTHERN GERMAN CONFERENCE, including work in Minnesota and North Dakota, was formed in 1886, which continued until 1924.

The M.P. CHURCH organized a Minnesota Conference in 1858 with five ministers and four laymen. It was never strong; in 1877 the denomination had only 300 members in the state. The work dissolved after 1908. The Minnesota Conference of the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH was organized in 1859. As time passed the conference was unwilling to abide by the denomination's stand on secret societies. About 1903 the conference dissolved, and the congregations which remained loyal to the denomination were attached to the Iowa Conference. The FREE METHODISTS operate in the state through their Northern Iowa-Minnesota Conference. In 1970 the conference had ten churches in Minnesota.

The United Methodists in Minnesota support one Methodist related college, WESLEY FOUNDATIONS, several hospitals, homes for the aged, and other institutions. United Methodism is the largest Protestant denomination in the state. In 1970 the Minnesota Conference reported eight districts, 505 ministers, 319 pastoral charges, 139,224 members, and property valued at $79,469,636.

MINNESOTA CONFERENCE (ME) was organized August 7, 1856 in HAMLIN UNIVERSITY Chapel, Red Wing, Minn., with Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON presiding. At the outset the conference had four districts, St. Paul, Minnesota, Red Wing, and Winona. There were forty-seven itinerants, forty-five local preachers, fifty-three charges (seven in Wisconsin), and 1,761 members.

Methodism in MINNESOTA began with mission work among the Indians in 1837. Work among the whites started in 1844 when the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE appointed Joseph Hurlburt to the St. Croix Mission. Five years later there was a Minnesota District in the WISCONSIN CONFERENCE.

In 1850 there was Methodist sentiment in favor of establishing a school or seminary in Minnesota, and on March 3, 1854 Hamline University was chartered by the legislature. The school opened with 139 students at Red Wing, Goodhue County, in November 1854. Bishop L. L. HAMLIN, for whom the institution was named, donated $25,000. In 1855 a brick building containing a chapel, school room, library, reading rooms, laboratory, recreation rooms, and dormitory quarters was erected.

By 1859 the Minnesota Conference had grown to seven districts. The next year it lost one district to the WEST WISCONSIN CONFERENCE and one to the DETROIT CONFERENCE, but at the same time it added a Scandinavian Mission District. As time passed Swedish, German, and Norwegian-Danish annual conferences were organized, though none was limited to the state of Minnesota alone. (See Minnesota, and the Table of Methodist Annual Conferences).

In 1877 NORTH DAKOTA was attached to the Minnesota

Conference, an arrangement which continued until 1884 when the NORTH DAKOTA CONFERENCE was organized. In 1894 the Minnesota Conference was divided to form the NORTHERN MINNESOTA CONFERENCE. Fifty-three years later the two merged to form again the state-wide Minnesota Conference. At the time of the merger the Minnesota Conference had 42,490 members and the Northern body 47,481.

Because of the generosity of one Mrs. S. H. Knight, the Minnesota Conference was able to establish Asbury Methodist Hospital and the Rebecca M. Harrison Deaconess Home in MINNEAPOLIS in 1892.

In 1968 Minnesota Methodism was giving support to three hospitals, Asbury in Minneapolis, Methodist Hospital just outside Minneapolis, and the Rochester Methodist Hospital. It had one Methodist related college, Hamline University in St. Paul, and it conducted WESLEY FOUNDATIONS at the University of Minnesota, St. Paul College, St. Cloud Teacher's College, Duluth College, and at the state teachers' colleges in Bemidji, Mankato, and Winona. The conference established Walker Home for the aged in Minneapolis, the Paul Watkins Memorial Home in Winona, and homes at Fairmont and Montevideo, along with the Tourelotte Memorial Deaconess Home for retired nurses. In addition, the GOODWILL INDUSTRIES in Duluth, St. Paul, Minneapolis, and St. Cloud, and the Methodist Girls Club in St. Paul (a home for working girls) receive support.

Minnesota Methodism has furnished a number of leaders for the church, including three bishops, CHARLES WESLEY BURNS, RICHARD C. RAINES, and T. OTTO NALL.

In 1970 the Minnesota Conference had eight districts, 505 ministers, 319 pastoral charges, 139,224 members, and property valued at $79,469,636.

MINNESOTA CONFERENCE (EUB) had its origin in two conferences. The Minnesota Conference of the CHURCH of the UNITED BRETHREN in CHRIST was organized by Bishop LEWIS DAVIS, Aug. 5, 1857, at Marion, near the present city of ROCHESTER, Minn. One year later a membership of 201 was reported. The first minister was Edmund Clow, who came to Winona County from the Rock River Conference in the fall of 1854. Two years later the Home, Frontier and Foreign Missionary Society sent J. W. Fulkerson from VIRGINIA, who became presiding elder when the Conference was organized.

The second original conference is the Minnesota Conference of the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION of North America. It was organized by Bishop J. J. ESCHER on April 24, 1868, in Emmanuel's Church, Dakota County, near Farmington, Minn., and numbered 1,536 members. From 1856 to 1860, the Minnesota congregations had been a part of the Wisconsin Conference, and from 1861 to 1868, of the Iowa Conference. The first minister was Andrew Tamutzy, who came to Winona County in the fall of 1856 from the Wisconsin Conference. He organized the first congregation on March 2, 1857, in what is now Inver Grove Heights. The second building of this congregation (1874) still stands five miles south of the State Capitol. It is located, with the cemetery, on Salem Church Road and is known locally as Salem Church Memorial Shrine, Minnesota ministers established congregations in Dakota Territory between 1874 and 1884. The Dakota Conference was organized in 1884 with about one thousand members. The German language was used for worship services in most of the congregations in the Dakota and Minnesota Conferences until 1914.

After a minority group from the Evangelical Association formed THE UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH in 1894, congregations were established in Minnesota by the Des Moines Conference (UE). In 1899, these were placed in the newly formed Northwestern Conference (UE). In 1922, The United Evangelical Church and the Evangelical Association united to form THE EVANGELICAL CHURCH. At the session of the Minnesota Conference in 1923, nine fields and ten ministers from the Northwestern Conference became a part of the Minnesota Conference of The Evangelical Church. At that time there were 7,980 members.

The Minnesota Conference of the E.U.B. CHURCH was organized in Rochester, May 2, 1951, when the two original conferences united. At the time of this union there were 14,485 members. Of these 2,235 were former United Brethren and 12,250 were former Evangelical members. At the beginning of 1969 there were in the Conference 15,286 members in eighty-three congregations served by sixty-two ordained and one non-ordained minister. Most of the churches are located in the southern one-half of Minnesota and about twenty-two percent of the membership lives in the seven-county Twin City metropolitan area of MINNEAPOLIS and ST. PAUL. Union with the former Methodist conference in Minnesota was effected in 1969.

MINNIS, JESSE F. (1895-), American M. P. Missionary to INDIA, was born in Orange County, N. C., on June 10, 1895. He was educated at Elon College (B.A.), WESTMINSTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY (B.D.), DREW UNIVERSITY (M.A.), and had a year of graduate study in Cornell University. He married Meryl Stokes of MARYLAND shortly before going to India in 1922.

His first appointment was as superintendent and treasurer of the Methodist Protestant Mission at Dhulia, West Khandesh District, Bombay Province. Except when on furlough, he remained superintendent of the mission until it was united with the BOMBAY ANNUAL CONFERENCE of the Methodist Church in Southern Asia. He was then named superintendent of the Dhulia-Puntamba District.

After unification his appointments included, besides the one already mentioned, superintendent of the Nagpur and Bombay districts, and supervisor of building construction in the Bombay Annual Conference. He wrote a booklet in English entitled Financing the Rural Church. In 1955 Mrs. Minnis became ill, and physicians ordered the return of the family to America. Although she recovered, it was thought inadvisable for them to try again to work in the tropics. Jesse Minnis joined the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE and served various churches as pastor. He retired from the missionary ranks in 1961 and from the Annual Conference in 1963.

MINOR DISTRICT SYNOD. The Wesleyan Methodist Conference of 1793 made provision for a court of appeal for preachers accused of immorality or at odds with their colleagues. This consisted of two preachers chosen by the accused and two chosen by the accuser, presided over by the Chairman of the District, who had a casting vote. This "Minor District Meeting" was empowered to act on behalf of the District Meeting comprising all the preachers, either by suspending the preacher accused or by arbitrating in the dispute. Any preacher thus subject to discipline had the right of appeal to a full District Meeting or to the Conference itself. In 1894 the court was increased to six (apart from the chairman) by the addition of two preachers nominated by the Chairman of the District or (if the Chairman himself was a party in the dispute) by the President of the Conference.

In 1835 the principle of appointing a small group to adjudicate disputes between preachers was extended by the Conference to lay members of the Wesleyan Methodist Society who felt that they had been unjustly expelled. They also were empowered to nominate two preachers to a Minor District Committee which had "the power of modifying, reversing, or confirming the sentence." At the same time and in a similar manner the Superintendent Minister was also given the right of appeal against any LEADERS' MEETING which he felt was obstructing his work. Because these provisions were sometimes misunderstood, sometimes abused, the Conference of 1852 provided for a second hearing of disciplinary cases within the CIRCUIT itself by a "special circuit meeting" consisting of not more than twelve lay members appointed by the QUARTERLY MEETING, to be presided over by the Chairman of the District.

The Wesleyan Methodist Conference of 1892 officially altered the title of what had been called both District Meetings and District Committees to "District Synods," and as a consequence the Minor District Meeting was renamed a Minor District Synod. Under this designation the court has been continued with provisions almost unaltered into the Methodist Church.

MINUTES OF CONFERENCE, quite often termed Journals in connection with the reporting of the General and Annual Conferences in American Methodism, have always been carefully kept by a Secretary and his assistants in each Conference involved.

JOHN WESLEY called the first Methodist Conference in 1744 and JOHN BENNET—then a lay preacher—kept the Minutes of this gathering. WILLIAM MYLES—one of Wesley's preachers and an intimate friend of the founder of Methodism—states, "The subjects of their deliberations were proposed in the form of questions, which were amply discussed, and with the answers, written down and afterwards printed under the title 'Minutes of Several Conversations Between the Reverend Mr. Wesley and Others' but now commonly called the 'Minutes of the Conference'". (William Myles, Chronological History of the Methodists, London, Third Edition, 1803, p. 23, quoted by Thomas B. Neeley, History of the Origin and Development of the Governing Conference in Methodism, Cincinnati: Cranston & Stowe, New York: Hunt and Eaton, 1892).

John Bennet's Minutes quoting Mr. Wesley in the record of the 1744 Conference stated, "It is desired . . .

that we may meet with a single eye and as little children who have everything to learn; that every point may be examined from the foundation; that every person may speak freely whatever is in his heart; and that every question proposed may be fully debated, and bolted to the bran." This last expression "bolted to the bran" was the common one at that day, and referred to the sifting of wheat—bolting—until nothing but bran was left.

The question and answer pattern of the Minutes of 1744 and afterward was continued until this became fixed in the LARGE MINUTES, and eventually in the Book of Discipline in American Methodism. The "minute questions" must yet be called and answered in quarterly and annual conferences.

The minutes of all Methodist Conferences—as in all organized bodies—are kept by a Secretary, and these Minutes are usually read and approved by the body as a whole if time permits. The General Conference of The Methodist Church usually has a "Committee on the Journal" which it elects and holds responsible for seeing that the Minutes have been properly kept by the Secretary, and reporting that fact to the General Conference itself. In the case of the Annual Conference, there is sometimes a similar Committee on Minutes, though when time allows, the Minutes of the preceding session are publicly read by the Secretary, and then approved by the Conference with such corrections or amendments as seem needed, with the bishop putting the question, "Are the Minutes correct?" If he hears no objection, he declares them approved as read.

This is also the procedure in District and Quarterly Conferences though quite often the District Superintendent after holding a Quarterly Conference, will adjourn that body stating that as the Secretary has not had time to prepare the Minutes of the particular session, these will be subject to approval by a subsequent conference or by a Committee. Occasionally the Conference simply agrees to trust the secretary for completing an accurate account.

In American Methodism it has been the custom for many years to publish the proceedings of the General Conference under the title of The Journal of such and such Conference. With the Annual Conferences the same nomenclature in a great many instances is followed and thus the Minutes become the Journal of the Kentucky Conference, or Journal of the New York Conference, etc., of such and such a date.

The Journal of the usual Annual Conference carries beside the minutes, the conference roll or directory; the memoirs of the deceased preachers, and sometimes wives of preachers; tables of statistics and reports of various kinds, together with resolutions and reports adopted; and sometimes of speeches or addresses which the Conference orders to be printed in its Minutes or its Journal. A file of the Minutes or Journals of any Annual Conference will provide much material for the history of that Conference, as the successive Journals of the General Conference also provide a history of the undertaking and work of the general Church.

It may be mentioned in connection with the General Conference and the Jurisdictional Conferences that a Daily Christian Advocate is published at such quadrennial sessions, and the exact record of everything said on the floor of the Conference, as well as all actions taken is minutely transcribed for each daily issue. (For Minutes in the British Methodist Church, see CONFERENCE, MINUTES OF; see also LARGE MINUTES for the general pattern of Methodist Conference procedures.)

MIRANDA, BERNARDO DE (1863-1891), pioneer Brazilian preacher, was born in Paranaguá, Province of Paraná, BRAZIL. Reared a Catholic, he was converted under the preaching of J. W. TARBOUX. Miranda bought his first Bible in 1883, and became one of four founding members of the Methodist church in São PAULO, when it was organized by J. W. Koger. Almost immediately he began preaching on the São Paulo Circuit. In 1886, he received an appointment from Bishop GRANBERY when the bishop organized Brazil's first annual conference. Miranda was admitted as a local preacher on July 14, 1887, and in December 1889, he helped E. A. Tilly organize the Methodist church in Taubaté, state of São Paulo. Miranda was ordained DEACON in August 1890, when the first such ordination took place in Brazil.

By the end of that year, however, severe illness forced his retirement, and he died of yellow fever on Feb. 13, 1891—the first Brazilian preacher to die in the service.

MIRANDA, LUDGERO LUIZ De (1864-1892), Brazilian Methodist preacher, was born in what was then the province of São PAULO. At the age of thirteen, he left home to work in Santos, and there he lived for three years. In a short autobiographical sketch written in 1892, he told of hearing the Gospel for the first time in August 1884, on the invitation of his older brother, BERNARDO DE MIRANDA. He was converted after hearing JOHN W. TARBOUX's sermon on "The Strait and Wide Roads," and was so moved that he at once resolved to become a preacher as was his brother, Bernardo. He went to Rio DE JANEIRO where he studied some months under J. J. RANSOM. In August 1886, Ransom sent him to JUIZ DE FORA, state of Minas Gerais, to sell Bibles and other books in anticipation of opening Methodist work there.

Ludgero worked in two or three small stations in the state of Minas Gerais, one being Rio Novo. There in August 1886, as he preached and sold Bibles with FELIPE DE CARVALHO, another young preacher as companion, both were arrested, marched through the streets like common criminals, and ordered to leave town within forty-eight hours. But JAMES L. KENNEDY, coming through at this time with Bishop J. O. GRANBERY, went to the police authorities, claimed their right to speak, and had them freed with permission to continue the services. In 1891, Miranda was ordained DEACON, and this, he wrote, "was the most glorious day in my life."

Tragedy, however, cut short his career in the ministry early in 1892. His wife, Heminia, died of yellow fever on January 2; his little girl on January 5; and Ludgero himself died on January 17. Thus, within a period of two weeks, a whole family was wiped out by this dread disease.

Though only twenty-eight years of age, Ludgero had won many to Christ, and he died victoriously.

MISSION BOATS, or Canadian West Coast marine missions, began in the year 1874 when THOMAS CROSBY was sent to Port Simpson on the northwest coast. From this center he traveled some three thousand miles yearly in dugout canoes, sailboats, and steamers, bringing the Gospel to isolated Indian villages.

In 1883, Crosby went East and managed to raise $7,000. With this money the "Glad Tidings" was built in New Westminster by a recently converted shipwright and seaman called WILLIAM OLIVER. A wooden vessel of forty tons, she was seventy-one feet over-all with a fourteen-foot beam and a depth in the hold of eight feet. She was fitted in Victoria with a 323 nominal horsepower steam engine. When the "Glad Tidings" arrived in Port Simpson in the winter of 1884 on her maiden voyage, the natives welcomed her by firing cannons, raising flags at every pole, and calling out the brass band. Reputed to run on "porridge and prayers," she was known to the natives as the "Come-to-Jesus Boat" because of Crosby's habit of standing on the bow and singing the hymn with these words as they approached a village. In 19 years of service the "Glad Tidings" logged 78,041 miles. She carried missionaries, teachers, and medical aid to countless outposts, and assisted in the building of more than thirty churches, schools, and mission houses. She carried mail and materials for lighthouses, remote villages, and logging camps; but her prime cargo was the Gospel powerfully preached by Crosby, assisted by Captain William Oliver. The "Glad Tidings" was blown ashore and wrecked in 1903. She had never been insured.

The "Udal," a fifteen-ton, forty-five-foot, diesel-powered boat was built by Captain Oliver at his own expense and presented to the church in 1908. Trimmed with fancy brass fittings from Scotland, the "Udal" (Haida for "The Dearest Thing I Possess") struck the shore in northern waters and sank before she had sailed a year.

Following the loss of the "Udal," a forty-five-foot, gasoline-engined boat called the "Homespun" was purchased. Skipped by Captain Oliver, she carried on the work for about three years.

In 1912, the "Homespun" was sold and an 83-foot, 166-ton steamship was built and named the "Thomas Crosby." During the First World War she was commandeered by the government to do patrol work. Then, following the war, even though she earned $1,000 a year by dropping off mail at the lighthouses, she was found to be too costly. She was sold in 1919 and replaced by three smaller boats: the "Iwyll," which was run out of Cape Mudge by Captain Robert Scott; the "William Oliver," which worked out of Alert Bay, but which later was moved to the Queen Charlotte Islands; and the "Thomas Crosby II," which was blown ashore and wrecked at Sandspit on December 5, 1920. The "Iwyll" was replaced by the "Edward White," which eventually became a medical launch used by G. E. DARBY at Bella Bella. In 1923, the "Thomas Crosby III" was built by Captain Oliver, backed by the home mission board. Powered with the old Miller engine from the wrecked "Crosby II," this boat carried on the work around the Queen Charlotte Islands and the Northern mainland coast for nearly fifteen years. By this time the Methodist Church had been incorporated into The United Church of Canada, which, in 1966, still operated a fleet of boats as well as one seaplane.

MISSIONARY BANDS OF THE WORLD was formed in 1885 by Vivian A. Dake, a minister of the Free Methodist Church, as a society for missionary recruitment and fellowship among the youth of his charge. It was originally called the Pentecost Band. Other similar groups were formed, and after a short time they declared independence as the Pentecostal Bands of the World. The name Missionary Bands of the World was adopted in 1925. In 1958 they merged with the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH.

MISSIONARY BISHOPS. A Missionary Bishop was a bishop in the M. E. Church elected for a specified foreign field with full episcopal powers there, but with his episcopal jurisdiction limited to the foreign mission field for which he was elected. (Discipline, 1888, Paragraph 166.)

This grade of bishop, with supervision limited to a special field, was somewhat the outgrowth of the contention regarding the episcopacy which was maintained by the (Northern) majority of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1844, which decided that the office of bishop was completely under the control of the General Conference. (See PLAN OF SEPARATION.) The action in 1844 (against which the Southern delegates contended strongly) in effect said that the Methodist bishop had no constitutional status but only a statutory one, whose powers could be fully determined by the majority vote of a General Conference.

It seemed good, therefore, to the M. E. Church, as mission fields grew and there was need of episcopal supervision there, to put a bishop in each one of these lands, but to avoid giving him general superintendency. "A Missionary Bishop is not, in the meaning of the Discipline, a General Superintendent." (Paragraph 167, Discipline, 1888.) The legislation creating this office, however, held Missionary Bishops not to be subordinate to the true General Superintendents, but co-ordinate with them in authority in the special field for which they were elected, and each one was amenable for his conduct to the General Conference, just as were the General Superintendents. It was further provided by the 1888 General Conference that the election of one to be a Missionary Bishop carried with it the assignment to the specified foreign mission field; and that such a bishop could not thereafter become a General Superintendent except by a distinct election to that office.

Missionary Bishops of this distinct type were continued in the M. E. Church up until the time of Church union in 1939. The Constitution of that year made no provision for the election of this distinct type of bishop. When such supervision for the overseas missions fields was found to be needed (as was the case after Church union with Southern Europe and a large part of the African work), the General Conference requested specific JURISDICTIONS to elect bishops whom it was understood would be full General Superintendents, and assign them to these regions. Pursuant to this, Bishop PAUL N. GARBER was elected a General Superintendent by the Southeastern Jurisdiction and assigned to the GENEVA Area in 1948; Bishop NEWELL

BOOTH was elected a bishop by the Northeastern Jurisdiction for the Congo and assigned to that Area. Both these men subsequently were brought back to the United States and placed in charge of Episcopal Areas in their respective Jurisdictions.

The Constitution of The United Methodist Church made no provision for electing this distinct type of bishop, though statutory legislation in the Disciplines of The Methodist Church, and now in The United Methodist Church, defines the office and powers thereof. However, upon the death of Bishop Cowry and the other missionary bishops who were such at the time of union in 1939, the office had seemingly disappeared from life in The Methodist and The United Methodist Church. MISSIONARY METHODIST CHURCH, THE, was formed in 1913 by members of the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH who withdrew in a dispute over a number of rules and regulations. The organization of the church, originally called the Holiness Methodist Church, was at Forest City, N. C., on July 28. Henry Clay Sisk, Thomas A. Sisk, James C. Stafford, and J. B. Sisk led in the church's formation, along with Miss Lillie Hardin, the first secretary. The doctrine of the church is Wesleyan, with a strong doctrine of SANCTIFICATION and ESCHATOLOGY. Three sacraments are observed, baptism, the Lord's Supper, and foot washing. The church's government is connexional, with property held jointly by the local church and the annual conference. The pastor is called by the local congregation. Ministerial education is by a course of study, an annual Bible Institute, and a correspondence course given by Union Bible Seminary, Westville, Ind.

In 1970 the sect reported twelve churches, being served by thirty-two ministers, with 1,200 members. Mission work is carried on through the Oriental Missionary Society.

MISSIONARY RECORD, THE (1885-1939), was the monthly denominational periodical sponsored first as The Woman's Missionary Record by the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M.P. Church and after 1928 by the Board of Missions of the M.P. Church. It was published in BALTIMORE, Md. Its purpose was to create a missionary spirit by informing readers of the mission work of the denomination and its needs. It contained news of both home and foreign missions, colleges, leadership training schools and the various benevolent interests of the M.P. Church. It offered constructive program materials for the use of individual church auxiliaries, and during 1938-1940 gave information containing the missionary implications of the Methodist union. The Missionary Record was an outgrowth of The Methodist Missionary, published by T. H. COLHOUSER, who, because of pastoral duties, was forced to discontinue the publication. It was then taken up by C. H. Williams, Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Missions, who called the paper

The Methodist Protestant Missionary. At the meeting of the Executive Board of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society in 1885 the Board of Missions offered the publication to the society to be used as its official organ. The paper was adopted and its name changed to The Woman's Missionary Record. Mrs. Mary A. Miller, the first editor, served in that position for ten years. The motto, "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me," was adopted. In later years the motto, "Not by might nor by power, but by My Spirit saith the Lord of hosts," was used. The first issue of The Woman's Missionary Record appeared in July 1885. Mrs. F. C. Huling, who was editor from 1898-1903, introduced the magazine form of the periodical that was used thereafter. Mrs. J. F. McCULLOCH was editor for some twenty years beginning in 1903 and her husband published the magazine for ten years. When the periodical became the official organ of the Board of Missions of the M.P. Church following the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1928, the "Woman's" was dropped from the name. Mrs. Marie W. Thompson, who served as editor of The Missionary Record for five years, was followed by Miss BETTIE S. BRITTINGHAM, formerly Dean of Women at Westminster College, Tehuacua, Texas, who served as editor from 1933 until the merger of The Missionary Record into a new magazine, The Methodist Woman, in September 1940.

MISSIONARY RULE is the disciplinary proviso commonly referred to by this name which allows persons to be ordained (Discipline, TMC, 1964, Paragraph 403.3) as a special privilege for those going to the mission field. This obviates the necessity of serving as deacons under appointment for the length of time the normal minister must before ordination in the homeland. The Board of Missions, however, has its own specifications for approving carefully such persons, and the bishop who ordains them is only empowered to conduct such ordination when it is certified that such persons will be under appointment immediately for foreign work by the Board. Regulations regarding this matter have been changed in minor particulars through subsequent Disciplines within recent years, but the missionary rule is still in use.

MISSIONS AND BOARD OF MISSIONS OF THE E.U.B. CHURCH. History of Evangelical Missions. The Eastern Conference of the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION organized the first missionary society at its session in 1838. In order to broaden the scope a subsequent meeting was held March 1, 1839 near New Berlin, Pa. and the General Missionary Society of the Evangelical Association was formed and constitution adopted. The General Conference that year sanctioned the society and introduced a section into the Discipline on "support of missions." The first missionaries assigned under the Society were sent out in 1839 to the Mohawk Valley in NEW YORK, to Ontario (CANADA), and New York City.

A Board of Missions was created by the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1859, whereby mission work assumed by the Society was managed by the Board. A full-time Missionary Secretary was elected. Earlier, in 1850, the annual conferences had cooperated in establishing a GERMANY Mission, although the Eastern Conference gave more direct support. A Japanese mission was opened in 1875, followed in 1904 with one in CHINA.

With the formation of THE UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH in 1894 a Missionary Society was established, but the Church did not elect a full-time secretary until the General Conference of 1906. A mission field was formed at Changsha, China with the arrival in that city of the first missionary couple, Nov. 27, 1901.

When the Evangelical Association and The United Evangelical Church united in 1922, the Missionary Society of The EVANGELICAL CHURCH became the legal successor. It later added work in NIGERIA to the foreign fields already established.

United Brethren in Christ. In 1841 General Conference established the "Parent Missionary Society of the United Brethren in Christ" to extend the Gospel both on the frontier and in foreign lands. In 1845 a Board of Missions was formed to supervise the work of the Society. Then in 1853 the General Conference organized the Home, Frontier, and Foreign Missionary Society. Two missions were located (Southern Missouri and Canada) and arrangements made to send missionaries to Africa in that same year. Generally, however, home mission work was left to the management of the self-supporting annual conferences. In 1905 Home Missions were made independent and a Home Missionary Society was formed. In 1921 the Home Mission Board and the Church Erection Board were brought together.

Starting with work in SIERRA LEONE, West Africa in 1853, fields were opened in China (1889), JAPAN (1895), PUERTO RICO (1899), and the PHILIPPINE ISLANDS (1901). The work begun in Germany in 1869 was turned over to the M.E. Church in 1905. Cooperative work was also initiated in the Dominican Republic.

Evangelical United Brethren Church. In 1946 the Board of Missions was established, successor to the several missionary and church extension societies which operated in the two churches. Then the Board of Missions was re-organized in 1966 with the following Divisions: World Missions; National Missions; Women's Service; Missions Resources. A General Secretary was elected for the entire Board with executive secretaries for each Division. One office of Treasurer operated for the entire Board.

At the time of the formation of The United Methodist Church mission fields were being conducted, either cooperatively with other denominations or singly, in Nigeria, Sierra Leone, BRAZIL, ECUADOR, HONG KONG, Japan, IN-DONESIA, SARAWAK, the Philippine Islands, and Puerto Rico.

MISSIONS, AND ORGANIZED METHODIST MISSIONARY WORK. There is a sense in which Methodism itself was a missionary movement, and the same in an even larger way may be said of Christianity. Certainly the sense of mission was always to the fore in all the movements of the first Methodist Societies, and afterward in all the growth and organizational work of the various Methodist branch churches as they came to be. JOHN WESLEY himself came to America as a missionary in 1735, and later on as the head of the Methodist movement he sent men to preach in various places who were understood to be not only preachers but missionaries of gospel light. The beginnings of Methodist work in America has been told in other places in this Encyclopedia. The M.E. Church in America was organized under that name in December 1784, and immediately began expanding mission-wise almost in parallel with the expansion of the westward-growing nation.

The expansion of American Methodism and its separate organizational moves can best be told under the following divisions:

Methodist Episcopal Church (undivided), 1784-1844.

Methodist Episcopal Church (separated), 1845-1939.

Methodist Episcopal Church, South, 1845-1939.

Methodist Protestant Church, 1830-1939.

Note: The material which appears herewith is in large part the adaptation of an article on Methodist Missions taken from the Encyclopedia of Modern Christian Missions. The general editor of this was Burton L. Coddard, and it was published in 1967 by Gordon College and Gordon Divinity School, Thomas Nelson and Sons being the publisher. We make grateful acknowledgment to Thomas Nelson and Sons for the use of this copyrighted material. In certain instances the material has been adapted and edited to bring it up to date, and certain sections of the original article have been omitted since these have been treated under the respective nations and regions where Methodist missions were carried on. Also, the section on the present United Methodist Church and its Board of Missions organization has been added to the original article, as The United Methodist Church under that name was not in being when the article for the Encyclopedia of Modern Christian Missions was written.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, 1784-1845

One year after the Church organized at the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE, or in 1785, it set apart FREEBORN GARRETTSON and JAMES O. CROMWELL to go to Nova Scotia. It also appointed a missionary to ANTIGUA, though he died before leaving for that field. It commenced missionary activity in CANADA in 1790 through WILLIAM LOSEE. The Nova Scotia mission ended about the turn of the century and the Canada missions divided formally from connection with the M.E. Church in 1832, the constituencies of these two regions becoming affiliated with British Methodism.

The Missionary Society of the M.E. Church was organized in New York on April 5, 1819, and became an official agency of the Church by General Conference action in 1820. Its first full-time executive was NATHAN BANGS, drafter of the Society's constitution, who was elected in 1836. The original purpose of the organization was "to enable the several annual conferences more effectually to extend their missionary labors throughout the United States and elsewhere."

The first mission under the aegis of the Missionary Society was founded in LIBERIA by MELVILLE B. COX in 1833.

Soon afterwards, representatives of the Society established English-speaking missions in South America: FOUNTAIN E. PITTS in ARGENTINA in 1835, JUSTIN SPAULDING in BRAZIL in 1839. The Brazil and URUGUAY missions were suspended in 1842.

MARTIN RUTER and two assistants established a mission in the independent Republic of TEXAS in 1837, following sporadic forays by Methodist preachers into the territory while it was still under Spanish and Mexican jurisdiction.

Two splits in the Church reduced the Missionary Society's supporting constituency. A reform group protesting against the exclusively clerical and episcopal control of the denomination finally withdrew, and in 1830, after two years' organizing activity, formally established the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH. The other and much more deep-seated division came as a result of controversies centered in the slavery question and following the PLAN OF SEPARATION in 1844, resulted in the establishment of the M.E. CHURCH, SOUTH in 1845-46. The three Methodist denominations remained in separation until they were merged in 1939 after many years of negotiation. We give now the development of organized missionary activity in each of these three Churches.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH (SEPARATED), 1845-1939

The Northern section of the newly divided church retained the name and status of the M.E. Church. The Missionary Society remained its official missionary agency until 1907. The chief cooperating organizations were the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY, founded in 1869; the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY, founded in 1880; and the CHURCH EXTENSION SOCIETY, which was established in 1865 and superseded by the Board of Church Extension in 1872. During most of this period, the Missionary Society administered its work through a Board of Managers and its Corresponding Secretaries, subject to the General Missionary Committee, which met annually to make appropriations and to establish policy.

In 1907, the Missionary Society, which had promoted both foreign and domestic missions, was replaced in a reorganization of the Church's benevolence agencies. A new Board of Foreign Missions undertook the administration of foreign missions, and a consolidated Board of Home Missions and Church Extension assumed direction of domestic missions. The Board of Foreign Missions maintained headquarters in NEW YORK CITY, as had the Missionary Society.

Among the more notable Corresponding Secretaries of the Society and the Board were JOHN P. DURBIN (1850-72), JOHN M. REID (1872-88), ADNA B. LEONARD (1888-1912), HENRY K. CARROLL (1900-08), FRANK MASON NORTH (1912-24), S. EARL TAYLOR (1912-20), and RALPH E. DIFFENDORFER (1924-39; 1939-49, Executive Secretary, Division of World Missions, The Methodist Church).

From $95,000 in 1845, the receipts for foreign missions slowly increased to $1,320,000 in 1907, and $2,216,000 in 1918. In 1919, a hundred years after the founding of the Missionary Society, the Board, cooperating with other Methodist agencies, conducted an intensive financial drive known as the Centenary campaign. (See CENTENARY FUND.) Its immediate aim was a radical increase of giving for a period of five years. Pursuing the central purpose of the Centenary Movement, and relying on pledges made, the Board planned major extensions and developments in foreign work based on estimated total yearly receipts of $10 million. However, payments fell far short of pledges; total receipts were forty-six percent below the expected income. Corresponding retrenchments had to be made in the planned world program; results on the field were calamitous; the Board's affairs were in severe crisis. Nevertheless, total receipts for the Centenary period (1919-23) average about $5,500,000 a year, compared with about $2 million from 1914 to 1918.

By 1928, the year before the economic depression began, receipts had dropped, however, to about $2,975,000; and by 1939, they were down to about $1,417,000, yielding planned appropriations for the field that were lower than those made in 1918.

Until 1920, the Board of Foreign Missions conducted the regular financing of its operations independently of other denominational agencies. In that year, the Board came under limited jurisdiction of a commission authorized to correlate promotional appeals, unify budgeting, and maintain a central appropriations treasury for all benevolence boards. Foreign missions thus became a part of what was known, from 1924, as the denomination's WORLD SERVICE program.

After the Separation of 1845, the M.E. Church entered foreign mission fields on five continents.

In Asia, the first mission was established in CHINA by JUDSON D. COLLINS and MOSES C. WHITE, who arrived there in 1847. A China missionary, ROBERT S. MACLAY, was influential in founding a mission in JAPAN in 1873, becoming its first superintendent. MacLAY also became the first superintendent of the KOREA mission, which was organized in 1885, with HENRY C. APPENZELLER and WILLIAM B. SCRANTON as the Society's missionaries, and with SCRANTON's mother, MARY F. SCRANTON, serving as a W.F.M.S. worker. Work was started in OKINAWA in 1892 as part of the Japan mission, and continued into the period of World War II.

By expansion from the INDIA mission, which was founded in 1856 by WILLIAM BUTLER, another group of Asian missions was developed. The first entry into Indian territory, later to become part of PAKISTAN, was accomplished by the founding of a mission in Karachi in 1873. JAMES M. THOBURN, superintendent of the Calcutta District, organized a mission in Rangoon, BURMA, in 1879, and another in SINGAPORE in 1885, with WILLIAM F. OLDHAM, a native of India, as the leader of the latter enterprise. The mission centered in Singapore (the Malaysia Mission) reached out, in turn, into the (then) Federation of MALAYA by establishing work in Penang in 1891. In the same year, it projected a brief, abortive mission into British North Borneo. Thoburn, by virtue of his jurisdiction over the Malaysia Mission Conference, inaugurated a mission in the PHILIPPINE ISLANDS in 1899. Bishop FRANK W. WARNE, in 1901, organized a group of Chinese immigrants to SARAWAK into a circuit of the Singapore District.

INDONESIA (then the Netherlands East Indies) also was entered by workers from the Malaysia jurisdiction—Sumatra (1905) by Solomon Pakianathan; Java (1905) by John R. Denyes; W. Borneo (1906) by Charles M. Worthington; Bangka (1911) by Mark Freeman. In 1928, the Board of Foreign Missions concentrated the work in this area in Sumatra, withdrawing from Java and W. Borneo, and shortly afterwards cutting its ties with Bangka.

The Missionary Society opened evangelistic work in Europe in 1849, when LUDWIG S. JACOBY arrived in GERMANY from the United States as a result of a missionary impulse arising among German immigrants converted to Methodism in America. Preachers from Germany extended the work to SWITZERLAND in 1856. The North Germany Conference acquired a small mission in AUSTRIA by transfer from the British Wesleys in 1897. The following year, the pastor in charge in Vienna began Methodist work in HUNGARY. Most of it was in the southern area, Backa, which became a part of YUGOSLAVIA when the new state was established after World War I.

A second European development also grew out of Methodist foreign-language missions in the United States. OLE P. PETERSEN, converted in the BETHEL SHIP mission in New York, returned to Norway as a missionary in 1853. John P. Larsson, a Swedish convert, returned to his homeland and became the Society's first missionary in SWEDEN in 1854. CHRISTIAN B. WILLERUP, superintendent of the new Scandinavian mission, opened work in DENMARK in 1858. In 1881, the Sweden Conference incorporated into its appointments evangelistic work in FINLAND already begun by Methodist emigrants from Sweden. In 1889, a mission was started in RUSSIA under the Finland District of the Sweden Conference.

Methodism reached the BALTIC STATES by extension from European missions. A German pastor from Königsberg, East Prussia, started work in Kaunas, Lithuania, in 1903. The Russian District of the Finland and Russia Mission Conference organized a mission on the island of Oesel, Estonia, in 1910, and in Riga, Latvia, in 1911.

Four other, unrelated missions emerged in Europe—in BULGARIA (1858), ITALY (1873), FRANCE (1907), and SPAIN (1919). In South America, the M.E. Church continued the Argentina mission started before the Separation of 1844. It also reopened in 1868 and 1885 the two suspended pre-Separation missions—Uruguay and Brazil, respectively. (All but a fragment of the Brazil work was transferred to the M.E. Church, South in 1900.) THOMAS B. WOOD, superintendent of the South America mission, established a new enterprise in PARAGUAY in 1886, which continued until 1917. Evangelistic work begun in Callao, PERU, by FRANCIS C. PENZOTTI, a Methodist employee of the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY, became a Methodist mission in 1890. In the same year, the Church acquired a CHILE mission when the CINCINNATI ANNUAL CONFERENCE adopted as its Chile District an unofficial Chile mission enterprise begun in 1878 by WILLIAM TAYLOR, the free-lance Methodist founder of independent, "self-supporting" missions in South America, India, and Africa. For a dozen years, beginning in 1898, there was a mission in ECUADOR. From 1900, it was composed chiefly of teachers supplied by the Board and supported by the government of Ecuador. Karl C. Beutelspacher opened a mission in BOLIVIA in 1901.

Elsewhere in Latin America, William Butler, founder of the India work, became the first appointee to a mission in MEXICO founded in 1873 under the direction of Bishop GILBERT HAVEN. Bishop THOMAS B. NEELY, resident in BUENOS AIRES, organized a mission in PANAMA in 1905. GEORGE A. MILLER, superintendent in Panama, extended the work to COSTA RICA in 1917.

In Africa, the pre-Separation mission in Liberia remained in operation under the Northern church. In 1896, the Missionary Society granted official status to three independent missions established earlier by William Taylor, MISSIONARY BISHOP for Africa—ANGOLA (1885), CONGO (1886), and MOZAMBIQUE (1893). Methodism penetrated Southern RHODESIA in 1898. In the same year, Bishop JOSEPH C. HARTZELL, Taylor's successor as Missionary Bishop for Africa, received by transfer an independent mission on the island of Madeira, which was administered with Africa work until Madeira was given up in the 1940's. A missionary also served in the Cape Verde Islands for part of 1901. North Africa was entered in 1908, when missions were started in ALGERIA and TUNISIA. The Mozambique mission extended its evangelistic ministry into the Union of SOUTH AFRICA in 1919, following up the mine workers imported from Mozambique.

Several outposts classified as domestic missions were developed outside the United States. Work in HAWAII was conducted from 1855-62 in association with the CALIFORNIA ANNUAL CONFERENCE, and was reopened in 1888 among emigrants from Japan to Hawaii. Evangelistic effort in ALASKA began in 1897. CHARLES W. DREES established a mission in PUERTO RICO in 1900, and Methodist work began in the DOMINICAN REPUBLIC in 1921 in a united effort with the mission boards of the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) and of the United Brethren.

Integration of the foreign fields and their converts and members into the ecclesiastical structure of the Church based in the United States early became the practice—and before long, the fundamental policy—of the M.E. Church. Beginning with Liberia (1836), Germany (1856), and India (1864), Mission Conferences and Annual Conferences were gradually established by GENERAL CONFERENCE legislation, until by 1900 there were seven Mission Conferences, sixteen full-fledged Annual Conferences, and four affiliated formal Missions in Europe, Asia, Africa, and Latin America. By that time, the denomination was well on the way to making itself a world church.

The General Conference of 1884 provided for the organization on foreign fields of what were called "CENTRAL CONFERENCES" composed of Annual Conferences, and of Missions on certain larger fields, to which should be given autonomy in supervising educational, publishing, and other regional connectional interests. Six such Central Conferences were organized: Southern Asia, 1885; Eastern Asia, 1897; Southeastern Asia, 1923; South Africa, 1921; Latin America, 1924; Germany, 1936.

The first two Central Conferences (India and China were the two permanent core countries) became significant administrative units; and according to some commentators, their existence provided sufficient autonomy on the field to avert Methodist participation in church union projects insofar as those movements were motivated by the desire for national autonomy in church life. The legislation providing for Central Conferences was originated not to meet demands for indigenization of the Church on the foreign field, but to provide relevant and effective supervision. When demands for indigenization emerged, however (as in India in the 1920's), the Central Conference apparatus afforded practical expression to the movement towards those goals.

In addition to its pattern of Annual Conferences, the Church extended to the foreign fields its system of episcopal supervision. The practice of visitation by regular bishops (General Superintendents) began in 1853, when Bishop LEVI SCOTT visited Liberia. In 1858, FRANCIS BURNS, a member of the Liberia Conference, was consecrated in the United States as a bishop for Liberia, after his election by his Conference. JOHN W. ROBERTS (like Burns, an American Negro) was similarly elected and consecrated, in 1866.

In 1884, the General Conference began electing a series of Missionary Bishops with jurisdiction limited to specific fields, almost all of them having served previously as missionaries. To Liberia were assigned ISAIAH B. SCOTT (1904-16) and ALEXANDER P. CAMPHOR (1916-19), both born in Negro slavery in the U.S.; to Africa (general), William Taylor (1884-96), Joseph C. Hartzell (1896-1916), and EBEN S. JOHNSON (1916-20); to India and Malaysia, James M. Thoburn (1888-1908), Frank W. WARNE (1900-20), EDWIN W. PARKER (1900-01), JOHN E. ROBINSON (1904-20), William F. Oldham (1904-12, resident in Singapore), JOHN W. ROBINSON (1912-20), and WILLIAM P. EVELAND (1912-16, resident in MANILA); and to Japan (1904-08) and Korea (1908-12), MERRIMAN C. HARRIS.

Between 1900 and 1920, supervision by visiting bishops and by Missionary Bishops was supplemented—in China, Europe, and Latin America—by the assignment of Bishops of the category of General Superintendent to residence in foreign fields. Most notable among them was JAMES W. BASHFORD, stationed in China from 1904 to 1919. In 1920, the missionary episcopacy was abolished in favor of supervision by General Superintendents in foreign residence. This policy, which removed a point of distinction between the Church abroad and the Church in the United States, was later modified when the General Conference elected EDWIN F. LEE Missionary Bishop for Southeast Asia in 1928, and JOHN M. SPRINGER for Africa in 1936.

In 1929 occurred an important broadening of the base of the episcopacy and of the power of Central Conferences, when by Constitutional amendment it became possible for Central Conferences to elect Bishops for their own jurisdictions. The Eastern Asia Central Conference elected (1930) John Gowdy, a Board missionary born in Scotland, and CHIH PING WANG; Southern Asia elected (1930), JASHWANT R. CHITAMBAR; Latin America elected (1932), JUAN E. GATTINONI, an Argentinian born in Italy; Germany elected (1936), F. H. OTTO MELLE.

Three mission constituencies withdrew from the M.E. Church to become components in autonomous Methodist churches. In 1907, the two Conferences in Japan (5,000 members) joined with the Japan missions of the M.E. Church, South and of the Canadian Methodist Church in founding the Japan Methodist Church. In 1930, the Mexico Conference (5,000 members) merged with the mission of the M.E. Church, South to found the Methodist Church of Mexico. In the same year, the Korea Conference (11,000 members) united with the Southern Methodist mission to establish the Korean Methodist Church. The Board of the home church, however, continued sending funds and personnel to the now independent churches.

By 1939, there were fifty-one foreign Annual or Mission Conferences, with 352,000 full members of the Church.

The four numerically strongest fields had half the Conferences and seventy-two percent of the members—India, with ten Conferences and 101,000 members; China, with eight Conferences and 63,000 members; the Philippine Islands, with two Conferences and 53,000 members; Germany, with five Conferences and 36,000 members. (At this time, the membership of the Church in the United States was 4,443,000.) The Board had 571 foreign missionaries; and the W.F.M.S., making field expenditures of more than $900,000, had 475 missionaries.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH 1845-1939

THE LOUISVILLE CONVENTION OF 1845, composed of representatives of the Conferences about to establish the Southern church, designated the Missionary Society of the M.E. Church in the City of Louisville as the provisional central missionary agency for the emerging denomination. The first GENERAL CONFERENCE, in 1846, established the Missionary Society of the M.E. Church, South to facilitate "missionary labors at home and in foreign countries."

The Society maintained headquarters in LOUISVILLE until 1856, and from then on, permanently and almost continuously in NASHVILLE. In 1866, the Church divided its missionary operations between a Board of Domestic Missions and a Board of Foreign Missions. But in 1870, the entire work was reunified, under a general Board of Missions, with combined financing of foreign and domestic projects. The General Conference of 1874 again revised the missions system, assigning basic responsibility for domestic missions to the Annual Conferences, and assigning the operation of all other missions to the General Board. The effect of this change was to make foreign, bilingual, and frontier missions a connexional interest under the Board, and to leave the support of underdeveloped areas within the established Conferences to the efforts of the Conferences themselves.

The first connexional auxiliary of the Board was the Woman's Missionary Society, founded in 1878 to unite the women of the Church "in the work of sending the gospel to women in heathen lands" through women workers, and renamed the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society in 1894. The Board of Church Extension was established in 1882. In 1886, it organized a Woman's Department, which in 1890 began home missionary work as the Woman's Parsonage and Home Missionary Society. This society, renamed the Woman's Home Mission Society, became independent of the Board of Church Extension in 1898.

The General Conference of 1910 effected a major reorganization of the Church's missions apparatus. Separate departments for foreign and for home missions were established in the general Board of Missions. The connexional Woman's Foreign Missionary Society and Woman's Home Mission Society were merged, becoming the Woman's Missionary Council, whose administrators and work (for women and children) were integrated into the structure of the Board. The Council reached its auxiliary home and foreign societies through its own Home and Foreign Departments. The first President of the Woman's Council (1910-22) was BELLE H. BENNETT, who earlier (1898-1910) had been President of the Woman's Home Mission Society.

In 1914, promotion of evangelism throughout the denomination was added to the major functions of the Board.

The executive leadership of the earlier Missionary Society and of the Board of Missions was concentrated perennially in the Secretary (from 1910, the General Secretary). Among the most notable incumbents were Edmund W. Sehon (1850-68), JOHN B. MCFERRIN (1870-78; also Secretary of the Board of Domestic Missions, 1866-70), ALPHEUS W. WILSON (1878-82), Isaac G. John (1886-94), WALTER R. LAMBUTH (1894-1910), and WILLIAM W. PINSON (1910-22). (Considering his long ministry as a missionary, a Board secretary, and a bishop in charge of foreign fields, successively, Lambuth was the outstanding missionary leader of the Southern church.) In 1922, the Board was reorganized according to a pattern that dispersed executive responsibility among eight Administrative Secretaries, the office of General Secretary being abolished. The General Secretaryship was restored in 1926, and WILLARD C. CRAM, who had been a missionary in Korea, served in that office from 1926 to 1939.

The Southern church retained no foreign mission from the pre-Separation period, but carried over a large proportion of the domestic missions, including all of the Negro work and most of the American Indian work. The new denomination's missionary resources were devoted chiefly to domestic fields until late in the 1870's.

From that time on, current contributions to the Board for foreign work gradually rose to $721,000 in 1918 (not including Woman's Council income). Cooperating with the Northern church in the CENTENARY Movement of 1919-23, the Board radically increased its income during the five-year period. New foreign fields were entered, and appropriations were sharply increased. But less than fifty percent was paid on the total Centenary pledges by the end of the fifth fiscal year. At the close of 1925, the total operations of the Board showed a deficit of more than a million dollars. Regular contributions for foreign missions in that year were more than a third lower than in 1918, and were approximately the same in 1939.

The Board's first foreign venture was a mission to China established by CHARLES TAYLOR and BENJAMIN JENKINS in 1848.

Three missions were established in Latin America. Bishop JOHN C. KEENER organized one in Mexico in 1873. The Board of Missions began a second, in Brazil, by recognizing as a missionary (in 1875) JUNIUS E. NEWMAN, who was already resident there, and by sending from the United States JOHN J. RANSOM, who arrived in 1876. Missionary work in CUBA, begun in 1883, grew out of the interest of the FLORIDA CONFERENCE in domestic missions for Cuban immigrants, and developed for fifteen years in close association with that Conference, receiving a fresh stimulus in 1899, after being brought under the administration of the Board, following the Spanish-American War and liberation of Cuba.

The first missionaries to Japan—JAMES W. LAMBUTH, WALTER R. LAMBUTH, and O. A. DUKES—began their work in 1886. Ten years later, CLARENCE F. REID, a China missionary, became the first Southern Methodist missionary to Korea. Chiefly to reach emigrants across the northern borders of Korea, a Siberia Korean mission was begun in 1920. It developed work in Manchuria and in Siberian Russia. A decade later, the work in Russian territory was given up because of difficulties under the Soviet regime. The Manchurian work was transferred in 1930 to the Korean Methodist Church.

Bishop Walter R. Lambuth organized a mission in the Congo in 1914, with Charles C. Bush, D. L. MUMPOWER, and J. A. Stockwell as the first missionaries.

In Europe, permanent missions emerged from relief and social service work begun in BELGIUM, CZECHOSLOVAKIA, and POLAND in 1920.

Some of the foreign fields, beginning with Mexico in 1885, were organized into regular Annual Conferences of the Southern church. Bishops from the United States made supervisory visits abroad from time to time. During part of the quadrennium beginning in 1922, four bishops were in residence abroad—in BRUSSELS, Shanghai, SÃO PAULO (Brazil), and SEOUL. In 1926, bishops were assigned to Brussels and Shanghai only; and in 1930, such assignments were discontinued. From 1934 to 1939, foreign administration was handled mostly by a single bishop, ARTHUR J. MOORE. In 1906, the General Conference formalized the status of less advanced fields by constituting them Missions, with limited supervisory functions and (after 1910) limited General Conference representation.

In the quadrennium prior to 1930, three supervisory Central Conferences were organized—in Mexico, Europe, and Brazil. This was a minor development compared with the emergence of the Central Conferences in the Northern church.

The Japan Conference became a component of the autonomous Japan Methodist Church in 1907. The Board of Missions continued work in Japan both through the new denomination and through Board-controlled supplementary activity. In 1918, the latter work was designated the Japan Mission. In 1930, the Mexico Conference (3,700 members) and the Korea Conference (7,600 members) entered, respectively, the Methodist Church of Mexico and the Korean Methodist Church, both of them autonomous. In the same year, the three Brazil Conferences (15,000 members) became the autonomous Methodist Church of Brazil. The Board continued sending funds and personnel to the three churches founded in 1930.

By 1939, the Belgian, China, Cuba, and Czechoslovakia Conferences and the Congo and Polish Missions had a total of 29,000 church members, nearly half of them in China. (The membership of the Church in the United States was 2,953,000.) The Board was maintaining, through its general program, 111 foreign missionaries (including those associated with autonomous Methodist churches). The Section of Woman's Work, operating under appropriations of over $400,000, had 169 foreign missionaries.

METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH 1828-1939

The first GENERAL CONFERENCE (1834) founded a Board of Foreign Missions, with headquarters in BALTIMORE, later (1850) in PITTSBURGH. For nearly fifty years, despite its name, the Board concentrated almost entirely upon domestic missions.

The Pittsburgh board was continued from 1858 to 1877 by a group of Conferences in the North and West which withdrew after failing to persuade the M.P. Church to ban slaveholding by its members and to remove the Constitutional provision restricting church suffrage to whites. The seceded group merged in 1866 with certain Wesleyan and other non-episcopal Methodists, to form The Methodist Church. The Methodist Church and the South and East Conferences of the original M.P. Church united as the Methodist Protestant Church in 1877, the newly united Church establishing a Board of Missions as successor to the Pittsburgh board (removed at times to Springfield, Ohio; most recently in 1875).

The WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the church was organized in Pittsburgh in 1879, and was recognized by the General Conference in 1880 as a permanent agency of the denomination. It worked autonomously, but in cooperation with the Board of Missions.

In 1888, the work of domestic missions was assigned to a new Board of Home Missions, the earlier board being renamed the Board of Foreign Missions. The WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY (later sometimes called the Woman's Board of Home Missions) was organized in Bridgeton, N. J., in 1893, and was recognized by the General Conference in 1896.

The Board of Foreign Missions and the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society were merged in 1924 as the Union Board of Foreign Missionary Administration, with headquarters in Pittsburgh. In 1928, the Union Board, the Board of Home Missions, and the Woman's Home Missionary Society were merged in a Board of Missions.

Among the Executive Secretaries for foreign missions were FRANK T. TAGG (1884-92), T. J. Ogburn (1896-1908), FREDERICK C. KLEIN (1908-26), and GEORGE W. HADDAWAY (1928-1939).

The denomination began its official foreign mission work in 1880 in Japan, when Harriet G. Brittain opened a school for girls in Yokohama. After some years of informal work in China, the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society undertook a regular mission in Kalgan, North China, with the cooperation of the American Board (Congregational). Charles S. Heininger, the first missionary, reached his post in 1910. The Kalgan project came under the control of the Board of Foreign Missions in June, 1919. Two years earlier the Board had taken over an independent mission in Dhulia, India, developed by Florence Williams and Mattie Long, who went to India in 1903.

The M.P. Church erected two of its foreign missions into Mission Annual Conferences—Japan (1892), China (1919)—with representation in the General Conference, and with administration assigned to the Foreign Board.

In 1939, the M.P. Church, which numbered about 197,000 members in the United States, had 6,000 members on its three foreign fields. It maintained fourteen foreign missionaries.

THE METHODIST CHURCH 1939-1968

The missionary interests (both home and foreign, both general and women's) of the three uniting denominations were merged into a single agency organized in July 1939, as the Board of Missions and Church Extension of The Methodist Church. The name was changed by order of the General Conference of 1952 to the Board of Missions of The Methodist Church.

The Constitution of the Board was grounded in a Disciplinary statement of the aim of missions—

The supreme aim of missions is to make the Lord Jesus Christ known to all peoples in all lands as their divine Saviour, to persuade them to become his disciples, and to gather these disciples into Christian churches; to enlist them in the building of the Kingdom of God; to cooperate with these churches; to promote world Christian fellowship; and to bring to bear on all human life the spirit and principles of Christ.

The Constitutional functions of the Board included the following—

(1) to help persons come to a knowledge of Jesus Christ as Savior and Lord of individuals and society; (2) to seek, as an agency of the Christian Church, to respond to God's action in Christ through engaging in religious, educational, social, medical, and agricultural work, in every part of the world, and to promote and support all phases of missionary and church extension activity in the United States and in other countries; (3) to aid persons to live and act as Christians in personal life and in the social order of all lands and among all peoples; (4) to foster, strengthen, and promote missionary understanding, interest, and zeal throughout The Methodist Church. . . . (Daily Christian Advocate (1960), 191).

The Board's administrative authority resided in the Board of Managers—a large body (nearly 150 persons) of bishops, ministers, and laymen which met annually, and whose interim powers were delegated to a General Executive Committee. The Board's chief officers were a president, General Secretary, and a treasurer.

The major activities of the Board were conducted through three divisions—the World Division, the National Division, the Woman's Division—and through a Joint Commission on Education and Cultivation. These groups were raised from among the Board members, were formally organized, and were under the executive leadership of their respective Associate General Secretaries.

Each Annual Conference maintained a Board of Missions auxiliary to the General Board, and each local church had a Commission on Missions auxiliary to the General and the Annual Conference boards. Auxiliaries of the Woman's Division (WOMAN'S SOCIETIES OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE) were organized in the respective Jurisdictions, Annual Conferences, and local churches.

The foreign missions were administered by the World Division. Until reorganization of the Board in 1964, the Department of Work in Foreign Fields of the Woman's Division also administered foreign missions. The basic financing of the work of the World Division was derived from a budgeted share of the Church's apportioned general benevolences (which are administered by the COUNCIL ON WORLD SERVICE AND FINANCE) and from special gifts. The latter, commonly called Advance Specials, account for about fifty-four percent of the Division's current income. The basic income of the Woman's Division was derived from gifts originating in local-church Woman's Society of Christian Service units. The two Divisions conducted their promotional and missionary education activities in cooperation with the National Division through the Joint Commission. Missionary recruitment was conducted by the Board's Joint Committee on Missionary Personnel.

The Board published two general monthly periodicals, which included presentations of the world missions cause—World Outlook (Joint Commission) and The Methodist Woman (Woman's Division).

Since 1940, the METHODIST COMMITTEE FOR OVERSEAS RELIEF (MCOB), an agency including members representing the Board, supplemented the Board's continuing foreign program by relief, rehabilitation, and refugee resettlement activities. Within the span of years since it came into being it resettled 15,000 refugees in the U.S., and distributed more than $24 million in aid abroad.

The World Division and the National Division were represented on the Church's Crusade Scholarship Committee, which provided financial assistance to train (in the U.S. and elsewhere) future leaders of churches in mission fields. After World War II, and up to 1964, 1,400 students from sixty countries were beneficiaries of the program. The basic financing was provided by the annual One Great Hour of Sharing offering.

For mission work in the several countries references must be had to the general articles under these countries. It will be understood that changes are rapidly taking place, not only due to the reorganization of The Methodist Church when it became The United Methodist Church, but epochal moves into autonomy which have taken place in various nations and are yet taking place.

The work in Europe, Asia, Africa, and Latin America will be found listed under the various nations. Cuba, Brazil, and Mexico have now autonomous Churches, and in Puerto Rico and the Dominican Republic the National Division of Missions administers work. This is likewise true of Alaska and Hawaii. Africa and the various mission fields of Africa are treated under such centers as Algeria and Tunisia, Liberia, the Congo, and certain of the new nations which have arisen within recent years. The Africa Central Conference has two bishops, resident in Salisbury and in Lubumbashi (former Elisabethville), respectively, the latter being a bishop of the Northeastern Jurisdiction.

Field Work. The patterns of field work done by Board missionaries have always been varied. The chief categories were church development, educational, medical, social-economic-industrial, agricultural-rural, literature and communications, and administrative. Some of the missionaries did several kinds of field work; many were specialists. Young people were assigned to some fields for three-year terms prior to commissioning as regular missionaries. Nearly 1,500 missionaries were assigned to overseas service. Under The Methodist Church until 1964, about one-third of them were under the direction of the Woman's Division.

Institutions. The Methodist Church participated in over a score of colleges and universities. Among those of Methodist origin are AOYAMA GAKUIN (Tokyo), EWHA UNIVERSITY (Seoul), Soochow University Law School (Taipei), LUCKNOW CHRISTIAN COLLEGE, and ISABELLA THOBURN COLLEGE (Lucknow), the first Christian college for women in Asia. There were several junior colleges in Asia and South America, COLEGIO WARD (Buenos Aires) and SANTIAGO COLLEGE (Chile) being among those founded by the Methodists. The Church was active in twenty-four interdenominational theological seminaries, and maintained several Methodist seminaries. It supported college-level teachers' colleges and normal schools in India and one each in Japan, Korea, and Pakistan. It participated in interdenomination vocational colleges—ALLAHABAD AGRICULTURAL INSTITUTE, Ludhiana Medical College (India), YONSEI UNIVERSITY Medical College (Seoul), Vellore Christian Medical College, and the nurses' training colleges of the last two institutions.

The Methodist enterprise included a score of schools for Christian workers below seminary level, Deaconess training schools, teacher training schools on the secondary level or below, and about 300 secondary or pre-secondary schools or school districts in twenty-four countries. Almost all of these were solely Methodist in operation.

There were thirty-nine Methodist-sponsored hospitals (a quarter of them interdenominational) located in Africa, Korea, Okinawa, the Philippines, Sarawak, India, Pakistan, Nepal, Bolivia, and Mexico, half of them maintaining nurses' training schools. CLARA SWAIN Hospital (Meth.), Bareilly, India, founded in 1870, was the first hospital in Asia for women and children. There were also clinics, dispensaries, and medical centers, and colonies for leprosy patients (two-thirds were non-denominational).

Methodist institutional work overseas also included urban social centers, rural center projects, and a dozen printing and publishing enterprises. Their publications included periodicals in more than a dozen languages.

Cooperative Activity. The Methodist missionary movement participated extensively, both at home and on the foreign field, in many types of interdenominational activity and cooperation, and in the major phases of interchurch endeavor out of which the ecumenical movement has grown and continues to express itself. The Methodist Church was a charter member of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES of Christ in America, and of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES; its missionary agencies cooperated with the relevant agencies of these councils. The United Methodist Church continues this cooperation.

THE UNITED METHODIST CHURCH 1968-

In 1968 when The United Methodist Church was organized and took over the work of the former Methodist and EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCHES, an enlarged new organization was called for. This follows rather generally—and in the main rather closely—the organization of the Board of Missions of The Methodist Church as it has been delineated above. As the correlation of work in the various mission fields is still proceeding, the Book of Discipline must be referred to for all organizational changes and for future ones as these may be called for. The mission work is organized under the name of the Board of Missions of The United Methodist Church, and its headquarters remain in New York, and represent an enlargement of the Board's offices there as these were carried on for The Methodist Church.

The name of the Woman's Division has been changed to Women's Division and the Methodist Committee for Overseas Relief to the United Methodist Committee for Overseas Relief. The entire organization of this Board, as well as of other boards of the Church, is presently under study and structural changes may be anticipated in the next and future General Conferences. The correlation of the mission work of the E.U.B. Church and that of The Methodist Church is now proceeding, and that is causing administrative changes especially in the mission fields overseas from the United States. The autonomous Methodist churches which are organizing in various lands also have great bearing upon missionary activity, though in almost all instances a close tie is kept between the autonomous Methodist churches of these lands and the respective boards of missions which formerly sponsored and supported them.

MISSISSIPPI, sometimes called the "Magnolia State," is in the south central part of the United States. Its name is derived from the Mississippi River, which means "Father of Waters." The state is bounded by TENNESSEE on the north, ALABAMA on the east, the Gulf of MEXICO and LOUISIANA on the south, and Louisiana on the west. Its area is 47,716 square miles, and in 1970 its population was 2,158,872.

Originally inhabited by three strong Indian tribes, the Natchez in the southwest, the Choctaws in the center and southeast, and the Chickasaws in the north, Mississippi was partly explored in 1540 by de Soto, a Spaniard, and in 1673 by Jacques Marquette and Louis Joliet of France. In 1682 La Salle reached the mouth of the Mississippi River and claimed for France all the territory drained by the river. He called it Louisiana for Louis XIV. In 1699 the French established Biloxi, the first white settlement in Mississippi.

At the end of the Seven Years War in 1763, France ceded to Great Britain its territory east of the Mississippi River with the exception of NEW ORLEANS, which with the vast Louisiana territory of the west went to Spain. Following the Revolutionary War England relinquished her part of that region to the United States. However, Spain took military possession of the land in 1781 and did not withdraw its troops until 1798. The Mississippi Territory of the United States was then organized, and in 1804 it was extended to the state of Tennessee on the north and to the Gulf of Mexico on the south; it was restricted on the east by the creation of the Alabama Territory. In 1817 Mississippi was admitted to the Union as a state, and, after a series of settlements with the Indians culminating in 1832, the entire state was opened to settlers who then poured into the area. On Jan. 9, 1861, Mississippi became the second state to secede from the Union. It suffered great losses during the Civil War. The fall of its important stronghold of VICKSBURG on July 4, 1863 was a disaster for the South and an important victory for the North.

Methodism began in Mississippi in 1799 when TOBIAS GIBSON traveled the hazardous trail from his home in SOUTH CAROLINA to preach to a few settlers in and around Natchez. In the village of Washington, near Natchez, Gibson organized the first Methodist congregation west of GEORGIA and south of Tennessee. In 1813 the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE was organized. At the time it included all of Mississippi below the Indian settlements in the north, a part of western Alabama, and the main portions of Louisiana. ELIZABETH FEMALE ACADEMY, operated under the direction of the Mississippi Methodists at Washington from 1818 until 1847, may have been the first chartered institution exclusively for the higher education of women in America. In 1832 the Alabama portion of the Mississippi Conference, along with Mississippi's eastern tier of counties, was placed in the newly formed ALABAMA CONFERENCE. From 1837 to 1839 all Methodist work in TEXAS came under the direction of the Mississippi Conference. Following the division of the church in 1844, the Mississippi Conference adhered South. In January, 1847 the LOUISIANA CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, South was organized. However, the east portion of Louisiana, except New Orleans and BATON ROUGE, remained in the Mississippi Conference until 1894.

Methodism in northern Mississippi began in 1819 when EBENEZER HEARN was appointed by the TENNESSEE CON-FERENCE to the Buttahatchie Circuit. The exact boundaries of the circuit are not known, but it covered five counties in Alabama and extended into northeast Mississippi. A barrier of Indians in north Mississippi kept the work of the Mississippi Conference from extending farther northward in the early years. Beginning in 1821, however, circuit riders from the Mississippi Conference penetrated the northern part of the state. In 1870 the NORTH MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE (MES) was formed.

After the Civil War the M.E. Church followed the occupation forces into the South, forming churches among Negroes and among some of the whites. In 1865 the Northern church organized the Mississippi Mission Conference, which was made up mostly of Negroes; its territory included Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas. Four years later this body was divided to form the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE which included only the state of Mississippi. The Negro work grew rapidly, and in 1891 the Mississippi Conference itself was divided to form the UPPER MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE. Both conferences were continued in the Central Jurisdiction in 1939.

In 1870, the year the C.M.E. CHURCH was organized, it formed a conference in Mississippi. Today this denomination has two conferences in the state—Mississippi and Upper Mississippi. The A.M.E. CHURCH and the A.M.E. ZION CHURCH have established work in Mississippi. Organized in the north in 1816 and 1820, respectively, these churches moved into the South following the Civil War and vigorously evangelized among the Negroes. Today the A.M.E. Zion Church has two conferences in Mississippi—South Mississippi, and West Tennessee and Mississippi. The A.M.E. Church also has two conferences in the state—North Mississippi and Mississippi.

METHODIST PROTESTANTISM began in Mississippi as early as 1828, and it organized a Mississippi Conference in 1841 with Elisha Lott as president. The Texas Conference was set off from the Mississippi Conference in 1848, and the North Mississippi Conference in 1854. In 1870 the Mississippi Conference voted to unite with the Mississippi Conference (MES), and seven M.P. preachers were received as itinerants in that body. The next year the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE (MP) started over again with one itinerant and four laymen, and thereafter it grew steadily if slowly; within a decade it had about 1,000 members and by the turn of the century about 3,000. The two conferences continued until unification in 1939. Shortly before unification, the North Mississippi Conference reported eleven charges, twenty churches, and 1,340 members. The Mississippi Conference had fifty ministers, twenty-six charges, seventy-two church buildings, and 4,898 members. However, twenty-one preachers and sixteen churches chose not to enter The Methodist Church.

Today the Mississippi and the North Mississippi Conferences of The United Methodist Church divide the state between them. On the abolition of the Central Jurisdiction in 1968, the Mississippi and Upper Mississippi Conferences were placed temporarily in the Jackson Area of the Southeastern Jurisdiction pending merger.

Mississippi Methodism supports three colleges: MILLSAPS at Jackson, WOOD JUNIOR COLLEGE at Mathiston, and RUST at Holly Springs. It also maintains a number of hospitals, homes, camps, and WESLEY FOUNDATIONS. In 1968 the four Mississippi conferences had a total of twenty districts, 671 charges, and approximately 219,618 members. Their church property including parsonages was valued at $81,287,316.

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE was organized at the home of NEWIT VICK, a preacher who was not a conference member at the time, on Nov. 1, 1813. The location was about five miles southwest of Fayette in Jefferson County. It was planned that either Bishop ASBURY or Bishop MCKENDREE would come from the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE, which met on October 3, and preside at the organization of the new conference which was to be composed of the MISSISSIPPI and LOUISIANA preachers, but because of Indian troubles in ALABAMA and Mississippi the brethren in Tennessee practically forbade the bishops to risk the journey. Consequently Samuel Sellers presided at the first session of the Mississippi Conference and WILLIAM WINANS acted as secretary. Ten preachers were present. As it turned out, due to the War of 1812 and danger from the Indians, no bishop attended a session of the Mississippi Conference until Oct. 10, 1816 when it met at the home of William Foster on Pine Ridge seven miles north of Natchez, with Bishop ROBERT R. ROBERTS presiding. During those first three years conference members served as president, substituting for the bishop in every capacity except the ordination of preachers.

When Methodist work began in Mississippi it was a part of the WESTERN CONFERENCE. Beginning in 1806 there was a Mississippi District in the conference, LEARNER BLACKMAN serving as the first presiding elder. In 1812 the Western Conference was divided to form the Tennessee Conference, the latter to include the Mississippi District and several other districts to the north. In creating the Tennessee Conference, the 1812 General Conference authorized the bishops to form another annual conference "down the Mississippi" any time during the next four years "if they find it to be necessary." Such was the authority for the formation of the Mississippi Conference in 1813.

According to the 1816 Discipline, the Mississippi Conference included "all the state of Louisiana south of the Arkansas [River], and all the Mississippi Territory south of the Tennessee River." What is now Alabama was a part of the conference. When formed in 1813 the Mississippi Conference reported seven charges and 1,067 white and 240 colored members. The total membership nearly doubled the next year, but in 1816 the figures were 1,531 white and 410 colored members.

By 1819 the Mississippi Conference had grown to three districts, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Alabama, and it reported 2,170 white and 361 Negro members. In 1832 the Alabama Conference was organized to include Alabama south of the Tennessee River and the eastern tier of counties in Mississippi. In 1837 the Mississippi Conference was enlarged to include TEXAS within its bounds, an arrangement which continued until 1840 when the TEXAS CONFERENCE was formed. When the M. E.

Church was divided in 1844 the Mississippi Conference of course adhered South.

In December, 1845, the districts were rearranged and the appointments made in readiness for the creation of the LOUISIANA CONFERENCE by the 1846 General Conference. Louisiana, east of the Mississippi River, except for the cities of New Orleans and Baton Rouge, remained in the Mississippi Conference until 1894.

In 1853 when the Mississippi Conference was forty years old it had fifty-six charges and 14,258 white and 10,071 colored members. In that year JAMES W. LAMBUTH, father of Bishop WALTER R. LAMBUTH, joined the conference, and volunteered as a missionary for CHINA; he did pioneer work in the Orient for nearly forty years.

The M. E. Church, South began publishing the New Orleans Christian Advocate in 1851. It soon became the official organ of the Mississippi and Louisiana Conferences and continued as such until 1946 when the Mississippi Conference joined the NORTH MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE in publishing the Mississippi Methodist Advocate. Through the years several Mississippi preachers served as editor of the New Orleans paper, among them CHARLES B. GALLOWAY and J. LLOYD DECCELL, who later became bishops.

The Mississippi Conference was interested in education, supporting or patronizing through the years prior to 1870 some sixteen academies and colleges. ELIZABETH FEMALE ACADEMY (1818-1847) at Washington near Natchez, may have been the first school in America chartered exclusively for the higher education of women. In recognition of the academy's priority the Daughters of the American Revolution have placed a marker on its original site. Port Gibson Female Academy began in 1826 and continued until 1929. Sharon and Madison Colleges flourished before the Civil War. CENTENARY COLLEGE, now at SHREVEPORT, La., was started by the Mississippi Conference at Brandon Springs, Miss., in 1841. It was soon moved to Jackson, La., which was within the bounds of the Mississippi Conference until 1894. The two conferences jointly supported Centenary until 1892, when Mississippi Methodism established MILLSAPS COLLEGE. The Mississippi Conference operated Whitworth College for women at Brookhaven from 1859 to 1938 when it was merged with Millsaps.

In 1888 the Mississippi Conference appointed a committee to confer with the North Mississippi Conference on establishing a Methodist college in Mississippi. Four years later the school, named for R. W. MILLSAPS, whose liberal donations helped to launch it, opened at Jackson. Today it is a strong Methodist college. Two of its presidents, both members of the North Mississippi Conference, have been elected bishop, W. B. MURRAH in 1910 and H. ELLIS FINGER, JR. in 1964. Another president, A. F. WATKINS, was secretary of the GENERAL CONFERENCE from 1910 to 1926. The conference has given support to PAINE COLLEGE, Augusta, Ga.

In 1913 at the end of its first century the Mississippi Conference had seven districts, 160 charges, 568 churches, and 55,133 members. At unification in 1939 there were 194 preachers, 161 charges, 521 churches, and 81,470 members. These joined with seventeen preachers, seventy-three churches, and 4,816 members of the Mississippi Conference (MP) to form the Mississippi Conference of The Methodist Church.

Through the years the Mississippi Conference has had a number of able leaders. Prior to the Civil War the two outstanding men in the conference were William Winans (1788-1857) and BENJAMIN M. DRAKE (1800-1860). Drake was a member of every General Conference from 1828 until his death. He worked in the General Conference for higher educational standards for the Methodist ministry. CHARLES B. GALLOWAY, elected bishop at thirty-six, was the premier pulpit orator in American Methodism. J. T. Leggett, presiding elder for twenty-two years, and Bishop J. LLOYD DECELL were outstanding conference leaders in the twentieth century. Bishop NOLAN B. HARMON, though not a member of the conference, was born at Meridian and graduated from Millsaps College.

At the present time the conference supports Millsaps College in JACKSON and WOOD JUNIOR COLLEGE at Mathiston; the Methodist Hospital at Hattiesburg and the proposed Mississippi Methodist Hospital at Jackson; the Methodist Children's Home at Jackson; the SEASHORE METHODIST ASSEMBLY and the Seashore Manor on the Gulf coast; Camp Wesley Pines; and WESLEY FOUNDATIONS at the state schools.

In 1970 the Mississippi Conference had six districts, Brookhaven, Hattiesburg, Jackson, Meridian, Seashore, and Vicksburg. It reported 335 ministers, 302 charges, 105,431 members, and property valued at $44,750,264.

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE (ME, 1868) was created by the 1868 GENERAL CONFERENCE by dividing the MISSISSIPPI MISSION CONFERENCE. The new conference was organized at Canton, Miss., Jan. 7, 1869 with Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON presiding. This conference is not to be confused with the Mississippi Conference which was organized in 1813 and which became the Mississippi Conference of the M. E. Church, South after the division in 1844.

At its organization in 1869, the Mississippi Conference reported two districts—Jackson and Holly Springs—twenty-seven charges, 8,732 members, 2,219 probationers, and sixteen church buildings and five parsonages valued at $32,035. By 1872 there were over 28,000 members including probationers. Thereafter growth was moderate; in 1890 the conference reported 152 charges and a total of 31,603 members. The next year the conference was divided to form the UPPER MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE. The division left the Mississippi Conference with three districts and about 15,000 members.

In 1939 the Mississippi Conference became a part of the Central Jurisdiction of The Methodist Church. At that time it had five districts, 102 charges, and 21,981 members. The conference supports RUST COLLEGE at Holly Springs. In 1967 the appropriation for the college from conference funds was $975.

Gulfside Assembly at Waveland, Miss., is within the bounds of the Mississippi Conference. Gulfside has served as the summer assembly of the Central Jurisdiction. It is a thirty-acre tract on the Gulf of Mexico. The facility has a three-story inn with dormitory accommodations and a cafeteria, a two-story hall, two lodges, five cottages, a snack shop, and an auditorium which will seat 1,000. Also, there is an administration building with offices, class rooms, and a library. All of this property was badly damaged, and some of it destroyed by the great hurricane of the late summer of 1969.

In 1967 the Mississippi Conference reported four districts, 69 ministers, 82 charges, 22,191 members and property valued at $3,357,404. On the abolition of the Central Jurisdiction in 1968, the conference was placed in the Jackson Area of the Southeastern Jurisdiction pending merger.

MISSISSIPPI METHODIST ADVOCATE, THE a sixteen-page weekly newspaper, is an integral part of MISSISSIPPI Methodism. Published in JACKSON, Miss., it is the official organ of the Jackson Area composed of the MISSISSIPPI and NORTH MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCES.

The Advocate is used by the bishop, the cabinets, conference boards and commissions, pastors, laymen, the WOMAN'S SOCIETY and the METHODIST YOUTH FELLOWSHIP for promotion of the work of the church in Mississippi. It gathers news of Methodist activities from all over the world and records the progress, efforts and achievements of churches at home. Through its pages, the aims, purposes, needs and activities of Mississippi Methodist institutions, colleges, hospitals and homes, are constantly kept before the readers. Church school teachers gain help through the lessons prepared by ministers from the area. The paper memorializes the honored dead.

The Mississippi Methodist Advocate, the successor to the New Orleans Christian Advocate, which served Methodism in the South for more than one hundred years, was established in June 1947. C. T. Howell of Birmingham, Ala., was the first editor (1947-1955). The new paper was sixteen pages (44 x 60 picas) and published by Oliver Emmerick of McComb. Later the printing contract was taken over by Tombigbee Printing Company of Jackson. The organ struggled under financial difficulties during its growing years.

In 1955, Samuel E. Ashmore of the North Mississippi Conference was appointed editor. The Advocate office was located in the Science building at MILLSAPS COLLEGE. In 1957 the office moved to the new Methodist Building. Today Thornton Publishers do the printing and mailing of the periodical which is 57 x 81 picas.

MISSISSIPPI MISSION CONFERENCE (ME), composed largely of colored ministers and churches, was organized at NEW ORLEANS, La., Dec. 25, 1865. Its territory included MISSISSIPPI, LOUISIANA, and TEXAS. At the beginning the conference had four districts—New Orleans, Opelousas, Mississippi, and Texas—and there were sixteen preachers, 2,692 members, and five churches valued at $47,000. The next year the Texas work was set off as the Texas Mission Conference, though that group did not meet to organize until January 1867.

The 1868 GENERAL CONFERENCE divided the Mississippi Mission Conference to form the Louisiana and Mississippi Conferences of the M. E. Church. When they met for organization in January 1869, the two conferences together reported a total of more than 23,500 members including probationers, an indication of how rapidly the M. E. Church grew among the Negroes in the South following the Civil War.

MISSOULA, MONTANA, U.S.A. First Church was one of the pioneer churches of the northwest. The first Methodist minister to reach Missoula was George Comfort, who came in 1869; and his successor as superintendent was J. A. Van Anda. But the first regularly appointed pastor was THOMAS C. LUFF, in 1871. He served three years, organized a church for the one or two hundred whites there, and built a church which was dedicated on Sept. 15, 1872. The cost was $2,300; and $500 of that amount was the gift of the pastor, and another $500 was borrowed from the CHURCH EXTENSION SOCIETY. At the time, it was the only Protestant church building between Helena and Walla Walla. Hugh Duncan was the next pastor; he stayed only one year, and the church was then without a pastor for a period, served by supply pastors from time to time; among them FRANCIS RIGGIN and W. W. VAN ORSDEL (Brother Van).

Brother Van reorganized the church on May 22, 1892. Only one of the original members was there, Mrs. W. H. Dickinson. She lived to participate in the semi-centennial celebration in 1921. She was the first school teacher in Missoula county, and her marriage to Mr. Dickinson was the first Protestant marriage ceremony in western MONTANA. One of Missoula's public schools is named for her.

During the 90's, the financial crisis nearly ended the life of the church. A heavy debt finally led the Church Extension Society to vote to sell the property to the Protestant Episcopal Church; but Francis Riggins made the trip to PHILADELPHIA at his own expense and persuaded the Society to abandon this plan, to accept one-half of the amount as full payment, and persuaded the preachers at the Conference session to contribute the balance to pay off the debt.

J. W. Bennet returned to Missoula for a second pastorate in 1910 and pushed through a plan to build a new church. It was built at a cost of $50,000 and dedicated by Thomas C. Luff, forty years after he had built the first church. At the time, it was the most pretentious structure yet erected by Montana Methodists. It was an Akron-plan structure, and served the congregation until 1956. Trinity M. E. Church, South was merged with First M. E. Church in 1939; and at about the same time, the WESLEY FOUNDATION at the University of Montana was organized and has continued to be a major emphasis of the church program.

In 1957, a new sanctuary was built at the same site and using the lots formerly occupied by the parsonage. The cost of the new parsonage, new pipe organ and remodeled building was nearly $400,000. Eight years later the present plant was completed by the erection of an educational wing at the cost of $1,000,000. The present membership of First Church is 1,455; a new church, St. John, has been organized by Missoula Methodists and is serving a growing congregation in the city.

MISSOURI is in the center of seventeen states located in the great MISSISSIPPI Valley. The state takes its name from its largest river which in turn was named for a tribe of Indians that once lived near the river's mouth. The state's area is 69,674 square miles, and in 1970 its population was over 4,630,000.

The first white settlers in Missouri were the French. They established St. Genevieve in 1735 and St. Louis in 1764. Spanish rule began in 1771. In 1800 the region went back to France, and the United States acquired it in the Louisiana Purchase of 1803.

Missouri became a territory in 1812 and, under the Missouri Compromise, it entered the Union as a slave state in 1821. As a border state in the Civil War, about 50,000 of its men were in the Southern armies and some 100,000 in the Northern forces.

Methodism entered Missouri in the late summer of 1798. JOHN CLARK, a Scotsman who came to ILLINOIS via GEORGIA, preached the first Methodist sermon in Missouri near Herculaneum from a boat tied to a rock on the west bank of the Mississippi River. In 1805, following a CAMP MEETING conducted at Spanish Pond, Clark formed a Methodist class, and in January of the following year he organized a second class at Patterson. Clark later joined the Baptists.

In 1805, WILLIAM MCKENDREE, presiding elder in the WESTERN CONFERENCE, sent JOSEPH OGLESBY into Missouri on a reconnaissance tour. On his return Oglesby reported that there were 200 likely prospects for Methodism in the region. Encouraged by Oglesby's report, the Western Conference appointed John Travis to the Missouri Circuit in 1806. After a year of work Travis reported the establishment of two circuits, the Missouri and the Meramec, with 100 white and six colored members.

The first Methodist church in Missouri was organized in 1807 at Coldwater near St. Louis by William McKendree, John Travis, and JESSE WALKER. There were thirty-nine members, most of them coming from the two classes previously formed by John Clark. Methodist classes were organized at Mt. Zion near St. Louis in 1806, CAPE GIRARDEAU and the site of MCKENDREE CHAPEL in 1809, NEW MADRID in 1810, and Fredericktown in 1811. New Madrid and Fredericktown are the two oldest continuing Methodist congregations west of the Mississippi River. By 1811 there were five Methodist circuits in Missouri with 480 white and thirty-two colored members.

Shiloh Church, the first Methodist meetinghouse west of the Mississippi River, was built between 1810 and 1814 in Bellevue Valley some seventy-five miles south of St. Louis. In 1819 McKendree Chapel, made of hewn poplar logs, was erected near Jackson. The original structure still stands, and it is recognized as the oldest Protestant church building west of the Mississippi River. The 1960 GENERAL CONFERENCE designated it as a national Methodist HISTORIC SHRINE.

The MISSOURI CONFERENCE was organized by Bishop McKendree at Shiloh Meetinghouse near Belleville, Ill., in 1816. At the time the conference included Missouri, ARKANSAS, ILLINOIS, and eastern INDIANA.

The early circuit riders bypassed St. Louis for several reasons. For one thing, the Protestant immigrants, the people most receptive to Methodism's evangelistic message, were settling mostly on farms in the rural areas, and there was plenty of work to do among them. Second, the Methodist preachers of that day felt unprepared educationally or otherwise to win converts and establish churches in the cities generally. Third, the prospects in St. Louis were particularly discouraging because many of its citizens were Roman Catholics while many others were godless adventurers given to vice and lawlessness. To assault such a citadel of wickedness seemed inadvisable if not foolish. But avoidance of St. Louis was not to continue indefinitely. In 1811, five years after John Travis had been appointed as the first Methodist itinerant in Missouri, George Colbert preached occasionally in St. Louis, as did Jesse Walker in the years immediately following. Then in 1817 JOHN SCRIPPS made St. Louis a preaching point on the Coldwater Circuit which he was serving. Finally, in 1821 the Missouri Conference, deciding that it was time to make a serious attempt to establish a church in St. Louis, appointed Jesse Walker as conference missionary. The intrepid Walker organized a congregation and erected a building on Fourth Street in 1822, the first Protestant church edifice in the city. The Missouri Conference met in St. Louis that year for the first time in its history. Walker reported ninety-five white and thirty-two colored members. In 1839 the Negroes built their own church in St. Louis, probably the first Negro Methodist church in Missouri.

In 1830 the Missouri Conference organized a missionary society and sent two of its ablest men, Thomas Johnson and his brother William, as missionaries to the Shawnee and the Kansa Indians, thus beginning a successful work among Indians which led to the organization of the INDIAN MISSION CONFERENCE in 1844.

After the division of the M.E. Church in 1844, the Missouri Conference adhered South. For the time being this left the M.E. Church with no organized work in the state. In 1846 the Missouri Conference (MES) was divided, the area south of the Missouri River becoming the ST. LOUIS CONFERENCE. In 1871 the southwest quarter of the state was set off as the West St. Louis Conference, the name being changed to the SOUTHWEST MISSOURI CONFERENCE in 1874. These three conferences were continued intact until Methodist unification in 1939.

In 1848 the M.E. Church re-entered Missouri, forming the MISSOURI CONFERENCE which included Missouri, Arkansas, and territory to the west. In 1852 the name was changed to the Missouri and Arkansas Conference. The next year this body was divided to form an ARKANSAS CONFERENCE and a Missouri Conference, the latter including most of Missouri, and KANSAS and NEBRASKA. In the next few years several changes in names and boundaries of conferences were made. Then in 1869 the work in north Missouri was designated as the Missouri Conference and that in south Missouri and Arkansas as the St. Louis Conference. There was an Arkansas Conference from 1873 to 1920, when it merged with the St. Louis Conference. Then from 1931 to 1939 the Missouri Conference again included all of Missouri and Arkansas. In 1886 the M.E. Church organized the Central Missouri Conference to include its Negro work in the state. In 1928 this conference absorbed a part of the Lincoln Conference (the latter had covered several states) to form the CENTRAL WEST CONFERENCE.

The M.E. Church, South established the St. Louis Christian Advocate in 1851. An influential paper, it continued until 1928. The Central Christian Advocate began as a private enterprise in 1854 and was made an official organ by the M.E. Church GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1856. It continued until Methodist unification.

Other branches of Methodism had work in Missouri. The METHODIST PROTESTANTS came into Missouri as early as 1836, and formed in 1850 the Missouri Conference which continued until unification in 1939. In 1852, however, the M.P. work was divided to form the Platte Conference in the northwest part of the state. In 1867 the Platte Conference was superseded by the North Missouri Conference which in 1916 merged with the Iowa Conference to form the Iowa-Missouri Conference. At the time of unification there were sixty M.P. churches in Missouri with some 4,000 members.

German Methodism began in Missouri in 1841 when the M.E. Church appointed Ludwic S. JACOBY as a missionary among the Germans of St. Louis. In spite of persecutions from the secular Germans of the city, Jacoby organized a congregation of forty and soon had it housed in a small frame church. Opposed to slavery, the Germans adhered North after the division of 1844. Between 1845 and 1850 German work in Missouri developed rapidly. There were about 50,000 Germans in the state, and German circuits were established in communities along the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers. In later years St. Louis became an important center of German Methodism.

These German churches were in the English-speaking conferences until 1864 when the General Conference authorized German language conferences. In 1879 the ST. LOUIS GERMAN CONFERENCE, including east Missouri, south Illinois, and south Iowa, was organized by dividing the Southwest German Conference. In 1925 the St. Louis German Conference merged with the overlying conferences of the M.E. Church.

The A.M.E. CHURCH, the A.M.E. ZION CHURCH, and the C.M.E. CHURCH began work in Missouri in the nineteenth century. In 1840 the A.M.E. Church organized the Indiana Conference which included Missouri and several other states north and south in its boundaries. The conference territory was too vast for effective work, especially since it included both free and slave states, a situation which created problems for free ministers appointed to churches in the South. In 1852, the Missouri Conference was created to include all churches of the denomination in the slave-holding states of the West and South. The work prospered and by 1956 there were three A.M.E. conferences operating in Missouri: Missouri, North Missouri, and Southwest Missouri.

The A.M.E. Zion Church organized the Missouri Conference in 1890. By 1906 it had eleven churches and 1,765 members. Ten years later there were sixteen churches and over 4,000 members. In mid-century the conference had about twenty churches in the state and a vital community program in St. Louis.

The C.M.E. Church, though not as strong as either of the other Negro bodies, is active in Missouri. Parts of two conferences, the Kansas-Missouri and the Southwest Illinois, operate in the state.

In 1835 the first Methodist college in Missouri was established at St. Charles. After a long career of service it closed in 1915. From 1835 to the present about 100 academies, schools, and colleges have been established in Missouri under Methodist auspices. Only about ten could be called colleges. Many were short lived. CENTRAL METHODIST COLLEGE in Fayette, founded in 1855 by the M.E. Church, South, is the only Methodist college in the state today. The institution has about 1,000 students, an endowment of more than $4,250,000 and buildings worth over $7,000,000.

At unification in 1939, the five conferences in Missouri were reduced to three which conformed to the boundaries of the three conferences of the former Southern church. In 1960 these were consolidated into the MISSOURI EAST and MISSOURI WEST CONFERENCES.

Following the division in 1844 and until long after the Civil War, ill feeling between the two branches of Episcopal Methodism was perhaps more intense in Missouri than in any other state. This was due in part to the fact that Missouri was a border state. It is not too much to say that during the war, civil, social and religious life fell apart. Churches were closed, some preachers were imprisoned, and some were exiled. Methodists on both sides suffered indignities of various kinds. When the war was over immigration brought in many people from north and east who enabled the M.E. Church to grow rapidly. As a result the two branches of Methodism built altar against altar in many parts of the state.

After the report of the CAPE MAY COMMISSION in 1876, however, prayer and tentative efforts on behalf of Methodist unity began in Missouri. The annual conferences exchanged fraternal messengers; competing churches united in revivals and other activities; and after 1905 conference committees "exchanged churches," a procedure which resulted, in many places, in only one Methodist church where formerly there had been two in competition. From 1890 on the annual conferences of both churches in Missouri urged their General Conferences to prepare plans for unification, and as the years passed they overwhelmingly approved each proposal which was presented. The final plan which actually brought unification was approved almost unanimously in Missouri. When actual unification was effected, the northern and southern branches of Methodism in Missouri were more evenly divided—three Southern Methodists to two Northern ones—than in any other state. Yet it is claimed that nowhere else in American Methodism was unification more smoothly arranged, nor as the years passed was it more successful than in Missouri.

In 1970 the two Missouri conferences supported a children's home in St. Louis, a home for the aged in Marionville, four hospitals, four youth camps, and WESLEY FOUNDATIONS at the nine state schools. Between them the conferences had 664 charges, 805 ministers, 252,443 members, and church property valued at $115,340,770.

MISSOURI CONFERENCE was organized at Shiloh Church near Belleville, Ill., on Sept. 13, 1816 with Bishop WILLIAM MCKENDREE presiding. Its territory included western INDIANA, ILLINOIS, MISSOURI, and ARKANSAS, an area so large that it now contains more than a dozen conferences. The first session of the conference in Missouri was held at MCKENDREE CHAPEL near Jackson in September 1819. The importance of McKendree Chapel in the early years is indicated by the fact that the conference met there three more times—1821, 1826, and 1831. In 1817 the conference reported 3,100 white and seventy-three colored members. (See Missouri for beginnings of Methodism in the state.) In 1824 the conference was divided to form the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE, and in 1836 the Arkansas Conference was set off from Missouri.

The first missionary endeavor of the Missouri Conference was in 1830 when it sent Thomas Johnson and his brother William as missionaries to the Shawnee and the Kansa Indians. In 1835 the conference established St. Charles College which continued until 1915.

In 1845 the Missouri Conference reported 23,781 white and 2,529 colored members. The church having divided, the conference voted overwhelmingly that year to adhere

South. Since there was some northern sentiment in the conference, the M.E. Church soon organized a conference in the state which continued until unification in 1939. (See MISSOURI CONFERENCE [1848-1939].)

In 1846 the Missouri Conference (MES) divided to form the ST. LOUIS CONFERENCE which included the part of the state below the Missouri River. This left the Missouri Conference with 9,704 white and 1,025 colored members. By 1860 the membership had more than doubled—17,717 white and 2,006 colored members. The Civil War brought disaster; in 1866 the conference had only 11,551 white and 346 colored members. However, recovery was rapid; in 1869 the conference reported more than 19,000 members.

In 1900 the Missouri Conference had 170 charges, 498 churches, and 44,431 members. In the next thirty-nine years the membership grew a little, but since its territory was largely rural with a decreasing farm population, the number of charges and churches declined. The conference came to unification in 1939 with 136 charges, 340 churches, and 49,421 members.

The Missouri Conference owned or was affiliated with eight educational institutions in 1900, including St. Charles College, CENTRAL COLLEGE and Howard-Payne College at Fayette, and Central College for Women at Lexington. By 1920 the number of schools had dropped to three, and by 1930 to one—Central College which, though within the bounds of the Missouri Conference, was supported by all of Southern Methodism in Missouri.

One member of the Missouri Conference, EUGENE R. HENDRIX, was elected bishop in 1886 while serving as president of Central College. Two other men who attained the episcopacy, ENOCH M. MARVIN and WILLIAM F. McMURRY, began their ministry in the Missouri Conference but were not members of it at the time of their election.

After unification in 1939, there was sentiment in Missouri Methodism for consolidating the three conferences into two or possibly into one. Over the years several inter-conference commissions drafted plans which proved unacceptable to one or more of the conferences. Merging into two conferences seemed logical, but there was no agreement on how to divide the state. As the "mother conference," the Missouri body was reluctant to agree to any realignment that would bisect its territory or do away with its name. But in the end, that conference, concluding that the other two would agree on no other plan, concurred, and by authority of the 1960 South Central JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE, the three conferences were consolidated into the MISSOURI EAST and MISSOURI WEST CONFERENCES, effective in 1961.

At its last session in 1961, the Missouri Conference reported six districts, 212 charges, 77,676 members, and property valued at $32,416,418.

MISSOURI CONFERENCE (ME, 1848), which was organized in 1816, adhered South in 1845 by a vote of eighty-six to fourteen. According to the 1844 GENERAL CONFERENCE PLAN OF SEPARATION, the entire conference was obligated to go the way the majority voted. But the 1848 Northern General Conference repudiated the Plan of Separation, and it proceeded to establish another Missouri Conference that year which included MISSOURI and ARKANSAS and territory to the west. This Missouri Conference was organized at the session of the Illinois Conference in Belleville, Sept. 13, 1848. The printed minutes show that the conference had two districts in Missouri and one in Arkansas, twenty-two charges, and a total of 1,538 members. The next year the conference met at Ebenezer Church in St. Louis, a congregation of 140 members which had erected a church building in 1846. Preachers from Missouri, Arkansas, TEXAS, KANSAS, and NEBRASKA were present at the conference.

In 1852 the Missouri Conference was divided to form the Arkansas Conference, the latter to include the southern part of Missouri as well as Arkansas. Two quadrenniums later the two states were placed together again as the Missouri and Arkansas Conference. Then in 1868 north Missouri was designated as the Missouri Conference, while south Missouri and Arkansas formed the St. Louis Conference. Four years later Arkansas was set off to itself again as a conference, an arrangement which continued until 1920 when the Arkansas Conference was absorbed by the St. Louis Conference. In 1925 the absorption of the ST. LOUIS GERMAN CONFERENCE brought nearly 5,000 members into the two Missouri Conferences. In 1932 the St. Louis Conference was merged with the Missouri Conference, an arrangement which continued until unification in 1939.

In 1869 the St. Louis Conference reported six districts, 107 charges, and 13,401 members. In 1920, the year Arkansas was again made a part of the St. Louis Conference, it reported 47,146 members. In its last year, 1931, the St. Louis Conference reported 52,845 members. In 1932, when all of Missouri and Arkansas were again included in the Missouri Conference, the statistics were eleven districts, 330 charges, and 83,184 members.

During their existence the Missouri and St. Louis Conferences established and supported a number of schools. Carleton College operated at Farmington from about 1879 to 1924. In 1871 the St. Louis Conference accepted a school at Carthage which became Ozark Wesleyan College; the institution closed about 1932. A school started at Cameron in 1883 became Missouri Wesleyan College in 1897. It achieved accreditation, but ultimately financial difficulties forced its closure and in 1930 all of its resources were merged with BAKER UNIVERSITY in Kansas. A training school which in time became NATIONAL COLLEGE was started by the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M.E. Church in Kansas City, Kan., in 1899. It soon moved to Kansas City, Mo., and later offered liberal arts courses. Lacking financial support and patronage from the surrounding annual conferences, National College was never able to achieve full accreditation. The college closed in 1964, and its property was acquired by and became the campus of the ST. PAUL SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, Methodist.

The number of hospitals and homes established by the M.E. Church in Missouri is impressive. The following, with date of establishment and location, are still serving as Methodist or Methodist related institutions: Epworth School for disturbed girls, St. Louis, 1909; Missouri Methodist Hospital, St. Joseph, 1897; Freeman Hospital, Joplin, 1925; Ozark Manor (Methodist Home for the Aged), Marionville, 1925; and Burge Hospital, Springfield, 1906.

In 1939, its last year, the Missouri Conference reported eight districts (one of them in Arkansas), 314 charges, 92,362 members, and property valued at $6,820,860.

MISSOURI CONFERENCE (EUB). The first United Brethren preaching in Missouri was in the southwestern corner of the state prior to 1850 when a few families had arrived from the east. In 1851 the Sandusky Conference gave Bishop GLOSSBRENNER money to employ a suitable missionary for Missouri. When the new Missionary Board was formed in 1853, Josiah Terrel was appointed missionary to Missouri. The following year, Nov. 3, 1854, the Missouri Conference was organized in Jasper County, with five mission fields.

Since 1847 the Iowa conferences had cultivated work in the northern tier of counties in Missouri. These were eventually turned over to the Missouri Conference, whereas the former charges in the southwest were united with work in KANSAS. Thus an old conference acquired a new constituency.

In 1881 the GENERAL CONFERENCE formed the Southwestern Missouri Conference, taking from the Osage Conference that part of its territory in Missouri, south of the Missouri River. Four tiers of counties in ARKANSAS were added in 1885 and the name was changed to Southern Missouri Conference. A statewide conference was constituted in 1897 by uniting Southern Missouri and Missouri Conferences. Then in 1921, with the closing of the Louisiana Conference, the few remaining churches were added to Missouri Conference.

When the E.U.B. Church was formed in 1946, there were no former Evangelical churches within the three states of LOUISIANA, Arkansas and Missouri. Conference membership in 1946 was listed at 4,152 persons. Then when The United Methodist Church was established in 1968 there were 2,787 members. A year following church union the congregations of the conference had been received into those former Methodist conferences within the several states.

JOHN H. NESS, JR.

MISSOURI EAST CONFERENCE was organized at Fayette, Mo., May 30, 1961 with Bishop KENNETH W. COPELAND presiding. The conference was formed by merging the ST. LOUIS CONFERENCE with the east half of the MISSOURI CONFERENCE as the three conferences in Missouri—the SOUTHWEST MISSOURI CONFERENCE was the third one—were consolidated into two. Its territory includes the east half of Missouri. When organized the conference had eight districts: Cape Girardeau-Farmington, Hannibal-Mexico, Jefferson City, Kirksville, Poplar Bluff, Rolla, St. Louis North, and St. Louis South. There were 276 ministers, 285 pastoral charges, 117,216 members, and property valued at $51,523,300.

When the CENTRAL WEST CONFERENCE (CJ) was merged in 1966, the Missouri East Conference received twenty-two charges, fifteen ministers and 5,281 members from that body.

The Missouri East Conference supports the Methodist Children's Home in St. Louis. It maintains a chaplain at Barnes Hospital and directs its Golden Cross funds to that institution. It supports the summer assembly called Epworth Among the Hills at Arcadia, Blue Mountain Camp at Arcadia, and Camp Jo Ota at Clarence. The conference in cooperation with the MISSOURI WEST CONFERENCE supports Ozark Methodist Manor at Marionville, CENTRAL METHODIST COLLEGE at Fayette, ST. PAUL SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY Methodist at KANSAS CITY, and WESLEY FOUNDATIONS at nine state institutions of higher learning.

The Missouri East Conference raised nearly $800,000 in capital funds for St. Paul School of Theology Methodist by 1963. From its beginning in 1961, the conference has laid an apportionment on its churches each year for higher education, the amount raised being distributed on a quota basis to Central Methodist College, St. Paul School of Theology Methodist, and PHILANDER SMITH COLLEGE at LITTLE ROCK, Ark. The amount collected for these schools in 1968 was $221,416.

In 1967 the two Missouri conferences projected the Missouri Methodist Foundation, Inc., through which interested persons may donate or bequeath money to the Methodist Church in Missouri for the support of its religious, charitable, and educational work.

In 1970 the Missouri East Conference reported seven districts, 352 ministers, 287 charges, 113,800 members, and property valued at $58,533,466.

MISSOURI WEST CONFERENCE was organized May 30, 1961 at Fayette, Mo., with Bishop EUGENE M. FRANK presiding. The conference was formed by merging the SOUTHWEST MISSOURI CONFERENCE with the west half of the MISSOURI CONFERENCE as the three conferences in Missouri—the ST. LOUIS CONFERENCE was the third one—were consolidated into two. Its territory includes the west half of Missouri. The conference began with ten districts, Chillicothe, Fayette-Marshall, Joplin, Kansas City North, Kansas City South, Maryville, Nevada, St. Joseph, Sedalia, and Springfield. In 1962 the conference reported 368 pastoral charges, 384 ministers, 144,609 members, and property valued at $43,885,095.

When the CENTRAL WEST CONFERENCE (CJ) was merged in 1966, the Missouri West Conference received twelve charges, nine ministers, and 2,786 members from that body.

The ST. PAUL SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY Methodist, KANSAS CITY, is within the bounds of the Missouri West Conference. The seminary, founded in 1957 by authority of the GENERAL CONFERENCE, has been strongly supported by the annual conferences in MISSOURI, KANSAS, and NEBRASKA; in the first few years they raised capital funds for the institution in the amount of nearly $5,000,000, and in addition they contribute annually to its operating budget.

The Missouri West Conference maintains conference camps at Eldorado Springs and Lawson. It supports the Methodist Hospital at St. Joseph, Cox Medical Center at Springfield, and Freeman Hospital at Joplin. Jointly with the MISSOURI EAST CONFERENCE it contributes to CENTRAL METHODIST COLLEGE at Fayette, St. Paul School of Theology Methodist at Kansas City, Ozark Manor at Marionville, the METHODIST CHILDREN'S HOME in ST. LOUIS, and the WESLEY FOUNDATIONS at nine state institutions of higher learning. From its beginning in 1961, the Missouri West Conference has laid an apportionment on its churches each year for higher education, the amount raised being distributed on a quota basis to Central Methodist College, St. Paul School of Theology Methodist, and PHILANDER SMITH COLLEGE at LITTLE ROCK, Ark. The amount collected for these schools in 1968 was $279,183.

In 1970 the Missouri West Conference reported ten districts, 453 ministers, 377 charges, 138,643 members, and property valued at $56,807,304.

MITCHELL, BENNETT (1832-1922), American pioneer preacher, was born in Monroe County, Ind., Feb. 18, 1832. After two years at Indiana Asbury College he moved to Lucas County, Iowa, where he joined the IOWA CONFERENCE in 1855. His first four appointments moved him steadily westward across Iowa. The Conference was divided in 1860 and he found himself a member of the Western Iowa Conference, which in 1864 was named the DES MOINES CONFERENCE. In 1862 he became presiding elder of the Council Bluffs District at the western boundary of the state. In 1865 he was appointed to the Chariton District. In 1869 he was sent northward to the Sioux City District, which comprised ten counties in northwest Iowa and all of the Dakota Territory. There was only a handful of churches in the whole district. In 1872 the Conference again was divided and then he was a member of the NORTHWEST IOWA CONFERENCE. He belonged in all to four Conferences yet never transferred. In 1873 he was appointed to the Algona District.

In 1877 ended this unusual record of four consecutive terms as presiding elder in four different districts. He then served as pastor to various local churches, managed the Conference Claimants Fund for a year, and retired in 1903. After his retirement he wrote a history of the Northwest Iowa Conference. His son, Charles B., became a minister of this Conference.

Bennett Mitchell advanced with the church across 500 miles of frontier, founding and nurturing scores of churches. He helped to found SIMPSON and MORNING-SIDE COLLEGES and started a college at Algona which did not survive. He was elected five times to GENERAL CONFERENCE and was a director of the National Anti-Saloon League. He died Aug. 12, 1922 and is buried at Sioux City, Iowa.

MITCHELL, CHARLES BAYARD (1857-1942), American bishop, was born Aug. 27, 1857, in PITTSBURGH, Pa., the son of Daniel Patrick and Anna Elizabeth (Baker) Mitchell. He was a charter member of the SOUTHWEST KANSAS CONFERENCE which he entered in 1880.

On July 6, 1882, he married Clara Aull.

In 1884 he transferred to the KANSAS CONFERENCE where he was financial secretary for a few years. Transfers to other conferences followed as it was evidently his desire to serve but one church in an annual conference: 1887, Pittsburgh; 1888, NEWARK; 1892, ST. LOUIS; 1897, MINNESOTA Northern; 1901, EAST OHIO; 1908, ROCK RIVER.

A delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1904, 1908, 1912 (alternate), and 1916, the latter Conference elected him a bishop and assigned him to ST. PAUL, Minn., where he served for two quadrennia. In 1924 he was assigned to the PHILIPPINE ISLANDS. In 1928 he retired from the episcopacy.

While at St. Paul, he instituted a campaign for $1,750,000, in those days a large amount, and the success of the campaign materially aided the several Methodist educational institutions in his area; LAWRENCE COLLEGE, HAMLINE UNIVERSITY, Parker College, DAKOTA WESLEYAN, and the WESLEY FOUNDATION at Madison, Wis.

A graduate of ALLEGHENY COLLEGE, he held the B.A., M.A., Ph.D., and D.D. degrees from that institution. BAKER UNIVERSITY granted him the LL.D. He was the author of a book of sermons, The Noblest Quest, and A Little Bundle Of Letters from Three Continents.

He died in Pasadena, Calif., Feb. 23, 1942, and was buried in Forest Lawn, Glendale.

MITCHELL, ERIC A. (1917-), bishop, was born at Madras, India, July 7, 1917. He was educated at Baldwin Boys' School, Bangalore, and Leonard Theological College, Jabalpur, where he won the theological diploma in 1942. As a CRUSADE SCHOLAR he attended Union Theological Seminary in New York where he was awarded the B.D. and S.T.M. degrees, the latter in 1957. He served as pastor at Madras, 1937, and at Asanol in the Bengal Conference, 1942-49. At the latter place he was married in 1946, and he and his wife have one son.

Mitchell was chaplain of Vellore Medical College at Madras, 1958, and from 1959 to 1969 he was pastor of Taylor Memorial Church at Bombay and also district superintendent. He has attended a number of conferences and consultations, including the 1964 and 1968 GENERAL CONFERENCES (TMC), the consultation on structure (COSMOS) at Green Lake, Wis., the Assembly of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES at UPPSALA, Sweden, and the World Family Life Conference at LONDON in 1966, where he was elected vice-chairman of the body. He is a member of the board of directors of the Y.M.C.A., and vice-chairman of the Bombay Samaritans, which is an organization that ministers to people who are tempted to commit suicide. Also, he is a leader in other organizations which help working boys and aged spinsters.

At the Central Conference of the Methodist Church in Southeast Asia, Mitchell was elected bishop on Jan. 2, 1969. He was assigned to the Hyderabad Episcopal Area which includes the HYDERABAD and SOUTH INDIA ANNUAL CONFERENCES. As an episcopal leader he serves as chairman of the Council of Evangelism, the Board of Missions, and the Commission on COURSES OF STUDY.

MITCHELL, HINCKLEY GILBERT (1846-1920), American educator and theologian whose "trial" for heresy became a cause celebre in the M. E. Church, was born on Feb. 22, 1846, in Lee, N. Y., to James and Sarah Gilbert (Thomas) Mitchell. His educational achievements were many: Falley Seminary, Fulton, New York, 1867; WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, A.B., 1873, A.M., 1876, and D.D., 1901; BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, S.T.B.,

1876; Leipzig University, Ph.D., 1879; and MT. UNION COLLEGE, D.D., 1888. He married Alice Stanford on June 29, 1880.

Mitchell served as Director of the American School of Oriental Research in Jerusalem, 1901-02; member of Alpha Delta Phi fraternity; member of 20th Century Club; Secretary of the Society of Biblical Literature and Exegesis (editor of its Journal, 1882-88); member of the Harvard Biblical Club. He was the author of: Hebrew Lessons, 1885; Amos—Essay in Exegesis, 1893; Theology of the Old Testament (trans.), 1893; Isaiah I-XII, 1897; The World Before Abraham, 1901; Genesis, 1909; Tales Told in Palestine (with J. E. Hanauer), 1904; "Haggai and Zechariah," International Commentary, 1912; Ethics of the Old Testament, 1912.

He became pastor of the Methodist church in Bearytown (or Fayette) of the CENTRAL NEW YORK CONFERENCE in 1879. He then taught Latin and Hebrew at Wesleyan University, 1880-83; was professor of Hebrew and Old Testament exegesis, at Boston University School of Theology, 1883-1905; and after that was professor of Hebrew and Old Testament exegesis at Tufts College, 1910 until his death.

The Mitchell Case. He championed, in his classes, the higher criticism as it was beginning to be called, especially in the study of the Old Testament. In 1895 he was charged with "Unitarian" tendencies on account of his denial of the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch. He became a theological storm center in the M. E. Church. A collection of articles edited by W. W. Shenk, entitled Shall Methodism Remain Wesleyan in Type, and Evangelical?, presented many accusations directed toward Mitchell. The articles were addressed to the bishops, ministers, and members of the M. E. Church, to present "the departures of Professor H. G. Mitchell of Boston University School of Theology, as set forth by certain men who have been students in his classroom work." The contributors felt Mitchell ought not be permitted to remain in the seminary, for his rationalistic theology encouraged denial of authority of the Word of God, tended toward Unitarianism, and sought to revolutionize Methodist doctrine. Mitchell's idea of evolution, they said, denied that man ever had a fall, contended that man had inherent in himself the full power for his own development, and repudiated God's plan for Christ to die that men might live.

The GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church therefore passed a resolution in 1900 that required, as a condition for the recognition of any theological school of the M. E. Church, that its professors be confirmed by a majority vote of the bishops present and voting at any regular meeting of their Board. Another resolution in 1904 stated that when specific charges of misteaching in Methodist theological schools were made in writing by responsible parties, members or ministers of the M. E. Church, the bishops were to appoint a committee from themselves to investigate charges. Their subsequent report, if adopted by the Board of Bishops, was to be transmitted to the trustees of the theological school involved for proper action.

Attempts were made to prevent Mitchell's confirmation in 1900, but failed. In 1905, when Mitchell was again up for re-election, he was attacked for "misteaching," based mainly on his book, The World Before Abraham. The bishops' committee said the book contained statements about the historic character of the Book of Genesis that seemed unwarranted, objectionable, and tended to invalidate the authority of other portions of Scripture. Mitchell's view of the fall of man and his assertion that the deluge was local were declared to invalidate Jesus' reference to Noah, and Paul's reference to the death of all in Adam. This, they felt, destroyed the authority of Jesus and the inspired writers of the New Testament. Thus, in 1905, charges of heresy were formally brought to the bishops, who voted not to confirm Mitchell's re-election to Boston. They sent their reasons and decision to the trustees, saying they had examined the charges made by responsible parties, and that the trustees should take responsible action.

Six months later the trustees asked the bishops to reconsider their refusal to confirm. The bishops refused, saying the trustees had not taken, or made known, any "proper action." "There had been no explanation from Professor Mitchell, much less modification or withdrawal of the statements objected to by the bishops and which created a 'reasonable doubt.' There went from the trustees, so far as the bishops knew, no request to Professor Mitchell even to consider whether the parts of his book referred to by the bishops ought to be reconsidered, revised or withdrawn." (The Independent, Nov. 16, 1905, p. 1179.)

In self defense, Mitchell requested that he be tried by the Central New York Conference of the M. E. Church, of which he was a member. The Conference appointed a committee to investigate the case, and after hearing the committee's report, refused to institute a formal trial. The Conference did, however, pass a resolution of censure for teachings which were contrary to the Holy Scriptures and to the doctrinal standards of Methodism. A trial was refused, because Mitchell no longer held the chair at Boston, and because a trial would cause too great a disturbance. F. J. McCONNELL (later bishop) demanded an immediate trial for Mitchell, but was refused.

The Judiciary Committee of the General Conference of the M. E. Church, in 1908, held that the Central New York Conference action was illegal. They ruled that there was no disciplinary provision for the report of the investigating committee, or for the action of the Central New York Conference in adopting the committee's report. The report of the committee was said to have reflected upon the character of Mitchell, and it was therefore the duty of the Conference to have granted him a trial upon his demand, or to have struck from the report all reflections upon his character. The Conference had refused or neglected to do so, and therefore the action of the committee and the Conference was declared null and void.

The Judiciary Committee of this General Conference also ruled that the bishops had the legal right to investigate reported charges of erroneous teaching in the seminaries of the M. E. Church.

Mitchell devoted the years 1906-08 to literary work, and in 1909 traveled in Europe. He left teaching in the M. E. Church and was appointed to the chair of Hebrew (and after 1915, New Testament also) at Tufts College (a Universalist seminary) in 1910, where he remained until his death. He left unfinished an autobiography, For the Benefit of my Creditors, published after his death, in 1922.

MITCHELL, ISAAC GREEN (1810-1881), American pioneer preacher, was born near Madison Springs, Madison Co., Ga., on May 27, 1810. He was ordained as an ELDER in the M. P. Church on Nov. 12, 1843. He is credited with having officiated at the first wedding ceremony held in Marthasville, now ATLANTA, Ga. He served as a circuit rider until 1856 when he moved to Atlanta. When a mortgage foreclosed on the property of the M. P. Church located at the corner of Garnett and Forsyth Streets in Atlanta, Mitchell purchased it for $2,900 and had the portion of the lot occupied by the church building deeded to the M. P. Church. On the remaining portion, he built a home where he resided until his death.

He married Mary Anne Dudley on Jan. 15, 1829; she died on Feb. 12, 1856. It is of historic interest that Mitchell was the great-grandfather of Margaret Mitchell, author of Gone With the Wind.

Mitchell is buried in the family lot at Panola, Rockdale Co., Ga. Funeral services were held in the M. P. Church next door to his residence.

MITCHELL, PAUL DENNY (1912-1946), an American missionary to CUBA, was born in Mangum, Okla., Aug. 29, 1912, son of C. F. and Anna M. Welch Mitchell. After attending public schools in his home state he attended SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY, where he received both A.B. and B.D. degrees. For one year he served as pastor at Duke, Okla., and in 1937 accepted work in Cuba where his first work was in Camaguey.

For eight years he was teacher and director of the nascent Methodist Seminary in Havana. During these years at different times he also served as pastor of three congregations in and around Havana, and when a missionary at Holguin became sick exchanged work for several months.

He was the author of Grounds for Gratitude, which was translated into German; Tecpees to Towers; Mision y Comision del Metodismo; and Cuba Calling. He gave the proceeds of the sales of his books for Christian literature in Latin America.

Because of illness in his home, he retired from Cuba and accepted appointments at Verden and Noble, Okla. Taking his young people on a picnic one of the girls, Jeanette Harris, ten years of age, was caught in the current when swimming. He was a good swimmer and attempted to rescue her but both were drowned.

When only a youth he became possessed of the idea that he should be a missionary, and veritably to the ministerial manor he was called. Wherever he went he was popular and at the same time quiet, dignified and unselfish. No one has ever excelled his record in learning the Spanish language so rapidly, to the degree that he could preach with power in both Spanish and his native tongue. His death left a tragic void.

MITCHELL, THOMAS (1726-1785), British itinerant, was called "the poor man's preacher." He was born at Bingley, Dec. 3, 1726, to godly parents. By temperament religious, by trade a mason, he was converted under JOHN NELSON's and WILLIAM GRIMSHAW's ministry. About 1747-48, he became itinerant; and WESLEY arranged numerous brief spells for him, but after 1768 Mitchell kept most circuits for two years. In Lancashire, Yorkshire, and Lincolnshire, he was frequently mobbed—at Wrangle being repeatedly ducked and painted. Few preachers suffered more. In 1760 he and others caused a stir by administering Holy Communion at Norwich. He became supernumerary in 1784 and died in 1785.

MIYAMA, KANICHI (dates uncertain), the first Japanese Christian convert in America. In JAPAN during the 1870's Miyama sought to enroll in an army academy but failed the entrance exams. Despondent over his failure, he came to the United States in 1876 to seek new hope and life. Providentially, his friend in Japan had given him a letter of introduction to Otis Gibson, a missionary to CHINA who was then the superintendent of the Chinese Mission in SAN FRANCISCO. From Gibson the young Miyama learned not only the English language but also about God as revealed in Christ. He was baptized in 1877, thereby becoming the first Japanese Christian convert in America. Subsequently "The Japanese Gospel Society" was organized. This group gathered regularly in the Chinese Mission. Out of this small Christian gathering grew the San Francisco Japanese M. E. Church, the mother church of all Protestant churches among the Japanese people in the United States.

After serving eight years in the San Francisco Church, as the first Japanese Methodist minister in America, Miyama was brought by the Holy Spirit to HAWAII and there he started the Methodist work among the Japanese people in the islands. One of the Christian fruits gathered in by Miyama was the conversion of Taro Ando, the Consul General of the Japanese government stationed in Honolulu. Ando later became the father of the Christian Temperance Movement in Japan.

MOBILE, ALABAMA, U.S.A., a port city in the southeastern United States, is located near one of the deepest natural harbors on the Gulf of Mexico. The present site was settled by the French in 1711. Its name originates from an Indian Tribe, the "Maubila," which once inhabited the area.

The first attempt at Methodist beginnings in the city was in 1821 when Alexander Talley was appointed by the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE as a "missionary to PENSACOLA, Mobile, Blakely and adjoining territory." After one year of disappointing labor, Talley located. The Mississippi Conference discontinued the appointment for the next two years.

During these interim years, Nicholas McIntyre, a presiding elder, secured a lot for a Methodist church in Mobile. The deed was made May 10, 1824, to five Methodists who were members of congregations on the Chickasawhay Circuit.

In 1825 the Mississippi Conference sent Henry P. Cook to serve the "Mobile and Pensacola Mission." Cook had worked in Pensacola (FLORIDA) the previous year, but requested that Mobile also be included in his work. A few months later he died of yellow fever.

Cook's successor, John Russell Lambuth, reported on Dec. 14, 1826, a membership of eighteen white and seventy-eight Negro members, the first tangible evidence of Methodist growth in Mobile. During 1827 the first Methodist house of worship was completed. Receiving no pay from the Methodists in Mobile, Lambuth supported himself by establishing a school.

Although the first Society was officially listed by the Mississippi Conference as the Mobile Mission, local citizens, observing the congregation's zeal and activity, referred to it as the "Bee Hive" church.

In 1830 the Mobile Mission reported a loss in membership resulting from the organization of the M. P. Church. Following the leadership of Peyton S. Graves, a sizeable group withdrew from the mission.

In 1832 Mobile was listed as an appointment within the newly organized ALABAMA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church. R. L. Walker, who had served as host-pastor of the organizational conference in Tuscaloosa, was appointed pastor of the church in Mobile.

From 1826 until 1841 there was only one Methodist church in Mobile. At the annual conference, beginning Dec. 30, 1840, Bishop JAMES O. ANDREW directed Greenberry Garrett, presiding elder of the Mobile District, to enlarge the work. As a result, two new charges were formed: (1) Second Charge and (2) Seaman's Mission. The "Bee Hive" Church was listed as First Charge.

In 1842, First Charge was renamed Franklin Street, and the following year Second Charge became St. Francis Street, after having been known as Jackson Street for one year.

Two new churches were organized in 1843; (1) West Ward, an addition to the Franklin Street appointment, and (2) Little Zion, later named the Big Zion A.M.E. Zion Church.

Recognizing serious educational needs, Franklin Street and St. Francis Street Churches cooperated in the formation and support of a free school that continued until ALABAMA enacted the free public school law.

The first session of the Alabama Conference following the PLAN OF SEPARATION adopted in 1844 was held in Mobile during February 1846. Until the PLAN OF UNION in 1939 most of the Methodist work in Mobile continued under the M. E. Church, South, and the various Negro Methodist churches. Neither the M. P. Church nor the M. E. Church were ever numerically strong in Mobile.

In October 1845, a new church, forerunner of the Toulminville Methodist Church, was established. A one-room frame building was completed in 1846, and was used by all Protestant denominations in the area.

Yellow fever claimed a terrible toll in lives throughout Mobile in 1853. Every Methodist preacher in the city died of the dread disease within three weeks' time.

The Civil War years, 1861-1865, were difficult years for Methodism in Mobile. Many charges were left "to be supplied," others were served by supernumerary preachers. In 1863 the Mobile District itself was marked "to be supplied." The Alabama Conference divided itself into two conferences, the Montgomery and the Mobile, hoping to facilitate the work. The General Conference (MIES) in 1866 countenanced the division, and it continued until 1870.

In 1874 an outgrowth of a Mobile City Mission Circuit was organized as the Four Mile Post Church. A one-room frame building was constructed and was ready for occupancy by 1881. After being known as the Crichton Church from 1898 until 1925, its name was changed to the Spring Hill Avenue Church.

During the pastorate of A. J. Lamar, the Franklin Street Church, Mobile's oldest, relocated. In 1890 the new building was completed and was renamed the Government Street Church.

In 1896, the Alabama Conference met in the new Government Street Church. At this session another church, called Oakdale Mission, was formed, making the fifth church serving within the city limits of Mobile.

Materials from a saw mill shed were used to build the first Dauphin Way Church in 1913. Officially organized a year later, the congregation had a charter membership of twenty-six. By 1965 its membership had grown to 2,155. During twenty-five years of this remarkable growth, A. Carl Akins was the church's pastor.

The churches of Mobile had difficulty meeting their "benevolent apportionments" during the depression years of early 1930's. All pastors, serving churches not having paid these apportionments, were required to make a complete canvass of every member, securing, if possible, a pledge to benevolences.

After unification in 1939 two churches in Mobile were members of the Central JURISDICTION: Warren Street and Wesley.

As the city of Mobile grew, suburbs became numerous around the city's perimeter. To meet this challenge twelve new congregations were organized between 1925 and 1965. Simultaneously, shifting populations resulted in difficult problems for the inner city. Two efforts have been undertaken, moving toward a confrontation of these problems: the Inner City Mission, an effort by the Church to meet the pressing needs of poverty; and the Toulminville—Warren Street Methodist Parish, a cooperative effort involving a Negro church and an ALABAMA-WEST FLORIDA CONFERENCE white church.

Big Zion A. M. E. ZION CHURCH came to life in 1842. The growth of the membership of a white Methodist church located at the corner of Franklin and St. Michael Streets, Mobile County, caused the members of this church to seek a way to relieve a growing condition of racial contact.

After a length of time, the white church placed S. H. Cox, white, in charge of the Negro congregation and the services were held in a little house on the southeast corner of Church and Dearborn Streets.

They remained in this place free of charge with Cox as pastor until 1848, when they decided to purchase it with funds donated there.

Under the law of Alabama, they were prohibited from holding property under their own names. Therefore, the property was deeded to the following white trustees: Viz: A. H. Ryland, R. S. Baker and R. L. Watson.

Local preachers at this time were Ferdinand Smith, Charles Lee, and Battas Dayes. They were permitted to pray during services.

Shortly after this place was purchased, it was burned to the ground, and the little band went from there to a carpenter's shop which was also burned down. After the burning of the carpenter's shop, they worshipped in the Burden's Mill, at St. Francis and Wilkinson Streets. From there they moved to the Medical College on St. Anthony at Lawrence Street. The first Quarterly Conference was held.

Now appeared the first A.M.E. Zion bishop to come South—Bishop J. J. CLINTON, who brought with him Wilbur G. Strong, who persuaded them to vote to transfer their membership from the M. E. Church, South, to the A.M.E. Zion connection. The property, however, remained under the ownership of white trustees until 1867.

In 1860, while still worshipping in the Medical College, the members of the Church purchased lots on the northwest corner of Church and S. Bayou Streets from Henry Turner and constructed a shed building in which they held their services. Charles Lee, a local preacher, was the pastor while worshipping in this shed.

In 1865 Ferdinand Smith was ordained by Bishop J. J. Clinton of the A.M.E. Zion connection. He was the first Negro minister to be ordained by a Negro bishop in the state of Alabama. On July 29 of the same year he was authorized to take charge of the church. He was pastor until 1867, when E. D. Taylor succeeded him.

Samuel Wilson served until 1880; William Spencer, 1880-1885; A. J. Warner, 1885-1891; H. R. Gaines took charge of the church in 1891 and served until 1893; C. H. Smith succeeded Gaines in 1893; Richard A. Morrissey, 1899-1904; A. J. Rodgers, 1904-1908; L. W. Kyles, 1908-1914; G. W. Johnson, 1914-1921; J. R. White, 1921; F. W. Riley, 1925; M. F. Gregory, 1931-1932; A. A. Garvin, 1933-1934; R. H. Collins Lee, 1934-1935; William Bascom, 1935 through 1936; D. G. Garland, 1936; A. E. Ellison, 1937-1941; Felix S. Anderson, 1941-

Dauphin Way Church is the stately mid-city church of the port city. It is not Methodism's oldest in Mobile, but it is the largest and one of the most influential. Like the congregation of an early Christian church, Dauphin Way had its beginning in the homes of those who desired a church fellowship in this new area of the city. The year was 1913. A site was given and an old sawmill shed was torn down and rebuilt to house this fledgling congregation. In 1922 the church was moved several blocks and in a short time merged with St. Stephens Road Church. In 1925 the building on the new site was completed, and this facility served well until 1957, when Dauphin Way opened its new sanctuary, diagonally across Dauphin Street from the old.

Twenty children gathered for the first Sunday school class meeting in a home in 1913. Fifty years later over 2,000 composed the fellowship of Dauphin Way. That number continues to grow year by year.

The beautiful colonial sanctuary, dedicated in 1964, is one of the most impressive church structures in the Azalea City. It seats 1,200 worshippers and provides an atmosphere of stately simplicity. Its cross, high above the city, brings a fitting peak to its tapering spire, calling all who pass by to look up in adoration.

In 1970 Dauphin Way reported a membership of 2,177, property valued at $1,769,910, and $200,283 raised for all purposes.

MOFFATT, ELBERT MARSTON (1884-1966), was born in Le Sueur, Minn., and graduated from Dartmouth. He arrived in INDIA, Feb. 19, 1911, as a Y.M.C.A. secretary. He served first as business secretary at headquarters in CALCUTTA, and then as general secretary of the Y.M.C.A. in Allahabad. Returning to America in 1916, he became secretary of the Bowery Y.M.C.A. in New York.

In September 1920, he again arrived in India, but as a missionary of the M. E. Church, and began a new career in which he achieved distinction. He was appointed manager of the school of commerce of LUCKNOW CHRISTIAN COLLEGE. The next year, 1921, Lucknow University invited him to be dean of commerce, and he served both institutions until 1926 when he took furlough. Subsequent appointments included treasurer of Lucknow Christian College, 1927-30; superintendent, Kumaun and Sitapur Districts, 1927-30; secretary of the executive board, 1931-46; and branch treasurer for India, Board of Missions. He was the originator of the All-India Provident Fund for ministers and other employees of the Methodist Church and its agencies in India. He took the lead in organizing the inter-mission business office in BOMBAY and in securing the participation of seventy-two missions.

He left India on furlough in 1946 and was held there as a secretary of the Board of Missions, working on a study of deeds for property owned by the board in various countries. He served as secretary of the GENERAL CONFERENCE Commission on the Structure of Methodism Overseas (COSMOS), 1946-50.

In the autumn of that year he returned to India and became agent of the LUCKNOW PUBLISHING HOUSE and held that position for four years. He represented the Board of Missions in deputation work for two years or more. He retired in 1956, but in retirement was called back to India to make a study of the state of property records and to devise plans for the transfer of properties owned by the Board of Missions to the church in India. He died in October 1966.

MOKITIMI, SETH MOLEFI (1904-), Methodist minister in SOUTH AFRICA, was born at Quthing, Basutoland

SETH M. MOKITIMI

(now Lesotho) on Jan. 15, 1904, and began life as a herd boy on the hills of his native country. He later attended school and then proceeded to the HEALDTOWN MISSIONARY INSTITUTION where he received his high school education and qualified as a teacher. Candidating for the ministry of the Methodist Church of South Africa, he was trained in theology at Wesley House, Fort Hare and ordained to the work of the ministry. After a period of service at Zastron in the Orange Free State he was appointed chaplain to the students at Healdtown. Thereafter he served in the Transkeian circuit of Osborn, at the Bensonvale Missionary Institution in the Northern Cape as Governor, and at Bloemfontein. He was Secretary of the Methodist Church's Board of Examiners (1941-62) and became General Missionary Secretary in 1963. After being runner-up for the Presidency of the Methodist Conference for five years, he was elected as President of the 1964 Conference, the first African to hold this position. In 1966 he was elected President of the Christian Council of South Africa.

MOLEMA, son of the Barolong chief Tauane, gained his Christian experience at Thaba N'chu. Tauane died in 1850 and was succeeded by his son Montsioa but Molema became the spiritual leader. He had moved with the tribe from Thaba N'chu back to their homeland in the vicinity of Maquassie, thence to Lotlakana and Moshaneng and finally to Mafeking. For forty years he was their leader and preacher, with occasional assistance from missionaries from the Kimberley and Bloemfontein District. In January 1882 Molema died—just ten months before the Chairman of the new Transvaal District visited Mafeking. The Chairman found a thriving church and Sunday school of 500 children and adults led by Joshua, Molema's son. A thousand people attended the services held under a large tree. There was a church building but it was too small for the congregation.

MOLING, FRANCES (1871-1945), American missionary to CUBA, was born in Havana, Mo., May 11, 1871. A school for girls had been started in Havana with Hattie C. Garson, who had been transferred from Mexico, 1898, director; and another school in Cienfuegos in 1900, with J. D. Lewis. The latter began with five pupils and Lewis worked without salary for ten months. The two schools were united and settled at Cienfuegos.

Fortunately, in 1898 a Mrs. Dora Bowman, from the NORTH TEXAS CONFERENCE, became very much interested in what she had heard of the needs of Cuban children and collected $18,000 to help with a school for Cuban children. Mrs. Bowman requested that the school be named for her sister-in-law, Eliza Bowman.

On taking charge of the school in 1902, Miss Moling secured valuable property on one of the main streets in down-town Cienfuegos, where for more than twenty years the school functioned as a co-educational day school. With her wise leadership the school soon grew to the capacity of its class rooms.

About 1924 buildings located on a hill in the highest point in town, where the city reservoir had been previously located, were offered for sale. Miss Moling bought them and added a commodious class room building and chapel. The small space for dormitory purposes was always filled to capacity and buses were required to bring the day pupils that crowded the class rooms.

To properly evaluate her work and character it was said, "one needs a pen of gold dipped in imperishable ink." With a vision, a lover of the beautiful, a tireless worker, she possessed all the virtues that make a noble and refined person and at the same time a quiet sweetness and patience.

Not only was she an excellent business administrator but her quiet sweet disposition affected everyone that ever knew her. She retired in 1937 and died March 28, 1945.

MOLTHER, PHILIP H. (1714-1780), Moravian, was born at Burtweiler, Alsace, on Dec. 26, 1714. As tutor to Count ZINZENDORF's son, he became a Moravian; and at FETTER LANE in LONDON he propounded the doctrine of "stillness," which asserted that those who believed themselves converted should abstain from the means of GRACE, especially from the Lord's Supper, until all their doubts were removed. This doctrine and Molther's objections to the Methodist "scenes" were largely responsible for the disruption of the Fetter Lane group and the formation of the first Methodist society in 1740. The doctrine of "stillness," though supported by August Spangenberg and others at the time, was soon dropped. Molther died at Bedford on Sept. 9, 1780.

SHOT K. MONDOL

MONDOL, SHOT KUMAR (1896-), Methodist bishop, was born in Murshidabad, West Bengal, India, on Oct. 11, 1896. His father was an ordained Methodist minister in the BENGAL ANNUAL CONFERENCE. His formal education was acquired entirely in India. He studied in the Scottish Churches College and in St. Paul's College, both in CALCUTTA, and was graduated with a B.A. degree from the University of Calcutta. His theological education was obtained through the Conference COURSE OF STUDIES.

Early he acquired a reputation as an instructive and spiritually helpful preacher. In his early thirties he was appointed the first Indian superintendent of the Calcutta District, and at forty-four years of age became the second citizen of India elected to the Methodist episcopacy. For sixteen years he supervised the HYDERABAD Area. At the end of 1956, he was transferred to the DELHI Area, where he remained until his retirement in 1965. When the Central Conference of the PHILIPPINES asked the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS to assign one of their number to the MANILA Area to serve until that Conference elected an additional bishop, his colleagues of the Council unanimously chose Bishop Mondol.

His leadership has extended far beyond the boundaries of his own church. He has served as President of the National Christian Council of India, 1949-1956; President of the National Missionary Society of India, 1943-1958; President of the India Sunday School Union, 1948-1964; President of the World Council of Christian Education and World Sunday School Association, 1958-1962; President, United Mission to NEPAL, 1958-1964; President, North West Indian Christian Council, 1958-1962; President of the Delhi Y.M.C.A., 1960-1965; Chairman of the Managing Committee of the Christian Medical College at Vellore; and member of the Executive Committees of the Council of Bishops of The Methodist Church and of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL. He participated in public affairs often. In Asansol he was a municipal commissioner and in Hyderabad a fellow of Osmania University.

He maintained cordial relations with Prime Minister Nehru and members of his cabinet and with Doctors Rajendra Prasad and Radhakrishnan, the first and second Presidents of the Republic of India.

He has been awarded honorary degrees from American institutions as follows: ASBURY SEMINARY, D.D.; BOSTON UNIVERSITY, S.T.D.; AMERICAN UNIVERSITY, LL.D.; ALBION COLLEGE, LL.D.; and WILEY COLLEGE, LL.D.

Bishop Mondol married Carolyn Belle Osburn, a missionary of the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY. Her parents were also missionaries in India. Among their children is one son who is a member of the MICHIGAN ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

MONMOUTH, MAINE, U.S.A., where the first Methodist church in MAINE was established. In 1793 JESSE LEE visited in Monmouth and came again on Oct. 22, 1794 after he had been made presiding elder of MASSACHUSETTS, NEW HAMPSHIRE and Maine. That year Philip Wagner had been appointed to Maine. When Lee came to Monmouth, he found that Wagner had gathered a group of fifteen people. The organization of the class on Nov. 1, 1794, by Philip Wagner, gives Monmouth the distinction of being the first Methodist church established in Maine. December 25 of that year Holy Communion was observed for the first time in Monmouth at Capt. Peter Hopkin's tavern, with Jesse Lee presiding and preaching on the text Isaiah 9:6.

On Oct. 28, 1795, the church at old Meeting House Corner was well under way. Some work had been begun the previous year on land donated by Major David Marston. It was dedicated on May 31, 1796, making it the second chapel in Maine. This group started work on their church earlier than the work at (EAST) READFIELD, but were held up by lack of funds. This building burned in 1843. The new church was erected at the present site in 1846. The steeple was dedicated in 1866. In 1930 the Congregational Church united with the Methodist Church, forming what is called the Monmouth United Church. The services are held in the Methodist church; the Congregational church was sold to the Masonic order.

A member of the Monmouth Church, Harry Cockrane (1860-1946), an artist, mural painter, and decorator of churches and other public buildings, painted (about 1924) a mural of Bishop ASBURY fording a wilderness stream and holding an open book in his hand. This work, entitled "The Man on Horseback," was reproduced on the cover of the Methodist magazine Together on the occasion of the 175th Anniversary of Methodism in America. The painting is on the wall of the Methodist Church of Monmouth together with another painting by Mr. Cockrane of St. John on Patmos, writing on a tablet. The inscription is "In memory of the First Methodist Class in Maine," with these words of scripture: "And I heard a voice from Heaven saying unto me 'Write Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord'." Mr. Cockrane was a member of the Monmouth church all of his life and honored as a saintly man. He commemorated in art the historical fact that the church at Monmouth was the first Methodist church organized in Maine.

The minister at Monmouth also serves the church at East Monmouth. The Methodist society here was formed in 1794 and joined with three other denominations in building a meeting house, still in use, about 1800. It was agreed that the society that outlasted the others was finally to own the property. This is now the East Monmouth Methodist Church. Visitors today admire the "punkin" pine floor boards, oil reflector lamps, forty-pane windows, pews with hinged doors, old balcony and Christian cross doors. Weekly services are held and a union service annually on the Sunday afternoon following Thanksgiving Day that is attended by people from a large area. Jesse Lee preached in East Monmouth on Aug. 5, 1800, but it is not known whether this church had then been built.

MONROE, ANDREW (1792-1871), American pioneer preacher, was born in Hampshire County, Va., Oct. 29, 1792. He accompanied his parents on their moving, first to TENNESSEE, and later to OHIO where he grew to maturity. He was one of four preachers born to his parents.

Monroe was licensed to preach by the Zanesville, Ohio, Circuit in 1815 and was admitted on trial to the OHIO CONFERENCE that year. He served appointments there and in KENTUCKY, and transferred to the MISSOURI CONFERENCE in 1824. The western edge of the American frontier lay in MISSOURI at that time. After two pastorates in ST. LOUIS (1824-25; 1828-29), Monroe's decisive leadership placed him repeatedly in the presiding eldership—a total of twenty years—over districts that were expanding westward with an ever increasing number of circuits. He bought and operated Prairie Lawn Seminary, Danville, Mo. (1831-38), the first Methodist-related school in Missouri. He was further identified with educational endeavors by serving as Agent for St. Charles College in whose behalf he made a tour of eastern conferences. On the eve of the Civil War he served as Agent for CENTRAL METHODIST COLLEGE. In this community he spent the war years in both the pastorate and the presiding eldership.

At division of the Church, Monroe led and largely influenced the Missouri Conference to go into the M.E. Church, South. The Civil War in Missouri with its accompanying disorders prevented the bishops of the Church, South from attending the sessions of the Annual Conference. Twice Monroe was chosen President of the Conference and virtually became "substitute bishop." The leadership of his voice and pen largely prevented the disintegration of the Southern Church in Missouri. In 1865 he rallied ministers and laymen by calling a Convention to undertake the rebuilding of the church. From this Convention came the PALMYRA MANIFESTO, a declaration of faith in the future which was widely circulated in the Southern Conferences and which considerably influenced the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1866.

Monroe was a member of eleven General Conferences; five of the undivided M.E. Church and six of the M.E. Church, South. He knew personally the leaders in both branches of the church who gave him their confidence and esteem. He died Nov. 17, 1871, and was buried in Mexico, Mo.

MONROE, DAVID SOLOMON (1833-1910), American minister, was born April 15, 1833, in LEESBURG, Va. He was educated in the BALTIMORE public schools and in Baltimore City College.

In 1854 he was admitted into the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church and, by reason of boundary changes and its division at the time and following the Civil War, was subsequently a member of the East Baltimore and CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA Conferences. Upon the organization of the Central Pennsylvania Conference in 1869, he was elected its first secretary and served with unique distinction in that capacity for twenty-five years, resigning when appointed presiding elder of the Altoona District.

Elected a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church in 1876, he was named assistant secretary of that body. In 1880 he was first assistant secretary, and in 1884 became secretary. He held this office of Secretary of the General Conference until 1904, when he declined to be a candidate, having been a member of seven General Conferences.

After serving for fifty-seven years in the ministry, he died in Altoona, Pa., Nov. 15, 1910, leaving his entire estate to the church he loved. His body is interred in Mount Olivet Cemetery, Baltimore, Md., where Bishop ASBURY and a number of other heroes of Methodism also lie at rest.

He was known as an outstanding pastor, an eloquent and scholarly preacher, and a princely giant among his brethren.

MONROE, JOSHUA (1786-1874), American preacher, was born in Allegany County, Md., and spent his ministry in western PENNSYLVANIA where he became a charter member of the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE when it was formed in 1825. He was admitted in the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE in 1808. He served as a presiding elder for thirteen years. One of the founders of Beaver College, he served as president of its Board of Trustees for many years. He was a delegate from the Pittsburgh Conference to the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1828, 1832, and 1836. He wrote a series of twenty-nine articles titled Recollections of the Past, which were published serially in the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate from Dec. 23, 1856 to Sept. 21, 1858. They are autobiographical, covering the years 1791 to 1836, and run to a total of over thirty thousand words.

MONROE, SAMUEL YORKE (1816-1867), American clergyman and church extension secretary, was born at Mount Holly, N. J., July 1, 1816. Converted in youth in Union Church, PHILADELPHIA, Pa., under the labors of Charles Pitman, he was admitted to the NEW JERSEY CONFERENCE on trial in 1843. All of Monroe's pastorates were in NEW JERSEY. He was presiding elder two terms in the New Jersey Conference. His last pastorate was Trinity Church, Jersey City.

Upon the organization of the CHURCH EXTENSION SOCIETY in 1865, Monroe was chosen by the bishops to be the first Corresponding Secretary. Due to excessive labors over the church his health was weakened. During the first year as Corresponding Secretary he raised over $60,000. He was elected to three GENERAL CONFERENCES—1856, 1860, 1864—"at the last of which he received a very flattering vote for Bishop." Leaving home in Camden, N. J., to attend a meeting in Sands Street Church, BROOKLYN, N. Y., he fell or was thrown from the rear platform of a railway car near Jersey City, and was thus dashed against the rocks and instantly killed. He was buried in Evergreen Cemetery, near Camden, N. J., Feb. 13, 1867.

MONROE, LOUISIANA, U.S.A., Bartholomew Church, a frontier meetinghouse, is located in Monroe District, LOUISIANA CONFERENCE, on the present Bastrop-Bonita highway, Morehouse Parish.

Masons and Methodists constructed and jointly owned the rectangular frame building dedicated June 25, 1835. Virgin timber sills were secured by wooden pegs to notched, hand-hewn tree trunks two stories high. The outside boards of heart pine were fastened with square hand-forged iron nails. The upper floor housed independent Masonic lodge meetings until Bartholomew Lodge, Free and Accepted Masons #112, operated under charter from the Louisiana Grand Lodge (1853-1899). The lower floor provided a candle lighted place of worship for both master and slave. Membership never exceeded 150.

hardships through exposure, epidemics, and the pestilence of war. Buried in 1853, as yellow fever victims, were the pastor, John B. Eddins, his wife and son. The Rev. Samuel Haws and most of his family died from typhoid in 1860.

Since organization of the Louisiana Annual Conference (1847), Bartholomew Church has been on the following circuits: Bastrop, Bonidee, Colony Mission, Lind Grove, Plantersville, and Washita.

In 1958, complete renovation preserved the architectural style of the church but included modern improvements. Sunday school rooms replaced the early lodge rooms. The congregation continues to bear Christian witness.

MONTANA, sometimes called "the Treasure State" or "the Land of the Shining Mountains," is in the northwest section of the United States. It is bounded on the north by CANADA, on the east by the Dakotas, on the south by IDAHO and WYOMING, and on the west by Idaho. With 145,878 square miles, it is fourth in size among the fifty states. Mountainous in the west and southwest, the remaining three-fifths of the state is mostly plains. Organized as a territory in 1864, Montana became the forty-first state in 1889. In 1970 its population was 682,133.

Partially explored by Lewis and Clark in 1805, Montana was soon afterward settled by whites. The first immigration of consequence, however, came following the discovery of gold in 1858. Bannock was founded in 1862, Virginia City about 1863, and HELENA in 1864.

Both branches of Episcopal Methodism had work in Montana. The ministry of the M.E. Church began with a sermon delivered Jan. 10, 1864 at Bannock by a preacher named Craig. During the same winter William Florkey organized a Methodist class at Virginia City. In June 1864 a group of men under the leadership of an ordained local preacher named William James built a church in Junction City, about three miles from Virginia City. A church costing $1,500 was erected at Virginia City that same summer.

The M.E. Church's greatest leader in Montana in the early days was WILLIAM WESLEY VAN ORSDEL, known as "Brother Van." He preached the first sermon at Fort Benton in north Montana June 30, 1872. Van Orsdel did more than any other man to keep alive the frontier churches and to promote the institutions of his denomination in the region. The denomination developed two conferences in Montana—Montana which was carved out of the ROCKY MOUNTAIN CONFERENCE in 1876, and North Montana which was formed by merging the Kalispell and Montana Missions in 1907. In 1924 the two united to form the MONTANA STATE CONFERENCE.

The pioneer preacher of the M.E. Church, South in Montana was L. B. STATELER. Accompanying a large number of emigrants for the northwest, Staterler and his family arrived in Bozeman July 7, 1864. Staterler first visited Virginia City July 10, but for lack of a house in which a congregation could gather he did not begin preaching at once. About the middle of July he went to Norwegian Gulch on the headwaters of Willow Creek, some thirty-five miles northeast of Virginia City, where he met a Southern Methodist local preacher named Hardgrove. Assisted by laymen, they erected an arbor, covered it with brush, and began preaching services. Later Stetler preached in various homes to which he was invited. He organized the first Southern Methodist society in the home of Richard Reeves in January 1865. Reeves lived near a settlement on Willow Creek where there were a number of church members from MISSOURI. Other Southern Methodist preachers who came soon after Stetler were J. H. Pritchett and B. R. Baxter. The one began preaching at Helena in 1865 and the other a year later.

The Montana Conference of the M.E. Church South was organized and held its first session at Helena, Sept. 19-22, 1878 with Bishop W. M. WIGHTMAN presiding. L. B. Stetler was secretary. Prior to that time the Montana work had been a part of the DENVER CONFERENCE. At the beginning the new conference had two districts, Helena and Deer Lodge, six preachers, ten charges, and 232 members. The conference grew slowly, and in 1917 when it had 969 members and thirteen appointments, it merged with the Columbia and East Columbia Conferences to form the Northwest Conference. In that year the Montana Conference of the M.E. Church, which began in 1876 with 295 members, reported over 11,000.

At unification in 1939, all of Methodism in Montana became the Montana Conference. In 1964 Lehmi County, IDAHO was added to the conference.

During its history the M.E. Church established a church paper, a college, several hospitals, a children's home, and a school.

In 1968 the Montana Conference had 118 ministers, 80 pastoral charges, 26,831 church members, 16,865 church school pupils, and property valued at $11,252,500.

In 1969 the Big Horn Basin of WYOMING, with seventeen churches, was added to the Montana Conference, and the name was changed to Yellowstone Conference.

MONTANA CONFERENCE was organized at MISSOULA in June 1939, with Bishop WILBUR HAMMAKER presiding. It included the churches of the Montana State Conference (ME) and the Montana churches of the NORTHWEST CONFERENCE (MES). At the time of organization the conference had eighty-five preachers, 144 churches, and 16,411 members. (See MONTANA for account of beginnings of Methodism in the state.)

Originally the work of the M.E. Church in Montana was administered as a mission and was centered almost exclusively in the southwest corner of the territory. Early leaders included Hugh Duncan, F. A. RIGGIN, J. A. Van Anda, and WILLIAM W. VAN ORSDER, who was known as "Brother Van." Montana with UTAH formed the ROCKY MOUNTAIN CONFERENCE in 1872, but in 1876 the body was divided to form the Montana and Utah Conferences. Four years later Montana was reduced to mission status again, and then in 1887 it became once more a conference.

Methodism was established in north Montana by Van Orsdel, who preached his first sermon at Fort Benton, June 30, 1872. Also, he conducted services among the Indians at the Blackfoot and Piegan Agency. In 1890 a 60,000 square mile section of north Montana became the Great Falls District of the Montana Conference with Van Orsdel as presiding elder. Under his leadership the work progressed. The mission had twenty-three preachers, thirty churches, and 1,191 members.

In 1900 the Kalispell Mission was founded in what was known as the Flathead Valley in northwest Montana. It had nine preachers, fourteen churches, and 584 members. In 1907 the Kalispell and North Montana Missions merged to form the North Montana Conference. In 1924 the North Montana and Montana Conferences merged to make the Montana State Conference which continued until unification in 1939.

Today the Montana Conference and the Presbyterian and Congregational churches of the state support ROCKY MOUNTAIN COLLEGE at Billings, the only Protestant institution of higher learning in Montana. Also, they maintain hospitals in Billings, Bozeman, and Great Falls, and a Children's Home at HELENA. The conference has a two-million dollar retirement home, Hillcrest Retirement Apartments, in Bozeman. A mission to the Blackfoot Indians has been maintained for many years at Browning on the Blackfoot Reservation.

The Montana Conference is part of the Denver Area of the Western Jurisdiction. In 1968 the conference reported 118 ministers, eighty pastoral charges, 26,831 church members, 16,865 church school pupils, and property valued at $11,252,500.

By action of the 1968 Western JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE, effective in June, 1969, the Big Horn Basin of WYOMING with seventeen churches was to be added to the Montana Conference and the name changed to Yellowstone Conference.

MONTANA CONFERENCE (EUB) brought together at its founding in 1948 two separate conferences of identical name but of different denominational affiliation prior to this date. The oldest of these conferences was the one belonging to the CHURCH OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST.

The congregation at Carlyle, Mont., is the mother church of the United Brethren in Christ in the Montana Conference. It originated in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Briley Douglas, who organized a Sunday school of eight members on May 6, 1907. On Sunday, July 25, 1909, C. W. Emerson completed the organization of the church itself. By 1919 the conference reported twenty-six organized United Brethren churches. Throughout the history of the conference, there have been sixty-five different pastors. The average length of pastorate has been two and one-half years. The rapid change in pastors was due to the low salaries and the smallness of the conference, which limited the opportunities for advancement.

At the time of uniting with the Montana Conference of THE EVANGELICAL CHURCH in 1948 there were nine organized congregations with a total property value of $113,300. There were seven ordained ministers and a total membership of 776 persons. Total money paid for all purposes was $35,627.

Evangelical work in MONTANA was started almost simultaneously by two separate conferences. In 1908, S. B. Dillow, presiding elder of the Platte River Conference (NEBRASKA) came to visit his brother near Broadview.

Bishop W. F. HEIL announced that the General Board of Missions of The UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH was ready to give support on that field. In the northwestern section of the state, two years later, Presiding Elder William Suckow preached in the home of his brother; and from that meeting there grew what later became known as the Inverness Mission of the Dakota Conference (EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION). H. A. Ritter was assigned to the field June 17, 1910.

The Montana Mission Conference was organized June 23, 1927, at Reedpoint, with John Oehlerking, presiding elder, and Bishop JOHN F. DUNLAP, Chairman. There were eight ministers; namely, H. S. Tool, W. C. Lasater, W. Isley, H. A. Thiele, N. A. Eller, E. C. Hicks, O. L. Peckenpau, and F. R. Witmer.

At the time of uniting with the Montana Conference of the United Brethren in 1948, there were fifteen organized congregations with total property value of $185,300, and fifteen ordained ministers.

The united conference covered the entire state of Montana, but with the small state population and the unfamiliarity of the population to The E.U.B. Church, the growth of the conference was quite small.

In 1967 membership amounted to 2,561 persons in twenty-three organized congregations. Total giving for all purposes was $232,493. Property was valued at $1,199,567. The conference owns its summer camp grounds.

With the formation of The United Methodist Church in 1968, most of the E.U.B. congregations refused to enter the union. Those that did vote to unite became a part of the Montana Conference of the former Methodist Church which was renamed the Yellowstone Conference.

MONTERO, Bolivia, is a small, growing town north of Santa Cruz, the center of an extensive and very rapid agricultural development. Considerable Methodist work is centered there. The Church of the Sower, organized in 1958, maintains four of the preaching places in outlying communities. This has been served by missionary pastors for some time.

Medical Work. Montero is a center for public-health work in a lowland jungle area of eastern Bolivia. Lack of medical facilities in the Montero area in 1955 gave concern; and two nurses, graduates of the American Clinic in La Paz, at first held daily clinics at the Rural Institute and made weekly visits to surrounding villages. In 1961 PARLO MONTE, Methodist missionary from ARGENTINA, took over the clinical medical work and was a pioneer in preventive medicine. James Alley, Methodist missionary and public-health doctor, who had received a Master of Public Health degree from Harvard in 1962, came in 1965.

In August of that year a census and health survey was taken in Montero, organized by Alley. Students from Wesley Seminary canvassed the homes of 11,150 persons. From the census were discovered such statistics as: fifty-five percent of the houses had mud floors; seventy percent did not have running water; thirty-three percent had no toilet facilities; more than half of the population was under twenty years of age; only 2,392 persons were reported having received any type of vaccination. Within a year more than 32,000 vaccinations had been given. The census showed a need for a basic public-health program with emphasis on nutrition, infectious diseases, and environmental sanitation.

Alley's work in preventive medicine has been oriented on a community rather than denominational basis. A public-health board composed of seven Roman Catholics and four Protestants has responsibility for administration of the local hospital (which the government had asked The Methodist Church to administer), the development of an educational program which includes a public-health workers' school (inaugurated in 1966 with twenty-eight students), and provision of extension service. Four health centers, located in the outlying four sectors of Montero, facilitate attendance by persons in all parts of the town.

The public-health project carried out its first campaign in November and December of 1965 by vaccinating 3,500 of the children of Montero against polio. Later there was a tuberculosis control program. Of about 12,000 persons tested, twenty-one percent showed positive reaction to the tuberculosis test.

RURAL INSTITUTE, MONTERO, BOLIVIA

A rehabilitation center is presently being planned for malnourished children. This will be a cooperative project between the Roman Catholic and Methodist Churches.

This health project in 1966 was serving some 18,000 persons living within five miles of Montero. By extending aid to the colonies located north of Montero, probably between 40,000 and 50,000 may be reached.

Rural Institute, a school and base for community development work in Santa Cruz Province of Bolivia, began in 1958 in Montero under a palm-thatched roof with six boys and one girl. About that time Aymara and Quechua Indians from the valleys of Cochabamba, and the high plains near La Paz began to pour into the area, and within eight years Montero grew from 3,000 to a busy city of 12,000 persons.

Methodist leaders foresaw this development and planned accordingly. In addition to the vocational high school which was established at the Rural Institute, medical work was started at Montero, and in 1963 a radio station was set up. A broad community development program in the zone of homesteading settlers became one of the central programs stemming out of the Rural Institute.

The institute provides secondary education for 180 boys and girls in a six-year vocational program. The school farm furnishes quality animals for distribution to local farmers. There are also programs of community development and public health. Close cooperation is maintained with government officials in the development of rural elementary education, and opportunities are provided for students to take part in agricultural extension activities. The real focus of the work on Montero is not on Montero itself, but on the pioneer communities and on the local congregations which have been established there.

Robert and Rosa Caufield and James and Evelyn Pace were pioneer missionaries in Montero area work.

MONTEVIDEO, Uruguay, situated on the Rio de la Plata at its mouth, is the capital and metropolis of the Republic of URUGUAY. The city is said to have been named for an explorer who saw, or thought he saw, a mountain on that part of the lower bay. ARGENTINA and BUENOS AIRES have traditionally been united by many ties with Uruguay and Montevideo, and these two countries were once a part of the Spanish vice-royalty of Rio de la Plata.

Argentina and Uruguay were put together first in the Eastern South American Conference of the M. E. Church, and then in the La Plata Conference of The Methodist Church in 1948. In 1954 the two conferences were separated and are today under their own respective names.

There are nine Methodist churches in the city, including Central Church, and other institutions such as CRANDON INSTITUTE, Evangelical Hospital, and GOODWILL INDUSTRIES.

Central Church is the principal Methodist congregation of Uruguay. In a profound sense, the history of Central Church is the history of Uruguayan Methodism. Earliest Methodist efforts resulted in the establishment of Central, and it has been the backbone of the church here ever since. It is sometimes called the Protestant Cathedral of Uruguay.

The first Methodist missionary to Uruguay, WILLIAM H. NORRIS, arrived Oct. 12, 1839, and was authorized to buy a lot and build a church to cost not more than $12,000, if the people of Montevideo would pay half. It took two years to get a building permit, and then only with the understanding that it would be for the worship of people from SWEDEN, England, and the United States, and as a school for their children.

Because of financial difficulties at home and a war between Uruguay and Argentina, the Board of Missions in New York recalled Norris in 1842. Efforts to reopen the mission failed until 1870, when JOHN FRANCIS THOMSON was sent to Uruguay from Argentina. Between the withdrawal of Norris and the arrival of Thomson, some work was carried on by laymen, and several missionaries visited the area. Thomson himself had made regular trips from Argentina from 1868 on, to conduct worship services in homes. Uruguayan Methodism considers that year as the date of the permanent establishment of its work.

The first contacts had been with foreign elements, but with the coming of Thomson the work in Spanish was emphasized. However, for many years an English-speaking congregation met with the Uruguayan group and used the same building. It was an important factor in the support of the work and in the construction of what is now Central Church.

The first building was a hall purchased on Dec. 2, 1869. Thomson remained as pastor until succeeded by THOMAS B. WOOD from Argentina in May 1877. In that year the first official board for Central Church was elected and the government recognized its baptismal certificates as legal documents.

In 1883 Wood bought land for a new church in what was called the new city (in contrast to the old city, once walled). The first section of the building there was completed in 1905. In 1910 JUAN E. GATTINONI (later bishop) became pastor. The present church building was constructed, and at its completion in 1913 it was one of the outstanding buildings in Uruguay. It is still the largest Protestant church in the country. The educational plant was completed in 1925.

Present pastors are Miguel A. Brun and Lawson Lee, who share equal responsibility for direction of the church under the group ministry plan. Other pastors in recent years have been ENRIQUE C. BALLOCH, 1921-32; Daniel Hall, 1933-45; CARLOS GATTINONI, 1946-57; and EMILIO CASTRO, 1958-65. These last two were elected Bishops in 1969, Gattinoni for the new autonomous church in Argentina; Castro for that in Uruguay.

Evangelical Hospital is operated by an interdenominational group with large Methodist participation. It is the only hospital of its kind in Uruguay. It was inaugurated Sept. 14, 1964, nearly thirty years after the movement to build it began. The hospital has forty beds on two floors to care for general surgery, traumatology, and maternity cases. It offers services in radiotherapy, physiotherapy, orthodontics and dentistry, and has a blood bank, most of whose donors are members of Evangelical churches. The hospital serves a large number of outpatients, many of whom are members of one of the several health insurance programs which the hospital offers.

The idea of erecting a hospital which would emphasize the Christian witness came from a group of members of The Methodist Church and was later supported by the Waldensian Church. Then other denominations came into the movement. Planning began in the 1930's under a Methodist physician, RAFAEL R. HILL.

The first offerings were collected through women's societies of the churches, and a person of humble social position left her small house as a legacy. This was the first sum of importance that the hospital received. Then a larger legacy made it possible to acquire the lot of 5,000 square meters where the hospital now is located. The cornerstone was laid on May 2, 1949, in a ceremony presided over by Methodist Bishop SANTE UBERTO BARRIEL.

The hospital has a high percentage of occupancy. Its evangelistic effort comes through daily contact with the sick (and those who accompany them) by the chaplain and hospital personnel. Those who make their first contact with the Christian faith here receive New Testaments, Bibles, and other Christian literature. On the teaching level, its mission is to prepare Christian technicians (doctors, nurses, and practical nurses) to do medical work where there was none, or where it had been poorly done.

Friendship House is a social center in the stockyards district. The work grew out of a tiny Sunday school in the home of a family named Sosa. Several missionaries of the WOMEN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY, including Elizabeth Hewett, director of Crandon Institute, and Stella Long, broadened the program to include English and cultural classes with occasional preaching services.

In 1918 ARTHUR F. WESLEY was appointed pastor of the church and director of the social center, which he called Pan-American Institute. The program was enlarged to include charity for the poor, recreation for young people, and day schools for the children. Six schools were set up, with a Sunday school in connection with each.

In December 1924, EARL M. SMITH was appointed pastor of the Cerro Church and director of the Pan-American Institute, which was soon renamed Friendship House. As public schools sprang up, the mission schools were discontinued and effort was redirected to Christian education and social services, including the GOODWILL INDUSTRIES and social casework. The program was enlarged to include a daily game room, sports, free public library, Boy Scouts, dramatics, camps, gymnastics, work camps, vacation Bible schools, and evening classes.

In 1953 a functional new Friendship House was built. Now under Uruguayan leadership, the institute carries on an enlarging religious, social and cultural program.

Goodwill Industries of Montevideo are the first Goodwill Industries outside the United States. The work was started on June 1, 1925, as a part of the social service program of Friendship House. There was no capital, but a room eight by twenty feet was available between Sundays. The Goodwill bags of used clothing and articles for repair were brought in first on pony-back, then on the platforms of street cars.

In 1931-32 Antonio Loureiro spent five months with E. L. HELMS in BOSTON, studying the operation of the mother Goodwill Industries. When he returned, he took over management of the Montevideo Goodwill Industries. A British company offered part of an abandoned packinghouse, greatly enlarging the quarters. An old truck was purchased, and Goodwill in Montevideo was on its way. A great boost was a stand in the National Industries Exposition of 1933, where 2,000 Goodwill bags were distributed, doubling the number of contributors. In 1950 a new truck was purchased. In 1966 it was still bringing in bags, though a second truck was hired frequently.

The 1953 Week of Dedication offering in the United States designated $50,000 to the Montevideo Goodwill Industries for a new building. This was completed and inaugurated in 1959. Thereafter Goodwill was separate organically from Friendship House.

At first the principal purpose of Goodwill in Montevideo was to alleviate suffering from the seasonal unemployment experienced each year in the meat-packing industry. Unemployment insurance and other social legislation has largely eliminated this evil. In recent years the purpose of the Goodwill Industries has changed to that common in the United States: work and wages for the physically and mentally handicapped.

About thirty persons now work in the Montevideo Goodwill Industries.

MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA, U.S.A. The first Methodist Society was formed in Montgomery in late 1828 or early 1829. The Society numbered ten people—nine women and one man. In 1970 there were 12,138 members of The United Methodist Church in Montgomery, seventeen church plants, one college (HUNTINGDON), with a total value of more than $10,000,000.

During the early years of the little village of Montgomery, so named in honor of General Richard Montgomery, worship services were conducted by circuit riders, many of whom were Methodists. James King of NORTH CAROLINA, a Methodist, came in 1819 and was the first minister to visit Montgomery. JAMES MELLARD arrived in 1821. Bishop ENOCH GEORGE of the M. E. Church came through Montgomery in January 1822, enroute to preside over the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE. He was invited to preach at the Court House, and inasmuch as this was the first visit of a high church dignitary, the entire town turned out to hear him.

Until 1825 the only house of worship was the Old Mills and Westcott Meeting House located about two miles from the village. In 1825 a church was completed on a lot provided by the Alabama Company, dealers in real estate. The frame building was forty-eight by twenty-four feet. It was called Union Church and Methodists used it along with members of other denominations. In 1832 the Alabama Company liquidated its assets. The Methodist church was given option to buy Union Church, but the congregation failed to raise the necessary funds. General John Scott, a member of Alabama Company, whose wife was a Methodist, bought the property for $500 at public auction and gave it to the Methodists. It was named Court Street M. E. Church, and the second session of the newly formed ALABAMA CONFERENCE was held in this church, with the opening service for the Conference on Dec. 11, 1833.

Montgomery became a station Dec. 17, 1829, when B. A. Houghton was appointed pastor by the Mississippi Conference. At the end of the Conference year 1832, S. B. Sawyer reported 237 members—110 white, 127 colored—for Court Street. In 1835 a larger building—sixty by forty-five feet—was dedicated under the pastorate of Henry W. Hilliard. This building served until 1853 when a large brick structure was erected. This building was dedicated March 3, 1856, by Bishop GEORGE F. PIERCE. The Negro members took the materials from the frame building and erected their own church on Holcombe Street. There are at the present time two Negro Methodist churches in Montgomery. They are Metropolitan Church and St. Paul Church with a total membership of 194.

(no longer in existence) was founded in 1858 by some members of Court Street. Dexter Avenue Church was founded in December 1886. J. P. Roberts was appointed as first pastor. Clayton Street Church, now Frazer Memorial, was formed in 1889, and a Mr. Howell, a local preacher, was placed in charge.

Perry Street Church, now St. Mark's, began with a union Sunday school in 1887, and became a Methodist congregation in 1893. Fifth Avenue, now Burge Memorial,

FIRST CHURCH, MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA

The Court Street Church served for a century until the property was sold in 1937 to the United States Government for $120,000. The congregation moved to Cloverdale Park, and became First Methodist Church of Montgomery. It presently reports a membership of 2,715.

In 1842 the M. P. Church of Montgomery was organized. A. A. Lipscomb was the first pastor, and the first building was dedicated in 1844. It was located on the corner of Bibb and Molton Streets, and the congregation worshipped at that location until a new building was erected in 1924. The new location was on Winona and Florida Streets, and the name became Capitol Heights M. P. Church. Among the ministers of this church was T. C. Casaday, who served as pastor for eighteen years. He was a delegate to the uniting conference which brought the three branches of Methodism together in 1939.

CHURCH EXTENSION was a concern of Methodists in Montgomery from the beginning. Herron Street Church resulted from the efforts of the Dexter Avenue congregation, and the first Quarterly Conference was held March 13, 1899. Forest Avenue resulted from action taken in a Quarterly Conference at Dexter Avenue in January of 1903. St. Luke organized 1938, St. James 1948, Dalraida 1949, Whitfield Memorial 1951, Normandale 1954, St. Paul 1954, Asbury 1954, Perry Hill 1956, and Boylston 1956.

At the present time there is a Montgomery District Board of Missions financed by regular annual income from each church. The primary purpose of this District Board is helping to establish and maintain new congregations of The United Methodist Church.

WILBUR LATIMER WALTON

MONTI, DANIEL PABLO (1902-), author and minister in ARGENTINA, was born in ITALY, the son of a shoemaker who was an elder in a Plymouth Brethren church. He was brought by his family to Argentina, arriving Jan. 1, 1905. Young Daniel learned to read and write and learned his father's trade, working for some time in a shoe factory that to this day belongs to the Monti family.

As a boy he began attending a nearby Methodist church and in time became a member. He entered the BUENOS AIRES Methodist Seminary and upon graduation entered the ministry of the Eastern South America Annual Conference. He has served several pastoral charges, including Bahía Blanca, Flores, Rosario Tala, and Liniers. He was a district superintendent for several periods.

Mr. Monti has been a student of the history of the churches in Latin America and has written several books. Among them: El pensamiento religioso de los hombres de Mayo (The Religious Thinking of the Men of May—meaning the Argentine patriots of 1810); Historia del Metodismo Rioplatense (History of River Plate Methodism, 1968); and Así brilla vuestra luz (a biography of CARMEN CHACON, a young lady pioneer in the educational work of The Methodist Church in Brazil). Among his other books are Edelweiss, Contrastes (children's tales); Entre cielo y cuchillas (Between Sky and Hills, a romance from the Argentine countryside); Sal de la tierra (Salt of the Earth); En la montaña del Maestro (On the Master's Mountain, studies on the Sermon on the Mount); and Voces del pasado (Voices of the Past, studies on the Hebrew prophets).

He married María de Carlo, daughter of a staunch Methodist layman. Two of the Montis' four children (Daniel E. and Emilio) are pastors in the Argentine Methodist Church. The second son, Pablo, is a medical doctor and has worked for more than ten years as a missionary doctor to BOLIVIA.

ST. JAMES CHURCH, MONTREAL

MONTREAL, Canada, St. James Street Church. At the beginning of the nineteenth century, Montreal was essentially a French community, dominated commercially and socially by an English minority, among whom the leading figures were the great fur traders. In this inhospitable environment Methodist services were held as early as 1802 by missionaries from the M. E. Church, who found in the city former Methodists from New York.

Despite their American background, these persons appeared to have favored Wesleyan Methodism, for as early as 1807 they asked THOMAS COKE for assistance. The War of 1812 completed their disenchantment with the American Church, and in 1815 they welcomed John Strong as a representative of the English Conference. Six years later, a new chapel was built on St. James Street, at the instance of Robert Lusher.

The first St. James Street Church was a classical building which would seat about 1,200 persons. The Society prospered under the direction of such men as Robert Alder, JOSEPH STINSON, William Harvard and MATTHEW RICHEY, all of whom achieved wide distinction in Canadian and British Methodism. By 1844 there were 770 members of the Society, and a new building was necessary. In 1845, a church which would seat 3,000 people was opened in the presence of the Governor-General, Lord Metcalfe. Matthew Richey preached at this first service.

For the succeeding forty years, the St. James Street congregation and its ministers exerted a powerful influence on the development of new Methodist congregations and educational institutions in Montreal. As in the past, it attracted some of the most outstanding Canadian Methodist orators, including WILLIAM BRIGGS, GEORGE DOUGLAS, and JOHN POTTS.

In the 1880's, confronted by great changes in the city, the St. James congregation bought a new site fronting on St. Catherine Street. The cornerstone of the building was laid in June 1887, by Senator James Ferrier, who had laid the stone of the former church. In June 1888, the last services were held in the old church; a year later the vast and imposing new St. James was opened.

Since 1888, St. James Church has continued in being, as a Methodist Church until 1925; and since that date, as a United Church congregation. Despite the gradual loss of its people to the suburbs, it has been a site of great preaching and of continuous missionary effort. In its life and its history are mingled the streams of American, English, and Canadian Methodism.

MOOD, FRANCIS ASBURY (1830-1884), American preacher and educator, was born in CHARLESTON, S. C., June 23, 1830. He was licensed to preach in 1849, and joined the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE and graduated from Charleston College the following year. In 1854 he organized a conference historical society; he made a tour of Europe in 1857. He served leading appointments and the presiding eldership, and was elected secretary of the conference. During the Civil War he served as chaplain in the Confederate hospitals in Charleston. At the close of the war, since the impoverished people could ill support him as presiding elder, he launched a weekly family newspaper, The Record, and also served as part-time pastor in a Unitarian church. In 1868 he was offered the presidency of Soule University, Chappell Hill, TEXAS, a struggling institution which he soon decided must be superseded by a stronger one in a better location. Mood drew up a statesmanlike proposal for a central university for the whole of Texas Methodism, and personally persuaded each of the five Texas conferences to adopt it in 1869. It was 1874 before the new institution opened its doors on October 6, with thirty-three students, under the title of The Texas University. In 1876 the state legislature insisted that the name Texas University be used only by a state institution, and so the Methodist school became SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY. Because it is the successor to several earlier schools it can rightfully claim to be the oldest university in the state. Mood served as regent for twelve years. In 1881 he was appointed as a delegate to the first ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE, held in LONDON, where he gave an address on "The Higher Education Demanded by the Necessities of the Church in Our Time." He died on Nov. 12, 1884, at Waco, following the session of his annual conference there.

WALTER N. VERNON

MOODY, GRANVILLE (1812-1887), versatile American preacher and colorful soldier, was born at Portland, Maine, Jan. 2, 1812, the son of William Moody. An ancestor, William Moody, was a native of SCOTLAND and settled in Plymouth Colony in 1632. Granville's father, a graduate of Dartmouth College in 1798, moved to BALTIMORE when Granville was four, and became the principal of the first female seminary in Baltimore in 1816. Educated at Baltimore, Granville became a clerk in his brother's store in Norwich, Ohio in 1831, and was licensed to preach in the M. E. Church on June 15, 1833. Received into the OHIO CONFERENCE, he held various appointments in the state. In 1860 he was pastor of Morris Chapel in CINCINNATI.

At the outbreak of the Civil War, he was invited to take command of the 74th Ohio regiment, receiving the cordial approval of his colleagues who called it providential. He resigned his pastorate and entered the military services. He had a burning zeal for the Union and served until May 16, 1863, when illness forced him to resign. Colonel Moody, as he was called, assisted the regimental chaplain and preached often, baptizing nine soldiers one evening.

By Moody's bravery at Stones River he won the title, "the fighting parson." A colorful and gallant colonel, he was struck four times with bullets. His own horse was shot, but he refused to leave the field. On recommendation of the Secretary of War, the U. S. Senate conferred upon him the rank of brigadier general, by brevet, March 13, 1865, for distinguished services at the Stones River Battle.

Moody was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of his Church in 1864. After his retirement from the Army, he became an itinerant again and served with acceptance in various localities until 1882, when ill health caused him to take the supernumerary relation. Moving to his farm near Jefferson, Ohio, he resided there until his death on June 4, 1887, which was caused by an accident while he was on his way to preach a memorial sermon before a part of the Grand Army of the Republic at Jefferson.

MOORE, ARTHUR JAMES (1888-), American bishop, evangelist and long-time president of the Board of

ARTHUR J. MOORE

Missions of The Methodist Church, was born at Argyle, Ga., on Dec. 26, 1888, the son of John Spencer and Emma Victoria (Cason) Moore. His great grandfather early moved to GEORGIA, and his grandfather, a Confederate soldier, was killed in the battle of Gaines Mill, 1862.

Arthur Moore was a student at Emory College, Oxford, Ga., for a time, but was converted in his twenty-first year and began to preach at once. He subsequently received the following educational degrees: from EMORY UNIVERSITY, D.D., 1934; CENTRAL COLLEGE, Fayette, Mo., D.D., 1924; ASBURY COLLEGE, Wilmore, Ky., D.D., 1922; FLORIDA SOUTHERN COLLEGE, LL.D., 1942; RANDOLPH-MACON, LL.D., 1939; SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, Georgetown, Texas, LL.D., 1935; and Mercer University, LL.D., 1968.

He was married to Mattie T. McDonald of Waycross, Ga., on April 26, 1906. Their children are the Rev. William Harry, Wilbur Wardlaw, Dorothy Emma (deceased), Arthur James, Jr. (the present editor of World Outlook), and Evelyn Moore Means. Mrs. Moore died in 1964.

He entered the SOUTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, South in 1909, was ordained deacon in 1912, and elder in 1914. He was a general evangelist for eight years, 1912-20; and then became minister of Travis Park Methodist Church, SAN ANTONIO, Texas, 1920-26; and of First Church, BIRMINGHAM, Ala., 1926-30. He was elected bishop by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, South, on May 20, 1930, and assigned to the Pacific Coast Area, which he served until 1934. From 1934 until 1940 he was the bishop in charge of missionary activities of the Methodist Church in CHINA, JAPAN, CZECHOSLOVAKIA, BELGIUM and Belgian CONGO, POLAND, and KOREA. ("I have three continents to supervise," he remarked genially.) He was then assigned to the ATLANTA Area in 1940 by the Southeastern JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church. From 1952-54, he also supervised the GENEVA (Switzerland) Area with Conferences in Central Europe and North Africa.

In 1937 Bishop Moore led a "Bishop's Crusade" which rekindled missionary spirit and cleared the Mission Board (MES) of $7,000,000 debt. He was given a certificate of honor by the Chinese Government in 1938 in recognition of distinguished service rendered the Chinese nation in the field of human relief. At the 1952 General Conference he was presented the Korean National Medal of Honor from President SYNGMAN RHEE in recognition of his service to the people of Korea. He delivered the FONDREN Lectures at SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY in 1953, and the Jarrell Lectures, Emory University, 1945.

Since 1945, Bishop Moore has been sent by the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS on five emergency missions to disturbed areas of the world: Korea, 1946; Europe, 1948; the Orient, MALAYA, BORNEO and BURMA, 1949-50; Korea, 1951; GERMANY, 1953. He represented The Methodist Church at the Centennial of Methodism in INDIA in 1956.

In 1941 he was interim president of WESLEYAN COLLEGE, Macon, Ga. From 1934-39 he was a member on the committee of Interdenominational Relations and Church Union. He was president of the Council of Bishops of The Methodist Church, 1951-52. Bishop Moore also served as a member of the COORDINATING COUNCIL, the Board of Social and Economic Relations, the METHODIST COMMITTEE FOR OVERSEAS RELIEF, and the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL.

He is or has been a trustee of Emory University, PAINE COLLEGE, Wesleyan College, Andrew College, YOUNG HARRIS COLLEGE, AMERICAN UNIVERSITY, LA GRANGE COLLEGE, GAMMON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, CLARK COLLEGE, REINHARDT COLLEGE, SCARRITT COLLEGE, Warren Candler Hospital (SAVANNAH, Ga.), and the LAKE JUNALUSKA, N. C., Methodist Assembly. He was chairman of the Southeastern Jurisdictional Council of The Methodist Church, 1940-60. In 1940 he became president of the Board of Missions of The Methodist Church in which commanding position he served until 1960—during the war and post-war years of that period.

Bishop Moore is the author of The Sound of the Trumpets, 1934; Central Certainties, 1943; Christ After Chaos, 1944; Christ and Our Country, 1945; The Mighty Savior, 1952; Immortal Tidings in Mortal Hands, 1953; and Fight On! Fear Not, 1962.

He retired as an active bishop in 1960, but at once took up again the status of a church-wide evangelist, and continues traveling and preaching widely over the whole connection. He has a residence in Atlanta, and also one on St. Simons Island, Ga.

MOORE, DAVID HASTINGS (1838-1915). American bishop, was born at Athens, Ohio, Sept. 4, 1838. A son of Congressman Eliakim Hastings Moore, David Moore was graduated from Ohio University in 1860, A.B.; A.M., 1863; honorary D.D. and LL.D. He united with the OHIO CONFERENCE in 1860, having been converted in 1855.

He was Lieutenant-Colonel of the 125th Regiment, Ohio Volunteer Infantry, in the Civil War, a regiment which was dubbed the "Ohio Tigers" by General Thomas of Chickamauga. Having been wounded, Moore returned to civilian life broken in health.

His appointments (all in Ohio) were: Second Street, Zanesville, 1855-68; St. Paul's, Delaware, 1868-70; Wesley Chapel, Columbus, 1870-72; Trinity, Cincinnati, 1872-75; and president of the Cincinnati Wesleyan Female Seminary, 1875-80.

He followed EARL CRANSTON to COLORADO to become president of Colorado Seminary and one of the founders and first Chancellor of the UNIVERSITY OF DENVER, 1880-

89. His labors there are among the treasures of the ROCKY MOUNTAIN CONFERENCE's traditions. His genius for friendship was a short cut to the hearts of the plainmen and mountaineers and this made him and the young university a power. He rode the buckboards and stages, bumping through canyons of Colorado and WYOMING, a builder of a civilization of strong western men.

Moore became editor of the Western Christian Advocate, 1889-1900, and his editorials rang clear and strong. He championed the rights of women regarding membership in the GENERAL CONFERENCE and the rights of the FREEDMEN. There was never "a dull line" where David Moore's pen had wrought.

Moore was elected bishop in 1900 and assigned to CHINA, JAPAN and KOREA for four years, and that was at the time of the Boxer uprising. He wrote a vivid description of the war between Japan and RUSSIA. In 1915 he wrote the life of Bishop JOHN MORGAN WALDEN. His other episcopal areas were: PORTLAND, Ore., 1904-08; CINCINNATI, 1908-12, when he retired.

On June 21, 1860, Moore married Julia Sophia Carpenter of Athens, Ohio. She died in 1911, leaving six children. Bishop Moore died on a train going to Cincinnati, Nov. 23, 1915. His body was laid to rest in the quiet churchyard at Athens.

A man of great strength of character, David Hastings Moore had a vivid imagination, a rich and copious vocabulary, and an analytic and synthetic mind. He was an example of outspoken loyalty to his principles, his friends and his fellowmen around the world.

HENRY MOORE

MOORE, HENRY (1751-1844), British Methodist, was born near DUBLIN on Dec. 21, 1751. He entered the Methodist itinerancy in 1779. In 1787 he and his wife suffered at the hands of a mob when he was attempting to hold an open-air service in Dublin. On or near this very site was erected thirty-four years later the first Abbey Street Methodist Church, the site of the Dublin Central Mission. Moore was a close friend of JOHN WESLEY, who on Feb. 27, 1789, ordained him "a presbyter in the Church of God," the second man to be ordained for the English work. Wesley made him one of the three custodians of his manuscripts, and with THOMAS COKE he produced in 1792 a Life of the Rev. John Wesley. Moore was involved in the controversy over the administration of the SACRAMENTS by the itinerants in BRISTOL in 1794; he opposed the concessions made to the laity in 1797. He was elected President of the Wesleyan Conference in 1804, and again in 1823. He published A Discourse . . . Romans (1815); Thoughts on the Eternal Sonship (1817), a reply to ADAM CLARKE; a two volume Life of the Rev. John Wesley (1824-25); the first part of an Autobiography, with Sermons, etc. (1830). He died on April 27, 1844.

MOORE, JOHN H. (? -1957), American minister and nineteenth bishop of the C.M.E. CHURCH, was born in ALABAMA. He was educated at RUST COLLEGE in Holly Springs, Miss. Bishop Moore served as pastor and presiding elder and was elected General Secretary of Missions in 1914. During his episcopacy, he was known as a preacher, fund raiser, and church builder. He had a strong interest in missions and helped establish a mission in the BRITISH WEST INDIES. He died on Jan. 27, 1957.

MOORE, JOHN JAMISON (1818-1883), American bishop of the A.M.E. ZION CHURCH was born in Berkeley County, W. Va., of slave parents, about the year 1818. His mother was born free, but at the age fifteen years was kidnapped in MARYLAND and sold into slavery in WEST VIRGINIA, where she married John's father, a slave. Her maiden name was Reidoubt and her husband's name was Hodge, but a change of owners caused him to adopt the name of Moore. When John Moore was six years old his parents, by the advice and assistance of friendly Quakers, attempted a flight from slavery with their six children, of whom the future bishop was the youngest. They were recaptured, however, and the oldest four children were sold South. A second attempt to gain their liberty was successful, and the parents, with their remaining two children, after many hardships and sufferings, reached Bedford County, Pa. Here a friendly farmer gave them employment and the two boys, William and John, were bound out for a term to his son, also a farmer. Owing to the pursuit of their former owner, the parents were obliged to leave the settlement, but John remained secure on the farm. He was taught to read and write by his employer, and acquired a knowledge of farming. The last part of his apprenticeship was served to a brother-in-law of his former master, who exacted six months over the proper time, and did not furnish the schooling or clothes and the cash he required by law after the expiration of the term.

After leaving his ungenerous master, he worked for six months for a farmer in the settlement at seven dollars per month. Having saved about fifteen dollars, he concluded to visit Harrisburg, and walked the 106 miles to that place in two days. In 1833 he became religiously impressed and experienced a change of heart. Leaving Harrisburg he visited his old home in the mountains where he remained some time, having obtained employment as a porter in a store. He was licensed as an exhorter on returning to Harrisburg in 1834 and a year later received his license to preach. He joined the Philadelphia Conference (AMEZ) in 1839. John Jamison Moore was one of the great pioneering circuit riders of his denomination, serving not only in PENNSYLVANIA and OHIO but going as far west as SAN FRANCISCO, where he established a Zion Church. He was elevated to the bishopric in 1868 and died in 1883.

DAVID H. BRADLEY

MOORE, JOHN MONROE (1867-1948), strong and able bishop in The Methodist Church and leader in the unification of American Methodism, was born in Morgantown, Ky., Jan. 27, 1867.

The son of Joseph A. and Martha Ann Hampton Moore, he was of Virginian and English ancestry. Phases of his life included the pastorate, church journalism, education, missions, episcopal leadership and administration, as well as authorship of books, especially on Methodism.

There were early years of ample and painstaking preparation, including the Morgantown, Ky., public schools; Lebanon University, Ohio; Yale University; Leipzig and Heidelberg, Germany. Yale University conferred on him the Ph.D. degree (1895) and also the honorary D.D. degree; WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY at Middletown, Conn., the Litt.D. (1935); SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY, the LL.D. degree (1938); Central College in Arkansas a D.D. (1908), and SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY at Georgetown, Texas, a LL.D. (1928).

Moore's pastoral work began when he was licensed to preach in 1887 by the M.E. Church, South, ordained DEACON (1894), ELDER (1898). His pastorates included Marvin Church, St. Louis, Mo. (1895-1898); Travis Park, SAN ANTONIO, Texas, (1898-1902); First Methodist, DALLAS (1902-1906). He was pastor of St. John's Church, St. Louis (1909-1910); Secretary of Home Missions of the M.E. Church, South, Nashville, Tenn. (1910-1918). He was elected bishop at the 1918 GENERAL CONFERENCE of his church. While pastor of the church in San Antonio, he was married to Miss Bessie Harris of that city.

When he was elected bishop on May 14, 1918, he was assigned to work in BRAZIL (1918-1922), following which he was in charge of conferences in OKLAHOMA and the east half of TEXAS (1922-1926); in charge of the west half of Texas and NEW MEXICO (1926-1930); GEORGIA and FLORIDA (1930-1934); MISSOURI and ARKANSAS (1934-1938). He was officially retired in 1938.

Besides his episcopal duties, Bishop Moore had various other responsibilities, such as Chairman of the General Board of MISSIONS; Editor of the Nashville Christian Advocate (1906-1909); member of the Joint Hymnal Commission to prepare the Methodist Hymnal (1904-1906); and also twenty-five years later a member again of the Joint Hymnal Commission (1931-1934). He was a member of the Joint Committee on Unification, composed of representatives of the M.E. Church, the M.E. Church, South, and the M.P. Church. Upon the death of Bishop MOUTZON, he became chairman of the M.E. Church, South representatives. He was a member of the World Conference on Faith and Order held at Lausanne, and the one held at Edinburgh (1937); and was a member of the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE held at Atlanta, Ga. in 1931.

Bishop Moore was Chairman of the Department of Schools and Colleges of the M.E. Church, South (1934-1938); and Chairman of the Board of Trustees of Southern Methodist University (1932-1938). He endowed a Chair for a Traveling Fellowship for graduates of the School of Theology of the university.

He was author of the following books: Etchings of the East (1909); The South Today (1916); Brazil: An Introductory Study (1920); Making the World Christian (1922); The Long Road to Methodist Union (1943); Methodism in Belief and Action (1946).

Perhaps his most noteworthy contribution to Methodist history was his constructive work on the Unification Commission. He with Bishop E. H. HUGHES of the M.E. Church, and Bishop JAMES H. STRAUGHN of the M.P. Church, formed the great triumvirate of leaders as this momentous work came to completion.

He died Aug. 1, 1948, in Dallas, Texas, and was buried there.

JOHN Z. MOORE

MOORE, JOHN ZACHARIAH, II (1874-1963), American missionary to KOREA, was born in PITTSBURGH, Pa., Jan. 8, 1874. Son and grandson of Methodist ministers, he alternatively taught school and attended Scio College in eastern Ohio, and then entered DREW SEMINARY where he graduated in 1903.

With characteristic zeal he was on his way to Korea and even being ordained by Bishop DAVID H. MOORE in SEOUL before commencement time. His entire missionary career was centered in north Korea at Pyongyang, so that he could call most of the Methodist leaders from north Korea his "boys." At various times he had been presiding elder over all the work of his mission in north Korea and had founded scores of churches and primary schools as well as two high schools and two Bible schools.

He was a most effective speaker in the Korean language as well as English. His talks were filled with anecdotes and stories gleaned from his reading, especially of WESLEY, Lincoln, and Theodore Roosevelt. He was also a prolific writer about Korea, publishing numerous articles in magazines and newspapers. During forty years' work in either America or in Korea, he helped raise approximately half a million dollars for the work.

He was cited by the Japanese government in 1925 for his efforts in promoting educational work, and later by the Korean government for his distinguished missionary service. He died in LOS ANGELES, Calif., Aug. 6, 1963. Inurnment was at Richland Cemetery, near St. Clairsville, Ohio, the scene of his boyhood and youth.

CHARLES A. SAUER

MOORE, MORRIS MARCELLUS (1856-1900), American bishop of the A.M.E. CHURCH, was born in Quincy, Fla., on Nov. 15, 1856. His education was self-acquired. He was converted in 1861, licensed in 1876, and admitted into the Florida Annual Conference of the A.M.E. Church in 1878. He was ordained DEACON in 1880 and ELDER in 1881. He held pastorates from 1881 to 1896, and the General Office of Financial Secretary, 1896-1900. In 1900 he was elected bishop. He died in 1900 without ever having held an annual conference.

THOMAS A. MOORE

MOORE, THOMAS ALBERT (1860-1940), Canadian Methodist and United Church of Canada minister, was born in Acton, Canada, West, June 29, 1860. He was educated at Acton public school, Georgetown Academy, and McGill University. In 1884, he was ordained in the Methodist ministry.

Although he was a highly successful preacher, he had also great administrative ability and a very keen interest in social and moral reform. For several years he was secretary and general secretary of the Ontario Lord's Day Alliance; he was president from 1910 to 1921. In the same years he took an active part in the work of the Ontario Temperance Federation.

From 1914 to 1925, Moore was secretary of the Joint Committee on Church Union, in which post he contributed substantially to the formation of The United Church of Canada (see CANADA). Thus, he became the first general secretary of the new church, and continued in office until 1936. One of his successors has said that "during the critical and formative time just after Church Union, he did much to shape and fashion the whole legal and administrative structure of our Church's life. . . . But he was more than a detached executive officer. He was guide, philosopher and friend, to ministers and laymen throughout the whole connexion." (Hamilton Conference, Proceedings.)

In recognition of his great work, Thomas A. Moore was elected Moderator in 1932. He served also on the Ecumenical Methodist Committee, as a member of the World Conference on Faith and Order, and president of the Canadian Brotherhood Federation. Among the honors he received were a D.D. from Wesley College, and an LL.D. from MOUNT ALLISON UNIVERSITY.

After his retirement, Moore devoted himself unceasingly to his first love—preaching. Unfortunately he was stricken with heart disease, and after 1938 had to desist from this work. He died in Toronto, March 31, 1940, and was buried in Acton cemetery.

MOORE, WALTER HARVEY (1886-1961), American preacher and missionary to BRAZIL, was born in Foster, Ky., Oct. 18, 1886. He received his B.A. in science and letters and a B.D. from Wesleyan College, Winchester, Ky.; and a second B.D. from CANDLER SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY. He married Nell Proffitt, a teacher, on June 30, 1919, and they went to Brazil as missionaries that year. His first appointment was to INSTITUTO GRANBERY, JUIZ DE FÓRA, state of Minas Gerais. He was ordained DEACON in September 1920, by Bishop JOHN M. MOORE. In 1922, he was named Reitor (principal) of Granbery Institute, beginning thus a career that made him one of the most loved and influential citizens of the city. He remodeled the establishment, and in the year of the catastrophic flood in Juiz de Fóra, he took a leading part in the work of helping its victims, sheltering them in the school.

He next spent several years away from Granbery, directing the Methodist seminary near SÃO PAULO City, during what was a most difficult period in that institution's life. When he returned to Granbery in 1951, many Roman Catholic leaders were among those who met and honored him. He remained there until retirement in 1956, when he was highly honored by the community. A street was named for him and the city council of Juiz de Fóra declared him an honorary citizen. After his return he travelled to Washington, where he was decorated, at the request of Brazilian friends, with the Order of the Southern Cross, at the Brazilian Embassy (1957).

Active, energetic, consecrated, his life was one of constant service, of purity, and of love for his neighbor. To the vigor of his personality, he added the noble qualities of a magnanimous heart and a fine Christian spirit. That was one of the tributes paid to Walter Moore.

He died suddenly on July 17, 1961. His wife died in 1963. Their two children are Emeline Koppel and Walter Harvey, Jr., a sculptor in Washington.

MORADABAD ANNUAL CONFERENCE is a conference of INDIA with five districts, covering the area of about 4,000 square miles. There is a population of approximately 3,000,000, and the Christian population of the whole conference is 53,835.

The conference was organized in 1958, when the North India Conference was divided. Its districts are Bijnor, Chandausi, Garhwal, Moradabad, and Rampur.

Moradabad, the city, has a population of about 180,100. The Parker Intermediate College (enrollment, 844), the Methodist Girls Higher Secondary School (enrollment, about 600), and the Titus Elementary School (enrollment, 400), are located here, each with a hostel for Christian students. There are two self-supporting churches in the city.

Pauri is the headquarters of the Garhwal civil and ecclesiastical district. The Messmore Intermediate College is located here. It has recently become coeducational. The enrollment is about 900. Two miles away from the college is the Mary Ensign Gill coeducational primary and junior high school with 156 students.

Pauri is in the Himalayan Mountains, elevation 5,390 feet. Garhwal District borders on NEPAL and was a part of Nepal until ceded to British India in 1817. It was one of the earliest appointments of JAMES MILLS THOBURN, who years later became the first Methodist bishop in India.

MORAVIANS. The ultimate ancestors of the eighteenth-century Moravians were the Bohemian Brethren of the fifteenth century, advocates of a simplified Christianity, who eventually aligned themselves with the Protestant Reformation. Most of them were expelled from Bohemia and Moravia in 1621. In 1722 Moravian and other refugees (some of them of Brethren descent) settled at HERRNHUT under the patronage of Count ZINZENDORF. Zinzendorf developed the group into a complete religious and civil community, at first as a Pietist Lutheran society within which men of different churches could live. (He himself was both a Lutheran minister from 1734, and a Moravian bishop from 1737.) Pressure of circumstances led to the development of a separate church which in some respects was a revival of the Bohemian past. The society ideal persisted for years, however, and perhaps hindered the Moravian influence, although they quickly developed overseas Moravian activity. In general, Moravianism marks a further development of the Pietist type of Lutheranism begun by Spener and Francke in seventeenth-century GERMANY to an emphasis on conversion, and a personal religious experience centered (sometimes excessively) on a childlike devotion to Christ and his passion.

Within post-Reformation Protestantism as a whole, Moravianism represents a kind of domestic Protestant monasticism. The community was divided into "choirs" organized according to sex, age, and marital status, with a variety of unusual means of GRACE, under a patriarchal discipline. In England, Moravianism was one element in the many-sided Evangelical Revival, and for a time promised to have a wide influence—e.g. through societies taken over from BENJAMIN INGHAM in Yorkshire and from JOHN CENNICK in the west in the 1740's. They were probably hindered by vacillations in Zinzendorf's policy and by overcentralization. In 1749 they achieved Parliamentary recognition as an episcopal church; and in 1755 were organized as the English province of Moravianism.

JOHN WESLEY first met Moravians on the way to GEORGIA in 1735; from them he learned about JUSTIFICATION and conversion which helped toward his conversion of 1738; he visited Herrnhut in the same year. But in 1740 he and his followers broke with the Moravians, and disagreement was sharpened by literary controversy and the bad reputation of the Moravians for emotional excesses in the 1740's. An attempt at Methodist-Moravian unity in 1785-86 by THOMAS COKE proved abortive. The original break was precipitated in some cases by the "stillness" doctrine of the Moravians (i.e., the belief that the use of the means of grace erodes justification by faith alone), and aggravated, it is alleged, by the conflicting ambitions of John Wesley and Zinzendorf as religious leaders. There were, however, clear doctrinal differences. Wesley accused the Moravians of dwelling exclusively on the doctrine of justification, neglecting the law and zeal for SANCTIFICATION. The Moravians accused Wesley of "having mixed the works of the law with the gospel as means of grace" (quoted in Renham, Memoirs of James Hutton, 1856, p. 47). A conversation of 1741 between Wesley and Zinzendorf makes clear the latter's Lutheran views, which underlay the controversy; he maintained that perfection along with justification was "imputed" in Christ once for all; no actual and growing perfection in men is possible.

Methodism owed a good deal to the Moravians; the initial rediscovery of justification, conversion, and ASSURANCE, some devices for the cultivation of religious experience, e.g. LOVE FEASTS and WATCH NIGHTS. Yet equally important and distinctive Methodist institutions (societies, covenant services, field preaching) came from other sources. Nor was the "monastic" organization of Herrnhut and the English Fulneck settlement ever a feature of Methodism. In its methods of extensive itinerant evangelism, and the rapid spread of self-supporting yet connected societies, English Methodism's development was strongly contrasted with the eventual stagnation of English Moravianism.

MORE, HANNAH (1745-1833), the famous evangelical Anglican writer, was born at Stapleton in Gloucestershire, the fourth of five daughters of Jacob More, who came from a Norfolk family. Removing to LONDON in her late twenties (circa 1773), she became associated with the literary world there, and was fascinated especially by the theatre. She came under the influence of David Garrick, as is shown by her letters to her family.

The pattern of her life began to change about 1785, owing to the possession of a "growing conviction of the unsatisfactoriness of all enjoyments which are not in accordance with scripture, and in unison with prayer." In consequence, she was responsible from 1789 for the establishment of schools for the poor at Cheddar, and other villages in Somerset, where there were soon three hundred children under her care. In this she followed the work of ROBERT RAIKES, but went beyond the pioneer in her concern that the newly literate should have worthwhile reading matter. This led to her writing a series of "Cheap Repository Tracts," the first of which was entitled Village Politics. The tracts came out at the rate of three each month and contained stories, ballads, and Sunday readings written in a popular style. Two million were produced in the first year; and they were vigorously attacked, one writer urging that her writings should be burned. In part the message of her tracts was that Englishmen should not follow the example of the French Revolution.

In 1802 she moved to Barley Wood, and now began the period of her writing of books: Hints Towards Forming the Character of a Young Princess (1805), Coclebs in Search of a Wife (1809), Practical Piety, and Christian Morals (1811). A biographer regarded her as an accomplished conversationalist. Her religion was moral in character, and she had a dislike of controversy. She had no particular contact with English Methodism, but was an example of the powerful Anglican Evangelical world which formed another contributing stream to the whole Evangelical Revival of the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries.

MORELAND, JESSE EARL (1897-), American missionary and college president, was born at Commerce, Texas, on Oct. 2, 1897, the son of Royal Bert and Mary Emma (Long) Moreland. He received his A.B. degree from SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY in 1918; the A.M. in 1921; the L.H.D. causa honoris in 1950. He did post-graduate work at Peabody College, Nashville, Tenn., in 1927. Other honorary degrees which came to him were the LL.D. from MORRIS HARVEY COLLEGE, 1941; from EMORY AND HENRY COLLEGE in 1942; from the UNIVERSITY OF CHATTANOOGA in 1955; and from the University of Richmond in 1964. The PORTO ALEGRE COLLEGE in BRAZIL recorded him Dr. Humanidades in 1948.

His wife was Helen Elizabeth HARDY and they married on Nov. 18, 1924. Their children were Jane Long (Mrs. Ben Vaughan Branscomb); Helen (Mrs. Clare Cotton, Jr.); Mary (Mrs. Thomas Ellison Smith); and Frances (Mrs. Lawrence Fossett).

Dr. Moreland went as educational missionary to Porto Alegre College, Brazil, 1921-22; was professor and vice-president there, 1922-26; and president from 1927-34. Then he returned to America and became the vice-president of SCARRITT COLLEGE, 1936-39. In 1939 he was elected president of RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE in Ashland, Va., and in that capacity served until his retirement in 1967.

Dr. Moreland has been a member of the Southeastern JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church, 1940, '44, '48, '52, '60, and '64; a member of the General BOARD OF EDUCATION of that Church and a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1944, '52, '56, '60, and '64. He was a member of the first Assembly of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in Amsterdam, 1948; of the second and third Assemblies at EVANSTON, Illinois, 1954, and in

NEW DELHI, India, 1961; a member of the Central Committee of the World Council of Churches, 1948-54. He was also a member of the Executive Committee of the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES of Christ in America, 1940-50, and a member of the first organizational meeting of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES which supplanted that organization. He has been president of the National Association of Schools and Colleges of The Methodist Church and was the recipient of the St. GEORGE'S Award, 1962. Also he received the Virginia Award from the National Conference of Christians and Jews, 1966. As a trustee he has been on the Board of PHILANDER SMITH COLLEGE, BENNETT COLLEGE, PENNINGTON SCHOOL; is a member of various academic and learned societies, and has served as a Director of the Hanover National Bank, Ashland, since 1961. Upon retirement in 1967, he continued to live in Ashland, Va.

MORELOCK, GEORGE L. (1880-1967), the first General Secretary of the BOARD OF LAY ACTIVITIES of The Methodist Church after church union, was born in Franklin, Tenn., on Jan. 8, 1880, the son of William L. and Tennessee Adeline (Jackson) Morelock. He married Ruth Murphy on June 6, 1906, and their children are Mrs. W. A. Jenkins, Elizabeth, and George L., Jr. He was educated at the University of the South (Sewanee), receiving the A.B. degree in 1913, and did graduate study at Stanford University, 1913-14. MILLSAPS COLLEGE gave him the LL.D. degree in 1937.

When the General Board of Lay Activities of the M. E. Church, South, organized in 1922, he became its first General Secretary, serving in that capacity until 1940 when he became Executive Secretary for the entire reunited Church. He was a member of the Uniting Conference in 1939 and of the JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE of 1940. He served on the BOARD OF EVANGELISM of The Methodist Church and on the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES of Christ for some years. He was delegate to the Oxford World Conference on Life and Work in 1937, and a visitor of Lay Work to CZECHOSLOVAKIA, to BELGIUM, BRAZIL and ARGENTINA in 1937. He wrote A Steward in The Methodist Church; The Board of Stewards; The Way to Spiritual Life; The Ideal Layman; and several other pamphlets in the same field. He retired in 1948 as General Secretary, and made his home thereafter in Miami, Fla. He died in Miami on Aug. 21, 1967.

MORETON, ROBERT HAWKEY (1844-1917), British minister and missionary, was born in BUENOS AIRES, ARGENTINA, Jan. 10, 1844, son of Robert Moreton, who had emigrated from Cornwall, England, some time before 1830. The family returned to England in 1861, to avoid military service for Robert Hawkey, and settled in Helston, Cornwall. Robert Hawkey began to study medicine at St. Bartholemew's, LONDON, but hearing a call to the ministry he entered Richmond College, London, in 1864, and after three years there was appointed first to Helston, and then to St. Colomb, Isles of Scilly, where he met his future wife, Agnes Banfield. In 1870 his offer for overseas service was at first not accepted, but later that year, in November, the Wesleyan METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY invited him to take up work in PORTUGAL because of his knowledge of Spanish, which he had already used in tract distributing work among Spanish sailors in the Thames side docks.

He arrived in Oporto, Portugal, on Feb. 16, 1871, with his bride whom he had married three weeks before. Here he ministered until his death in 1917, forty-three years in the active ministry and three years as a supernumerary minister. He knew what it was in the early days to suffer persecution at the hands of the populace, at times arriving home from some attempt at preaching "covered with mud," but he outlived this phase and became much respected and esteemed. Through the years his gifts as preacher, teacher, administrator and organizer were well exercised. His Methodism was of the classic variety; he built on the basis of the CLASS MEETING, and only admitted into membership after due, and sometimes lengthy, trial of each candidate; CLASS TICKETS in his own meticulous hand date from the first year of his ministry in Portugal. His preaching and pursuit of CHRISTIAN PERFECTION attracted many, including some devout Roman Catholics who were looking for the same way.

He translated a number of hymns into Portuguese and shared in the compilation of a succession of hymnaries; he introduced the tonic-sol-fa system of music into Portugal. He also translated some popular, and semi-polemical works, such as The Convent Unmasked by an ex-nun, Edith O'Gorman, and Priest, Woman and Confessional, by an ex-priest Chiniquy. He wrote several articles and treatises of a controversial nature. For four years he edited and produced the weekly, A Reforma. His son Robert was for some years secretary of the BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY in Lisbon, and a grandson was a Methodist minister, dying in World War II. Robert Hawkey Moreton is buried, with his wife, in the British Cemetery of St. James, Oporto.

ALBERT ASPEY

MORGAN, JAMES HENRY (1857-1939), American minister and educator, was born near Concord, Del., Jan. 21, 1857. He was educated at Rugby Academy and DICKINSON COLLEGE, Carlisle, Pa. (A.B., 1878). He taught at Pennington Seminary and Rugby Academy for four years, and in 1882 he was elected Principal of Dickinson College Preparatory School.

In 1884 he was made adjunct professor of Greek in Dickinson College and in 1890, full professor, continuing in this chair until 1915. In 1903 he was elected Dean of the College; in 1914 he was acting president; and in 1915 he became President. His administration extended to 1928 when he retired, although he was pressed back into service as acting president for two more brief terms.

His administration at Dickinson was noteworthy. When he became acting president in 1914, the trustees were considering liquidating its scanty assets. In 1928 when he retired the college was free of debt, the endowment was almost $1,000,000, and a limit of 500 had been placed in student enrollment. Educational facilities, admission standards, quality of faculty, all had been raised. For sixty-five years he poured his energy into Dickinson College.

For forty-five years he was a pillar of the CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, serving as a trustee from 1905 to 1926. Joining this conference in 1893, he was recognized as a pre-eminent leader among its members. For decades he was active in the training of ministers of the church, serving as Chairman of the Board of Ministerial Examiners. He was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1916.

He was a force in the Pennsylvania Anti-Saloon League for many years, and bore heavy responsibilities unselfishly in the field of moral reform and in the temporal and spiritual affairs of the Church.

He was the author of Dickinson College 1783-1933, published in 1933.

MORGAN, JOHN (1792-1872), was a pioneer British missionary to GAMBIA. He was born at Torquay, Devonshire, on May 13, 1820. Appointed to begin work on the Gambia River, West Africa, he was joined by John Baker from SIERRA LEONE. Two attempts to establish work up the river were defeated by the unhealthy climate, and eventually Morgan established a station at St. Mary's, ten miles from the river mouth, where he built a church and school. He planned work at McCarthy's Island, later to become the main base in Gambia, but had to return to England owing to ill health. His Reminiscences are useful. He died on June 14, 1872, at Teignmouth, Devonshire.

MORGAN, RICHARD (Senior), WILLIAM, and RICHARD (Junior), British Methodists. Richard Morgan, Sr. (1679-1752), held a post in the DUBLIN COURT of Exchequer. His son William (1712-32) was one of the four original members of the Oxford HOLY CLUB. It was he who led the WESLEYS to visit the sick and prisoners. His father disapproved of his association with "that ridiculous society" and partly blamed it for the illness which resulted in William's early death, Aug. 26, 1732. John Wesley's reply, which allayed the father's suspicions, provides a valuable account of the Oxford Methodists. The younger son, Richard (1714-85), was entrusted to Wesley's care. He succeeded his father in Dublin and was visited by Wesley as late as 1769. It is uncertain whether he retained any vital interest in Methodist work.

MORGAN STATE COLLEGE AND THE MORGAN CHRISTIAN CENTER, BALTIMORE, Maryland. The Centenary Biblical Institute was founded in Baltimore in 1867, under the leadership of Bishop LEVI SCOTT. This name was retained until 1890 when it was changed to Morgan College. In 1939 the name was changed for the third time to Morgan State College, when the Trustees agreed to transfer all physical holdings to the State of Maryland.

Bishop Scott called a meeting of interested ministers and laymen of the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE on Christmas Day, 1866. The Bishop prepared and signed a draft upon the treasurer of the MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. E. Church for $5,000. At a second meeting on Jan. 3, 1867, a Board of Trustees, thirteen in number, was named, and a committee was appointed to draft a charter. Bishop Scott offered this prayer as the meeting closed: "May God prosper the work of our hands and enable us to do something that shall tell favorably and powerfully on the improvement and elevation of a people long neglected and oppressed."

The Charter was signed, sealed and recorded on Nov. 27, 1867, the Preamble of which states:

"Whereas, Thomas Kelso, John Lanahan, Henry W. Drakeley, William Harden, Hugh L. Bond, James H. Brown, William B. Hill, Charles A. Reid, William Daniel, Isaac P. Cook, Francis A. Crook, Robert Turner and Samuel Hindes have been designated by the Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States of America as Trustees to become organized into a body politic and corporate for the education of such pious young men, especially colored, for the ministry of the M. E. Church as shall have been judged by a Quarterly Conference to be divinely called thereto."

In order to meet the demands for training teachers, the Trustees added a normal department in 1874 and admitted female students. The demands on the Institute continued to grow. In 1890 the Trustees amended the Charter so that courses of study on the college level could be offered, the number of Trustees was increased from thirteen to twenty-four and the name was changed to Morgan College, which honored Lyttleton F. Morgan of the Baltimore Conference and Chairman of the Board of Trustees.

Again the Trustees faced the need for expansion. They sold the College to the State of Maryland in November 1939, on condition that the name Morgan be retained, that all previous graduates be recognized, that the State provide adequate budgets and construct required buildings. The Trustees then purchased land adjoining the campus on which they constructed a commodious building, which includes a chapel, meeting rooms, recreation room and other facilities. The Board, known as the Morgan College Corporation, sponsors a dynamic religious program on campus with Chaplains for the various denominations and employs a Methodist minister as Director and who is appointed by the Bishop of the Baltimore Conference.

When the school opened in 1867, it had nine students and two part-time instructors. In 1967 its enrollment was 4,140, with a faculty of 250.

MORLEY, MABEL (? -1954), New Zealand Methodist deaconess, was the eldest daughter of WILLIAM MORLEY. In 1907 she was appointed a deaconess of Durham Street Church and Superintendent of the Deaconess House which opened in the same year. Six years later, on grounds of health, Sister Mabel had to retire from the work, but in 1914 she was appointed the first matron of the newly opened South Island Children's Home in Harewood Road, Papanui. This position she held for fourteen years. During the years of the depression in the 1930's, and for many more years, Sister Mabel spent herself in the service of the poor and needy of Christchurch. She was a valued member of the mayor's Coal and Blanket Committee.

Sister Mabel was also closely involved in many forms of church work, serving on the boards of the orphanage and of the deaconess institution, and taking a leading part in the Methodist Women's Missionary Union.

Her last years were spent in quiet retirement, until in 1954 she passed away, one of the most dearly loved women of New Zealand Methodism.

MORLEY, WILLIAM (1842-1926), New Zealand Methodist minister, was born at Orston, Nottinghamshire, England. Converted at the age of eighteen, he was received as a candidate for the ministry when he was twenty. He came to New Zealand at the age of twenty-two and entered the ministry there, serving leading pulpits and being secretary of the Conference on four occasions and president twice. In 1894 he was president of the historic General Conference of the Methodist Church of Australasia when it was agreed to give to the Annual Conferences permission to unite the various branches of Methodism in their own territories, according to a plan of union laid down by the General Conference. Morley in 1891 was a member of the Ecumenical Conference in Washington, D. C.

For ten years he was secretary of a committee charged with the revision of the Model Deed, and thus assisted in securing the present legal basis of the Australasian churches. In 1902, he was appointed managing treasurer of the Australasian Supernumerary Ministers' and Ministers' Widows' Fund, and he moved to Melbourne. He held the position for twenty-one years, until he himself superannuated. He died at Kew, Victoria, on May 24, 1926.

MORNINGSIDE COLLEGE, Sioux City, Iowa, was chartered as the University of the Northwest in 1889. It was purchased by the North Iowa Annual Conference in 1894 and incorporated under the present name. WILSON SEELEY LEWIS, the second president, was elected a bishop of the M. E. Church. In 1914, Charles City College, an institution founded by German Methodists, merged with Morningside.

The institution has been one to which the Board of Missions of The Methodist Church has sent many students from Africa for work in higher education. Degrees offered are the B.A., B.S., B.M. (Music), and B.M.E. (Music Education). The governing board has thirty-six trustees elected by the NORTH IOWA CONFERENCE.

MOROKA INSTITUTION, Thaba 'Nchu, Orange Free State, SOUTH AFRICA, has grown up on a Mission with a romantic past. In October 1833 JAMES ARCHBELL and JOHN EDWARDS, accompanied by Chief Moroka and several thousand Barolong, trekked from Platberg down the Modder River Valley to Thaba 'Nchu (the Black Mountain) where, on Dec. 17, 1833, they obtained a grant of approximately twenty-five square miles from Moshoeshoe, the Basuto "Moses," and other local chiefs. The chiefs were paid nine head of cattle and seventeen head of sheep and goats. The missionaries regarded the contract as an outright purchase, whereas Moshoeshoe (in accordance with African custom) was simply granting "a place to sit." The missionaries erected a school and church and launched an attack on Barolong illiteracy. By 1837 a hand-operated printing press in the church vestry was producing catechisms, scripture passages, school lessons and a Tswana Grammar.

A succession of faithful missionaries served and sacrificed to meet the growing educational and expanding evangelical needs of the people. Thirty primary schools and many churches were established. In 1937 a gift of land from Chief Fenyang and Dr. J. S. Moroka was accepted by the Methodist Church for the purpose of establishing an Institution with High School, Teacher-Training, Carpentry and Building Courses. During the first six years the Wardens were H. Greenwood, C. Crabtree and T. L. Sadler, and for the ensuing eighteen years W. Illsley filled this post. The present Warden (1961-) is L. G. S. Griffiths. The average number of students (male and female) in the period 1962-66 was 500, from whom there is a continuous flow of candidates for the ministry.

In 1938 a clinic was opened and an African nurse employed to serve the students and local community. Within a few years, with government assistance, buildings were erected to accommodate sixty in-patients. Financial assistance from the Orange Free State Provincial Administration, generous help from public bodies and from private individuals, and the sacrificial labors of medical, nursing and administrative staffs have brought the hospital bed-dage to 134, with sixty-eight nurses in training, ten African staff nurses and two African Sisters, both trained at Moroka. Dr. J. G. A. Scott, Miss Doris Tamblin, Miss Rosalie Taylor, Dr. Prudence Barrett and E. F. B. Rose (the present Medical Superintendent), have served with distinction and devotion.

MORRELL, THOMAS (1747-1838), pioneer American preacher and Revolutionary soldier, was born in New York City on Nov. 22, 1747. His father, Jonathan Morrell, was converted about 1765, while his mother's conversion was under the preaching of PHILIP EMBURY. The Morrells moved to Elizabethtown, N. J., in 1772, where the elder Morrell opened a store in which Thomas worked.

Thomas Morrell served in the Revolutionary War, and after the battle of Lexington in MASSACHUSETTS he became a captain of NEW JERSEY militia at Elizabethtown. He was severely wounded at the battle of Long Island in 1776, and was taken to New Providence, N. J., where he was nursed back to health. Thereafter he was in battles at Brandywine, Chadd's Ford, and Germantown (near Philadelphia), where he was again wounded. In the regular Continental Army he was successively Captain and Major of the 4th New Jersey Brigade.

In 1785 he was converted under the preaching of JOHN HAGGERTY in Elizabethtown. He gave up his business and began preaching within three months of his conversion. He was licensed as a LOCAL PREACHER in June 1786, and in 1787 was serving a circuit with Robert Cloud. Following his ordination as an ELDER in 1789 at NEW YORK, he was assigned to that city, with the specific charge to build a second Methodist church there. He organized the congregation which became the Forsyth Street Church, and erected a new house of worship.

Morrell was intimate with ASBURY, COKE and other leaders and frequently corresponded with JOHN WESLEY. On June 1, 1789, he arranged an audience with George Washington, who had just been inaugurated as President of the United States, in order that Asbury and Coke might present a congratulatory address which had been adopted by the conference then in session in New York, and with JOHN DICKINS he accompanied the two superintendents to present it personally to the Chief Executive. Coke, as an Englishman, was criticized for his action, but Asbury, also an Englishman, was so identified with the American cause that no adverse comment was directed toward him. The Methodists were the first church group to take such action, and it drew favorable comment from the New York press.

Morrell served the leading churches of the denomination in New York, PHILADELPHIA, BALTIMORE, CHARLESTON and elsewhere. He was in New York nearly five years and later returned to that appointment, and he alternated with FREEBORN GARRETTSON in Philadelphia. In 1804 he was assigned to his home town of Elizabeth. In 1806 he located, but continued preaching on a circuit in Union, Essex and Morris Counties.

Major Morrell married Lydia Frazer of Westfield, N. J., in 1802, Bishop Abury performing the ceremony. One of their children was Francis Asbury Morrell, who became a Methodist preacher and joined the NEWARK CONFERENCE on its organization in 1857, but transferred to the NEW JERSEY CONFERENCE the next year.

Thomas Morrell died in Elizabethtown on Aug. 9, 1838, and was buried there.

MORRIS, BERT JASPER (1875-1959), American minister, educator and editor, was born March 17, 1875. His family moved from Watseka, Ill. to Salina, Kan., in 1877. Morris graduated from KANSAS WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in 1903, and married a classmate, Della Pearl Miller, on Commencement Day. They moved to Berkeley, Calif., that autumn, where Bert enrolled at the Pacific School of Religion. With a B.D. degree he returned to Harvard and BOSTON UNIVERSITY, receiving a M.A. degree at Harvard and a Ph.D. at Boston.

The College of Pacific, then at San Jose, Calif., engaged him as professor of philosophy. For eight years he served as Dean of students, and one year as acting president. In World War I Morris served for two years at Harvard in the Federal Bureau of Vocational Guidance. In 1920-25 he directed the WESLEY FOUNDATION Center of Trinity Church, Berkeley, for University of California students. The University honored him with membership in the Faculty Club. He then became religious editor of the Pacific Rural Press for seventeen years.

His last work was an eight-year pastorate of the Portola Church in the Sierra where he built a notable structure, "The Cathedral of the Mountains." He then retired to Berkeley, where he died on April 29, 1959, and was buried in the Oak Knoll Cemetery, San Jose.

MORRIS, CECIL VAN HORNE (1897-), American missionary to CUBA, was born April 28, 1897, at Clifton Forge, Va., the son of William Thomas and Minnie May Morris. He was educated at RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE with the A.B. degree and at Princeton Theological Seminary with the B.Th. degree.

In 1920 he went to Cuba as a contract teacher, but joined the Annual Conference there in 1924. His pastorates covered six cities in addition to the time he served as district superintendent of the Central District.

While president of COLEGIO PINSON, the hurricane of 1932 crossed over the island and over Camaguey where his school was located. He had married Margaret Fleming in 1924 and they always worked together as a team. In order to help the school she even worked in the kitchen. Their two sons, Cecil Lee and Richard, were both born in Cuba.

For health reasons they retired from the field in 1939, but continued to be active where he served as supply pastor and officer and teacher in his local church. They reside in Newport News, Va.

MORRIS, JAMES SAMUEL (1848-1931), South African Wesleyan Methodist missionary, was born at Fort Beaufort, Cape Colony, on Aug. 31, 1848. He was the son of 1820 settlers and educated at Lovedale. Converted at Queenstown under Bishop WILLIAM TAYLOR, he offered for the ministry in 1872. A perfect Xhosa linguist, he did mission work in the Wodehouse and Tsomo Circuits before moving to Buntingville, Western Pondoland, in 1875. Here he gained the confidence of the Paramount Chief Nqwiliso and helped to prevent the Mpondo from siding with the Mpondomise in their 1880 Rebellion. Instead, he himself led a column of 400 Mpondo warriors which Nqwiliso dispatched at his suggestion to relieve the Colonial magistrate at Tsolo, who was besieged in the local gaol. Grateful for his advice, the Chief and his people made gifts of cattle for the erection of the New Kilner Institute at Buntingville. In spite of previous assurances, the Cape Government refused maintenance grants because Pondoland was outside the colony, and in 1887 Morris broke down under the resultant strain. He then spent fifteen years among the migrant laborers in the Diamond Fields Compounds at Kimberley and a short but worrying period at Edendale, Natal, before returning to Western Pondoland. After four years at Palmerton, he returned in 1909 to Buntingville where the Institution had been reopened with government assistance after the annexation of Pondoland to the Cape. Morris retired in 1919 and died in East London on Feb. 23, 1931. He was revered for his personal bravery, wise counsel, administrative talent, practical evangelical preaching and deep understanding of the African people.

MORRIS, PERCY F. (1879-1943), prominent American layman, was born in Bloomington, Ill., on July 20, 1879. He grew up on a ranch in CALIFORNIA, later moving to SAN FRANCISCO where he eventually owned a food brokerage firm. He married Lillie Caddy in 1910 and they had two daughters and a son.

Percy Morris participated in nearly every phase of church work, but his chief interests were youth and missions. He was a founder (1907) and early president of the California Conference EPWORTH LEAGUE, and organized the first Epworth League Institute in California. At the Asilomar Institute of 1916, he took a leading part in raising the necessary money to send GEORGE A. MILLER (later bishop) to PANAMA and COSTA RICA. His continuing interest led to his chairmanship of the Panama-Costa Rica Cooperating Council.

He served on numerous CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE boards and commissions, and was chairman of the WORLD SERVICE AND FINANCE Commission. He was a lay delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1932, and to the Western JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE, 1940.

As a Trustee of the College of the Pacific for many years, he recognized the need for a chapel there. He made the initial gift and was Building Committee chairman for the Gothic chapel, dedicated in 1942, which today bears his name.

He died in Oakland of a heart attack on Nov. 22, 1943.

Who's Who in Pan-Methodism. MARJORIE MORRIS BAYHA

MORRIS, THOMAS ASBURY (1794-1874), American bishop, was born on April 28, 1794, in Kanawha County near Charleston, W. Va. He was reared under Baptist influence and was converted in 1813 and made a Methodist class leader. The following year he became an exhorter and was licensed to preach.

In 1816 he was admitted on trial in the OHIO CONFERENCE and in due course was ordained a deacon by Bishop GEORGE and an elder by Bishop ROBERTS. His first appointment was to the Marietta circuit where he remained two years. In 1818 and in 1819 he served the Zanesville circuit and in 1820 he was sent to Chillicothe and then to Lancaster.

In 1822 he was transferred to KENTUCKY and sent to the Christian circuit, which covered two counties and parts of five others in Kentucky and TENNESSEE. He was then appointed to Hopkinsville and in 1824 he served the Red River circuit in Tennessee, which had twenty-one appointments, the nearest being twenty miles from his home. In 1825 he was made presiding elder of the Green River district in Kentucky, where he served two years. His succeeding appointments were LOUISVILLE, Lebanon circuit in Ohio, COLUMBUS, CINCINNATI, and presiding elder of the Cincinnati district. In 1834 he became editor of the Western Christian Advocate.

Morris was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1824 and all of the succeeding conferences until elected bishop at the General Conference in Cincinnati in 1836.

As bishop he presided over conferences in Tennessee, TEXAS, ARKANSAS and in other areas, including the INDIAN MISSION in OKLAHOMA. He adhered to the North when the Church was divided in 1844. Morris was of course a bishop during the tension and disruption of the Church during the eighteen-forties. There is evidence that he endeavored to stand between the two irreconcilable forces. He attended the LOUISVILLE CONVENTION called by the southern delegates in 1845 but declined to preside at any session. He with Bishop JAMES expressed a desire to go and hold the conferences assigned him in the South as the plan of visitation had been worked out by the bishops of the as yet undivided Church. However, the other bishops did not agree and worked up another plan of visitation in which Morris and James were excluded from any southern conference visitation. At one time he was charged in the press with having married a woman who owned slaves, but this was not the case. His second wife's first husband owned slaves but on his death they became the property of the son of his first wife.

In 1814 Morris married Miss Abigail Scales of VIRGINIA. They had two children and the son, Francis Asbury Morris, became a member of the MISSOURI CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South, and was a professor in St. Charles College. In 1844, his first wife having died, he married Mrs. Lucy Merriwether of Louisville, Ky.

In 1853 Morris published a book called Miscellany, Consisting of Essays, Biographical Sketches, and Notes of Travel; and in 1856 he wrote Discourses on Methodist Church Polity.

Bishop Morris died on Sept. 2, 1874, at Springfield, Ohio, and was buried in the Fern Cliff Cemetery there.

MORRIS, WILLIAM EDWARD (1876-1952), American minister and long-time conference secretary, was born in Greensboro, Ala., June 22, 1870, the son of Joseph Terry and Mattie A. Williams Morris, while his father was finishing his education in old Southern University. As a boy he attended the public schools and then Oxford College, Oxford, Ala. He then entered Southern University, Greensboro, Ala., graduating with a B.S. degree in 1893, planning at the time to enter the medical profession. He attended Mobile Medical College, 1893-94, and Birmingham Medical College, 1894-95. However, he later responded to the call to preach and in 1895 was admitted on trial into the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE. Bishop CHARLES B. GALLOWAY ordained him DEACON in 1897. Bishop WARREN A. CANDLER ordained him an ELDER in 1899. On May 18, 1898 he married Miss Fannie Sheldon.

From his very entrance into the Conference, Morris was asked to serve at the secretary's table. From 1895 to 1908 he served as first assistant to John W. Newman, long-time secretary of the Conference. He gave up his assistant's place when he was appointed to the Huntsville District in 1908. Upon the death of Newman in 1913, Morris was elected Conference secretary, which office he held till his retirement in 1942. He served as presiding elder of Huntsville, Birmingham, and Anniston Districts. He had a total of forty-seven years of service at his retirement, and had served many of the leading churches of the conference. He was greatly loved as a pastor.

He was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCES (MES) of 1922, 1926, 1930, and to the Uniting Conference of 1939.

In 1925 BIRMINGHAM-SOUTHERN COLLEGE conferred upon him the D.D. degree. Upon his retirement, he moved to Birmingham to live in the Norwood community, where he had served the Norwood Church so effectively some years before. He died Nov. 15, 1952. Funeral services were conducted at the Norwood Church and his body was laid to rest in Elmwood Cemetery, Birmingham, Ala.

MORRIS BROWN COLLEGE. (See ATLANTA, GEORGIA, Morris Brown College.)

MORRIS HARVEY COLLEGE, Charleston, West Virginia, was founded in 1888 in Barboursville, W. Va., and named for Morris Harvey, its chief benefactor. The college was related to the Western Virginia Conference of the M. E. Church, South. Because of financial difficulties, the college abandoned its first location and moved to Charleston in 1939.

After the union of the three branches of Methodism in 1939, the newly organized West Virginia Annual Conference of The Methodist Church asked the UNIVERSITY SENATE to make a study of the educational needs of the conference, particularly with the view of determining the conference's ability to support two institutions. The senate, in 1941, recommended that the annual conference concentrate its support upon one college—WEST VIRGINIA WESLEYAN at Buckhannon. The conference released the property that it held, and Morris Harvey became a private college of liberal arts. It continues to have warm, friendly relationships with West Virginia Methodists.

JOHN O. GROSS

MORRISON, HENRY CLAY (1842-1921), American bishop of the M. E. Church, South, was born May 30, 1842, in Montgomery County, Tenn. He states in his autobiography that he was born in a plain small cottage five miles from the town of Clarksville, Tenn. His father was a small farmer with a large family and it was necessary for his son to work in the fields in order to support the family; therefore, Henry was prevented from attending school except for one eight month's term in a small country school. He professed religion in the Baker's CAMP MEETING near his home at the age of fourteen.

In 1857 the family moved to Graves County, Ky., and here despite the handicap of little formal education he took advantage of every opportunity to learn and was licensed to teach in the rural schools. During this time he responded to the call to the ministry and was licensed to preach in April 1863, at Pleasant Hill Church in Ballard County. He began his ministry on the Clinton Circuit of the MEMPHIS CONFERENCE. The circuit covered 150 miles and had twenty-seven preaching places. From here he joined the Confederate States Army and served both as soldier and spiritual advisor to the troops. After peace was declared he resumed his ministry on the Logan Circuit. He joined the LOUISVILLE CONFERENCE in 1865, and was assigned to Millerstown. His reputation as a preacher soon brought him to the leading pulpits of the conference, including four quadrennia in LOUISVILLE, Ky.

In 1886 he was transferred to the NORTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE and stationed at the First Methodist Church, ATLANTA. At the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1890 he was elected as one of the secretaries of the Board of MISSIONS, and in 1894 became its Senior Secretary. Following the panic of 1893, the Board found itself with a debt of $132,000. Morrison accepted the challenge of this indebtedness and by personal solicitation and correspondence raised $150,000. He was elected to the episcopacy in 1898. In the twenty years of his episcopal supervision, he served forty-one of the fifty-four conferences of the Southern church. He continued to raise money and at the time of his retirement in 1918, it was estimated that he had raised $3,000,000 for the church. After retirement he made his home in Leesburg, Fla., until his death on Dec. 20, 1921. The church there is named the Morrison Memorial.

A strong forthright leader, not in the least afraid of controversy, he belonged among those awe-inspiring Southern Methodist bishops whose fiat made law in the conferences over which they presided; and who had no doubts as to the rectitude of their convictions. Withal he was fundamentally a kindhearted minister, and the editor of this Encyclopedia states that he has always been proud to have been ordained by H. C. Morrison.

HARRY R. SHORT

H. C. MORRISON

MORRISON, HENRY CLAY (1857-1942), American pastor, evangelist, educator, journalist, was born on March 10, 1857, at Bedford, Ky. His Baptist father, James S. Morrison, died when Henry was four; his mother, born Emily Durham, died when he was two. When Henry was three weeks old, his mother dedicated him to the ministry at a Methodist Quarterly meeting.

Educated at Ewing Institute, Perryville, Ky., and VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY for one year, he passed his examinations in all but one subject. However, later in life he was given an honorary D.D. by Vanderbilt. Converted at the age of thirteen, licensed to preach in 1878, admitted on trial in the KENTUCKY M. E. South CONFERENCE, 1881, he was ordained DEACON in 1886 and ELDER in 1887. He located in 1890, requesting the Conference to give him a local relationship in order to give full time to evangelism.

From 1879 to 1882 Morrison served four circuits: Floydsburg, Jacksonville (both as junior preacher), Westport, and Concord. From 1882 to 1890, he served five stations: Stanford; Eleventh Street Church, Covington; Highlands; Walnut Street, Danville, and Frankfort.

An evangelist from 1890 to 1910, his oratorical ability reached pinnacles of greatness while preaching to audiences numbered by the thousands. However, he never became what was sometimes called a "commercial evangelist." During 1908 he preached 471 times. It is estimated that he held 1,200 revivals, preached 15,000 times, traveled 500,000 miles, and had thousands of converts at his altars. Morrison's evangelistic zeal in camp meetings and revival preaching brought him into conflict with the authorities of his Church. The period from 1896 through 1904 was a stormy one. He was brought to trial in September 1897, in the Kentucky Conference, for "contumacious conduct." Upon his statement that he had "no intent" to violate church law "he was restored to his former position in the church and the case was closed." The church subsequently elected him to five General Conferences and the Ecumenical Methodist Conference in London, 1921.

Founder of the Pentecostal Herald about 1890, he was its editor for about thirty-five years, stressing holiness, and aiding and promoting ASBURY COLLEGE and ASBURY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY. He wrote some twenty-five popular books, though he was not a scholarly writer or preacher.

Returning from a tour of world evangelism, Morrison accepted the presidency of Asbury College, and served from 1910-25. He served again as president from 1933-40, dominating the school for most of the time. He was made president emeritus and continued to hold this title until his death. He founded Asbury Theological Seminary in 1923. He was its first president and his administration continued until his death.

Dramatic, picturesque, magnificent in appearance, Morrison was considered one of the fifty great preachers of America by The Christian Century. He was also held to be the greatest defender in Methodism of what he thought to be the Wesleyan teaching of Christian Perfection (SANCTIFICATION) within Methodism. ROY L. SMITH in The Christian Advocate, April 9, 1942, said: "There were those who disagreed with him on matters of theology, but no man surpassed him in devotion to the Christian evangel." E. STANLEY JONES said: "Morrison was one of the great men of the religious life of America, the last of the old Southern orators."

He married Laura Bain on June 20, 1888, and they had three children. Mrs. Morrison died Nov. 29, 1893, and he married Geneva Pedlar on April 9, 1895. They had five children. She died on March 23, 1914, and he married Mrs. Bettie Whitehead on Feb. 17, 1916. She died in 1945.

After preaching sixty-three years, Morrison preached his last sermon on his life theme, "How to win sinners to Christ." The next day, March 24, 1942, he died at Elizabethton, Tenn. Bishop U. V. W. DARLINGTON gave a tribute at his funeral in Asbury College and said: "We shall not see his like again. He was just about the last of the old group of great towering preachers who do not 'water down' anything but just plainly preach Christ, Savior from sin." He was buried at Wilmore, Ky.

JESSE A. EARL

MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY, U.S.A., Morristown Church in the NORTHERN NEW JERSEY (former Newark) CONFERENCE is a suburban church with a historic past—a church which "offers a dynamic ministry today in a community and area rich in Methodist tradition, and in New Jersey history." Methodism began there in 1811 when Bishop ASBURY preached in the Presbyterian Church—the Presbyterians, then, as now, being strong in northern New Jersey. Preaching by circuit riders and prayer and CLASS-MEETINGS organized in homes eventually led to the establishment of a permanent society. A New York Methodist family, the Samuel Bonsalls, moved to Spring Valley in 1813 and opened their home to Methodist circuit riders twice a month. This link which Morristown had to the city of New York proved quite beneficial, and resulted in the formation of a Methodist church building in 1827.

The first church, a small rectangular red brick building, was dedicated on Oct. 14, 1827. On that occasion the building was packed three times by neighboring people, some of whom had walked seven miles to participate in the services. An 1828 revival added 200 members to the original thirteen. Nathaniel Porter, the first pastor, was appointed to Morristown in 1829 by the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE.

The congregation outgrew the first edifice by 1841, and a second building was erected, this time "on the Green." The new building was a white, wooden, colonial structure and is being used today by the A.M.E. CHURCH congregation. It was removed to its present site by a team of white oxen, after the present building had been erected on property given by George T. Cobb, Mayor of Morristown.

The cornerstone of the third building was laid in 1866 by Bishop JAMES, who returned to dedicate it four years later in 1870. This church is the present imposing structure located on the east side of the Morristown Green. It is a stone edifice, of solid Norman architecture. The masonry is purple puddingstone trimmed with Maine granite. The spire terminating in a granite cross rises 150 feet. The interior is trimmed with butternut and black walnut.

Through the years the clock in the spire has been known by all in the community as the "Town Clock," and at one time the churchbell was used as the town fire alarm. In 1964 the Tucker Memorial Carillon was installed in the Tower as part of the $450,000 modernization program which renovated the structure and added a three-floor matching wing of educational, office and social facilities.

The first session of the NEWARK CONFERENCE was held in the second building in 1858. It was in the third and present handsome structure that the fourteenth session of the Newark Conference convened in 1871, and through the century outstanding anniversary sessions have been held there marking the thirty-fifth (1892); the fiftieth (1907); and the centennial (1957) sessions of the Newark Conference.

The church has grown consistently through the years. It has been served by some of the great preachers and leaders of the Northern New Jersey (Newark) Conference, including David W. Bartine, JONATHAN TOWNLEY CRANE, HENRY A. BUTTZ, GEORGE P. ECKMAN, JESSE L. HURLBUT, RALPH B. URMY, J. Edgar Washabaugh, Henry L. Lambdin, and William L. Lancey.

In 1970 it reported 1,354 members, property valued at $2,250,841, and $194,697 raised for all purposes.

MORRISTOWN COLLEGE, Morristown, Tennessee, began in 1881 as an elementary and secondary school for Negroes under the auspices of the FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY of the M. E. Church. It was founded by Judson S. Hill, a Methodist minister from New Jersey.

The school was started in a one-story frame building which had served previously as a slave mart. One of the students who was graduated from the school and later served for forty-four years as a teacher remembered having been sold at the front of the building in the days of slavery.

Junior college instruction began in 1923. In 1960 the name was changed to the present one. The college was granted full accreditation and membership in the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools in 1961. The governing board has thirty-three members elected by the board. Ownership of the college properties is vested with the Board of Education of The Methodist Church.

DAVID MORTON

MORTON, DAVID (1833-1898), American preacher and executive, was born June 4, 1833, in Russellville, Ky., the son of Marmaduke B. and Nancy Caldwell Morton. He was baptized in infancy by JOHN LITTLEJOHN, an associate of FRANCIS ASBURY in the early days of American Methodism. He was educated at Russellville Academy and early entered public service where he developed outstanding executive ability. This served him well in later years when he became the first Secretary of CHURCH EXTENSION of the M. E. Church, South. He early felt the call to the ministry and in 1853 joined the LOUISVILLE CONFERENCE (MES). His promotion from circuits to stations was rapid and he soon became one of the most popular preachers of his conference. During the trying period of the War Between the States, 1861-65, David Morton had a part in the stormy sessions of his conference, when the conference was prevented from meeting as a whole and held its separate sessions under the watchful eyes of both Confederate and Union soldiers.

In 1867-68 he was instrumental in establishing two colleges in his conference—Logan College in his home town of Russellville and Warren College in Bowling Green. He was elected a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1870 and re-elected to each of the eight succeeding conferences. His death occurred just prior to the meeting of the General Conference of 1898 to which he had been elected.

In 1876 he was sent to the Pacific Northwest to help strengthen and establish churches. He visited every congregation of Southern Methodism in his territory and as a result of his work, the need of funds for building churches came to the attention of the General Conference of 1882. This led to the establishment of the Board of Church Extension and Morton was selected as its Corresponding Secretary. For sixteen years he piloted the course of this new board, extended its services, and built it into one of the most efficient agencies of the Church. He continued in this office until his death. During this time 3,817 churches were aided, nearly a million dollars was raised and the rate of church building averaged nearly one church for each day of the year.

In a tribute to him at the General Conference following his death, it was fitly said, "What Church Extension is among us, he made it." He was buried in Maple Grove Cemetery in his home town of Russellville, Ky., on March 15, 1898.

MOSES, HORACE AUGUSTUS (1862-1947), American Methodist layman and philanthropist, was born April 21, 1862 on a farm in South Ticonderoga, N. Y., the son of Henry H. and Emily (Rising) Moses. He attended local schools and the two-year commercial course at Troy Conference Academy in Poultny, Vt., now GREEN MOUNTAIN JUNIOR COLLEGE. His business career began as an errand boy in the Springfield, Mass., paper mills where, in successive steps, he arose to manage. Eventually he founded his own mill, the Strathmore Paper Co., which became internationally known.

Moses was a "tither" all of his life. His many benefactions included the Eastern States Farmers Exchange; the Junior Achievement Movement which he conceived and first organized; the 4-H Clubs which he helped found and supported; the Green Mountain Junior College in Vermont; sixty-one major gifts to his home town of Ticonderoga, N. Y.; eighty-five gifts to educational institutions, including numerous buildings, permanent scholarships and endowed academic chairs; the Valley View Chapel in Springfield, Mass., one of America's most beautiful Gothic cathedrals.

He died on April 22, 1947, and is buried in Springfield Cemetery. His wife, Alice (Elliot) Moses, died in 1962, after being a member of Trinity Church for seventy-five years. Their daughter, Madeline Moses, presently lives in New York City.

MOSSMAN, FRANK E. (1873-1945), American college president, a builder of institutions and of men and women, was born in Urbana, Iowa, on Aug. 26, 1873. On March 27, 1895, he married Zoa Foster and they were the parents of four children. He was admitted on trial in the NORTHWEST IOWA CONFERENCE in 1899. Frank Mossman graduated from MORNINGSIDGE COLLEGE in 1903 and earned an M.A. there in 1905. He received honorary doctorates from Upper Iowa University and SOUTHWESTERN COLLEGE, Winfield, Kan.

Twice he was president of Southwestern College—1905-1918, and from 1931 until he became president-emeritus in 1942. Between these two terms he held the presidency of his alma mater, Morningside College. During his first term as president at Southwestern he bought back the campus land which had been sold during the lean years and built Richardson Hall, the chief campus building. When he returned in 1931 he was the dean of college presidents of Methodism. Eight times he was elected a delegate to GENERAL CONFERENCE, and for many years he was a member of the UNIVERSITY SENATE. He died on June 12, 1945 and was buried in Winfield, Kan.

Mossman's ability to read the faces of students and to discern when they were disturbed by financial or other problems, as well as his wise counsel in the time of need, won for him the loyalty of students, faculty and supporters of the college. He thus molded many lives, easily but surely bending them toward a higher goal.

Roy L. SMITH, the editor and author, who was always grateful to Mossman for encouraging him to finish college, characterized "Prexy" as a great man with devotion, faith, enthusiasm, capacity for entering into the lives of others, and administrative ability.

INA TURNER GRAY

MOTT, JOHN RALEIGH (1865-1955), American church statesman and world-wide leader in missionary enterprises and in the international Y.M.C.A., was born May 25, 1865, at Livingston Manor, N. Y. When he was four months old the family moved to Postville, Iowa. At the age of sixteen Mott entered the Upper Iowa College at Fayette, Iowa. At graduation he continued his work at Cornell University at Ithaca, N. Y., because he thought the religious life should speak more to the mind. In his junior year at Cornell, Mott became President of the Christian association. He came to the attention of the national Y.M.C.A. leaders when he succeeded in raising the money for a new college "Y" building.

His life of service in the Y.M.C.A. and on international and missionary levels was launched from this college platform. In the winter of 1886, J. Kynaston Studd, one of the "Cambridge Seven," came with his young wife to the Cornell campus. Mott heard him speak and found his Christian life, begun under Iowa Y.M.C.A. auspices, directed into full-time Christian service. In the same year he went as a delegate to the first International Christian Student Conference, held under the eyes of Dwight L. Moody at Mount Hermon, Mass. At this meeting, he helped organize the STUDENT VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT—whose missionary motto became, "The world for Christ in this generation." Mott became chairman and served in this capacity for thirty-two years.

JOHN R. MOTT

Assigned to the executive committee of the Student Volunteer Movement in his capacity as a representative of the International Committee of the Y.M.C.A., he became chairman of this committee also and served for thirty-three years.

From these two relationships, a steadily increasing influence in the world movements of Christendom characterized his life. From 1888 to 1915 he was General Secretary of the Intercollegiate Y.M.C.A. movement of the United States and CANADA. In 1895 he became General Secretary of the World's Student Christian Federation. In 1898 he became Secretary of the Foreign Department of the International Committee of Y.M.C.A.'s. In 1901 he was elected Associate General Secretary of the International Committee. He was shortly chairman of the World's Committee of Y.M.C.A.'s. Several of these posts he held concurrently as the influence of both the Y.M.C.A. and the student missionary movement extended outward.

It was logical, therefore, that in 1910, when the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE was called in Edinburgh, Mott should be chosen chairman of Commission I, and presiding officer of the day sessions. Nearly 2,000 delegates from 159 societies and from fifty-four nations gathered to set their sights upon the world missionary target. As the session closed, Mott was chosen chairman of the Continuation Committee. He was therefore central to the leadership of the Jerusalem Missionary Council in 1928 and the Madras Missionary Council in 1938.

He presided at the Oxford Conference on Life and Work in 1937 and was one of the vice-presidents of the Edinburgh Conference of Faith and Order in the same year. When he resigned as chairman of the International Missionary Council in 1942, he continued at seventy-seven years of age several posts of outstanding significance, as president of the World's Alliance of the Y.M.C.A.; vice president for the Western Hemisphere of the Provisional Committee for bringing into being the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, and several other offices. When the World Council of Churches came into being, he was named an honorary president.

During this extremely active and global life of service, Mott made four round-the-world trips, served in seventy-three countries, was decorated by sixteen nations, and received honorary degrees from eight distinguished universities, including Cornell, Yale, Princeton, Edinburgh, and Brown.

Confidant of bishops, statesmen, wealthy industrialists and Christian leaders the world over, Mott found time to write at least fifteen volumes, including six volumes of Addresses and Papers published in 1946-47. Three presidents of the United States—Roosevelt, Taft and Wilson—called upon him for service. During World War I, he was chairman of the United War-Work Committee which sought to raise $170,500,000 and raised more than $190,000,000. Three times, he was offered the ambassadorship of CHINA by President Wilson, who described him as "certainly one of the most nobly useful men in the world." He indeed did serve the President as a member of the American deputation to Mexico and as one of Wilson's appointees on the American Mission to RUSSIA.

Such was the life of one who in his early twenties, preparing for a legal career, heard a Cambridge athlete speaking for Christ put the challenge, "Seest thou great things for thyself? Seek them not. Seek ye first the Kingdom of God." And said Mott, "on these few words hinged my life-investment decisions."

Mrs. Mott passed away in the early 1950's, and two years later, Mott married a second time. In 1937, he had been named an honorary canon of the Episcopal Church. And, although a life-long Methodist he was, upon his death on Jan. 31, 1955, interred in the Washington Cathedral, Washington, D. C.

Among his fifteen or more published books, are: The Strategic Points in the World's Conquest; The Evangelization of the World in this Generation; The Pastor and Modern Missions; The Future Leadership of the Church; The Present World Situation; The Decisive Hour of Christian Missions; Addresses and Papers of J. R. Mott, six vols.

MOULTON, JAMES HOPE (1863-1917), British Wesleyan Methodist and distinguished scholar, was born on Oct. 11, 1863, at Richmond, Surrey. He was one of the first sixteen boys at Leys School, CAMBRIDGE, of which his father was headmaster. He entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1886, and for the next sixteen years was himself a master at the Leys.

In 1902 he was appointed to Didsbury College, Manchester, and later became professor of Hellenistic Greek and Greenwood lecturer in the Greek Testament at the University of Manchester. He was elected to the LEGAL HUNDRED in 1904. In 1912 he was Hibbert Lecturer on Early Zoroastrianism, and in 1913 FERNLEY LECTURER on Religions and Religion. He was also a fellow of King's College, Cambridge, the first Wesleyan minister to obtain a fellowship at Oxford or Cambridge. His study of oriental languages made him the greatest English authority of Zoroastrianism. With Deissmann and Milligan he was concerned with applying the new evidence from the papyri to the study of the New Testament, and with Milligan published A Vocabulary of the Greek Testament, Illustrated from the Papyri. Also he published Grammar of New Testament Greek (1906, 1929), and From Egyptian Rubbish Heaps (1914). He died in the Mediterranean through submarine action on April 7, 1917.

MOULTON, WILLIAM FIDDIAN (1835-1898), British Wesleyan Methodist and outstanding scholar, was born in Leek, Staffordshire, on March 14, 1835. After a brilliant career at London University he entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1858. He was appointed to Richmond College, Surrey, first as assistant and then as classical tutor, until in 1874 he was made the first headmaster of Leys School, CAMBRIDGE. In 1873 he was elected to the LEGAL HUNDRED, and became President of the Conference in 1890. In 1891, with J. SCOTT LIDDETT, he founded the Bermondsey Settlement. From 1870-81 he was secretary of one of the New Testament committees for the Revised Version of

FAWCETT MEMORIAL HALL, MOUNT ALLISON UNIVERSITY

MOUNT ALLISON UNIVERSITY (Sackville, New Brunswick), Methodists in Eastern British America (now the Maritime Provinces of Canada) waited for decades for an opportunity to start a program of higher education. Other denominations had their institutions of learning, but how were they to find the money to start and maintain one of their own? The opening came in a letter to the annual meeting of the New Brunswick District held in St. John in the spring of 1839. It was written by CHARLES FREDERICK ALLISON, a merchant living in Sackville, a small town almost on the Nova Scotia border. He suggested a school "in which not only the elementary, but higher branches of education may be taught," and "in which pure religion is not only taught, but constantly brought before the youthful mind," and which would be under the control of the Wesleyan districts of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. His offer to purchase a site in Sackville, to erect a suitable building, and to give a hundred pounds a year toward its upkeep was gladly accepted by the District, and was ratified quickly by the Nova Scotia District. In July, 1840, Allison laid the foundation stone of the Male Academy. Until his death in 1858 he continued to interest himself in the school and to increase his donations.

When the first young men entered in January, 1843, they were greeted by the first principal, HUMPHREY PICKARD, a native of New Brunswick, who had gone to the United States for his university education. Under his guidance the student body rapidly increased, and the range of work offered was expanded steadily. In 1854 a "Female Branch" was opened in a second building some distance from the first, and large numbers of young women came to take classes suited to their needs. In 1858, by act of the New Brunswick Legislature, the trustees of the Wesleyan Academy (Male and Female) were incorporated, and were given a charter conferring full degree-granting power. Thus began the three separate, yet interdependent, parts of Mount Allison, all of which were under the presidency of Humphrey Pickard.

Mount Allison Academy continued until 1953. A boarding school leading to university matriculation, it later acquired a coeducational commercial department. Young men whose education had been interrupted could here make up what they had missed, and those with little money in their pockets were accommodated in one way or another. In the years when high schools were remote from large sections of the population, it was a haven for ambitious adolescents; its discontinuance came only when regional high schools had become general. Three wooden buildings in which the academy was housed, were burned, and the fourth, a stone structure, is now a university women's residence.

The Ladies' College was the name early given to the Female Branch. Though it began as a high school, the curriculum was broadened to include many subjects then called for in the proper education of a young lady. In 1890 the cornerstone of the Conservatory of Music was laid, and within twenty years ten specialists were teaching in this department. In 1893 John Hammond was appointed director of art, and soon paintings from the collection of John Owens of Saint John, came into the new Owens Museum of Fine Arts. In 1904 the School of Household Science, equipped by Mrs. Lillian (Massey) Treble and named after her, was opened. In later years these and other departments were gradually integrated with the university, and by 1936 the school was reduced to a matriculation course, which was terminated in 1946.

The university has grown steadily through the years. From the two who formed the first graduating class in 1862, the number of students increased to some twelve hundred a century later, and it is becoming increasingly difficult to hold the enrollment at that figure. From its inception Mount Allison has been favored with some excellent teachers who could not be drawn away to positions which seemed to have much more to offer. The first university degree granted a woman in the British Empire was a bachelor of science, conferred upon Grace Annie Lockhart, in 1875; and in 1884 Miss Harriet Starr Stewart became the first woman to win a bachelor of arts degree from any Canadian university.

Instruction in theological subjects began in 1860, and in 1875 a Faculty of Theology was formally established with Charles Stewart as its first dean. This part of the university moved to Halifax in 1926, when it was amalgamated with the Presbyterian College to form Pine Hill Divinity Hall, a seminary of the newly formed United Church of Canada. Since that time candidates for the United Church ministry from eastern Canada have taken their arts at Mount Allison, and their theological studies at Pine Hill.

In 1903 the McClellan School of Applied Science was opened. From this developed the Engineering Department, which gives a three-year course leading to a degree after two additional years at a technical college. In contrast, commerce and education have been added recently.

The Mount Allison crest carries the words, Litterae, Religio, Scientia, and throughout its history a serious attempt has been made to integrate all three in the development of the whole man.

Though the building erected in 1854 to house the Female Branch still stands (1966), most of the early structures have disappeared and have been replaced by many fine new buildings. One of the latest is a chapel in the form of a symmetrical cross in the center of the campus. The stained-glass windows are unique in design, and of exceptional quality.

The university is governed by a board of regents, twenty of whom are appointed by The United Church of Canada, twenty by the Federated Alumni, two by the faculty, and four by the board. In 1960 the first chancellor, Ralph Pickard Bell, was installed. The presidents have been: Humphrey Pickard, 1862-69; David Allison, 1869-78, 1891-11; J. R. Inch, 1878-91; B. C. Borden, 1911-23; C. J. Trueman, 1923-45; W. T. R. Flemington, 1945-62; and L. H. Cragg, 1963-

MOUNT BETHEL ACADEMY (1794-1820) was an early Methodist school located in Newberry County, S. C., U.S.A., the first such institution of the Methodists in that state. The building, erected in 1794, stood on thirty acres of land given by Edward Finch, and was dedicated by Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY on March 20, 1795. It was twenty by forty feet in size, divided by partitions, with chimneys at each end. The second floor was a dormitory for students, and several cabins served as boarding houses and residences for the teachers.

Mark Moore was the principal for six years, being succeeded by one Mr. Hammond. The school was largely patronized by students from GEORGIA and both the CAROLINAS. It began to decline in the second decade of the nineteenth century and closed its doors about 1820, being succeeded by the Mount Ariel and COKEBURY SCHOOLS in that section. Nothing remains on the site.

MT. GILEAD CAMPGROUND, located at Ben Hill, Near ATLANTA, Ga., U.S.A., is the offspring of the oldest Methodist church in Fulton (originally DeKalb) County, Ga. Mt. Gilead Church was planned for in 1824 in the home of John M. Smith by several families from Franklin County and was then organized by William J. Parks, pastor of the Lawrenceville Circuit.

A newspaper article written in the late 1800's, "The Story of Old Mt. Gilead," records: "The first Campground was established on what is now Jackson St., then Old Sandtown Road. Because of the fact that it was located on the highway leading to the Sandtown Ferry on the Chat-tahoochee River, connecting the Creek and Cherokee nations, it was called Sandtown Campground. Those good old Scotch-Irish pioneers held annual camp meetings here from as far back as 1824 until 1835. In that year, Rev. John M. Smith and Old Father Fain cut down the brushes for the 'Old Brush Arbor.'"

P. P. Smith (John M. Smith's oldest son) wrote for the Southern Christian Advocate in October, 1860: "I preached the first sermon at the new Campground on the 22nd Oct., 1835."

Thus the beginnings of this historic place. The center of the campground was a crude pineboard tabernacle with brush roof (later replaced with more substantial material), encircled by temporary living quarters called "tents." So phenomenal was the growth that, in 1860, sixty families with their livestock encamped there. The great influence of Aaron and James Turner, "Venerable Fathers in Israel," JESSE and ISAAC BORING, GEORGE F. PIERCE, Charles Dowman, and others was renowned throughout the area.

The first tabernacle, destroyed by a heavy snow in 1880, was replaced that same year with the present tabernacle, under the supervision of James Barrett. The spiritual fervor of these CAMP MEETINGS climaxed in a great revival in 1900 under the preaching of W. A. Dodge. Preachers of that day vied for camp meeting preaching privileges, and often the "preachers' tent" had twenty preachers available for the four services per day. Preachers of a later day were S. R. Belk, JAMES E. DICKEY, the Jenkins brothers, and the Eakes brothers.

As the area rapidly became urbanized, the campground lost its appeal for "tent holders." A motel was erected in 1946; deteriorated tents were replaced with modern cottages; a new water system and other improvements were made under the long and faithful leadership of Erby McGee.

Today revival preaching by distinguished evangelists is still heard here the first two weeks in August each year. Some of the present trustees are descendants of the original trustees, who were: J. J. Fain, Lewis Peacock, Isaac Sewell, John B. Holbrook, and John M. Smith. These grandsons of the pioneers, with other young and zealous leaders, have the challenge to transform "The Old Campground" into a place of greater influence and glory for the Kingdom of God.

MOUNT PLEASANT GERMAN COLLEGE, Mount Pleasant, Iowa (1873-1909), was founded in 1873 by the South-west German Annual Conference of the M. E. Church under Rudolph J. Havighorst in association with IOWA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY under President JOHN WHEELER. It offered academy, college and theological courses in the German language. The affiliation with Iowa Wesleyan permitted the students to enroll for a B.A. degree and many collegiate courses were not offered independently by the German College. The professors formed, in return, the German Department of Iowa Wesleyan. Associated with the college were such German-American Methodist scholars as F. WILHELM BALCKE, E. CARL MAGARET, FRIEDRICH MUNZ, EDWIN STANTON HAVIGHORST and KARL STIEFEL. Some 400-500 students attended the college and about 235 received diplomas. A three story college building and later a chapel were erected. The major contribution of the college was training ministers for the German Methodist Conferences. In 1909, the college was merged with Central Wesleyan College, Warrenton, Missouri by the sponsoring conferences of both schools, the St. Louis German and the West German. The land, the buildings and one half of the endowment fund reverted to Iowa Wesleyan. The Chapel was razed in 1926 and the College Building in 1961. Bricks and the inscribed granite lintel from the latter building were turned in a memorial marker on the site. The archives, originally moved to Warrenton, are now the core of the Zwingli F. Meyer Collection of German-American Methodism at Iowa Wesleyan College.

MOUNT ROYAL COLLEGE, Calgary, Alberta, was founded in 1910 under the sponsorship of the Board of Colleges of the Methodist Church of CANADA and through the efforts of a group of citizens under the leadership of GEORGE W. KERBY of Central Methodist Church in Calgary. In December 1910, the college was incorporated by an act of the provincial legislature to provide elementary and secondary education for both sexes, and instruction in music, art, speech, drama, journalism, commercial and business courses, technical and domestic arts. W. H. Cushing was appointed chairman of the board of governors and Kerby the first principal.

The college opened in September, 1911, with 154 students enrolled in all departments. By 1965 several thousand students were enrolled in the various departments.

In 1925, Mount Royal College came under the supervision of the Board of Colleges and Secondary Schools of The United Church of Canada, and Kerby continued as its principal. In 1931 a university department was established in the junior college division, and the elementary school program was discontinued. The university department offered the first two years of the arts and science courses as prescribed by the University of Alberta.

John H. Garden succeeded Kerby as principal in 1942 and served until 1959. The college charter was amended in 1944 and 1950 to provide broader base, and engineering courses were begun in the university department. The facilities of the college were enlarged with the erection of the Kerby Memorial Building and the G. D. Stanley Gymnasium in 1949. In the fall of 1956 a business administration department was established.

In January, 1959, W. John Collett, who had been dean since 1948, was appointed principal on the retirement of Garden. The college continues to grow and fill a need for high-school and post-high-school education as a community college. It has been reorganized as a cooperative community junior college controlled by the community and financed from the public treasury.

MT. SEQUOYAH, ARKANSAS, U.S.A., a large camp and assembly ground near Fayetteville, is maintained by the South Central Jurisdiction of The United Methodist Church, and is officially known as the Western Methodist Assembly. It began in 1920 when a group of church leaders met at LAKE JUNALUSKA, N. C., and decided to challenge the annual conferences west of the Mississippi River to establish an Assembly Ground. East Mountain, at Fayetteville, Arkansas (later called Mt. Sequoyah), was selected as the site. Fifty buildings were thereafter erected, the first programs being given in the summer of 1923. It was soon found that the financial situation was to prove difficult, and so lots were sold, annuity bonds were arranged for, and the support of Methodist people earnestly solicited.

Sam Yancey was elected superintendent of the Assembly in due time and served faithfully and well for twenty-three years. Other buildings were erected during this time, including the large Clapp Auditorium which seats 600 persons and is still being used. A cafeteria was also built, unique in that four oak trees growing where it was built, were "incorporated" in its structure, their trunks and limbs spreading through and beyond the roof.

Elmer H. Hook succeeded Yancey in 1949. During his tenure as superintendent, all the cottages were modernized, Hook himself making many pieces of furniture in his wood-working shop. The PAUL E. and Mildred MARTIN building (named for Bishop and Mrs. Martin) was made possible by contributions from all the Conferences of the South Central Jurisdiction and by gifts from the T. L. James family of Ruston, La., and from J. J. PERKINS of Dallas. In the Martin building is a lovely chapel, as well as ten large classrooms, including an audio-visual room. A gift from the J. M. Willsons of Floydada, Texas made possible a small infirmary.

In June 1959, E. H. Hook retired to be succeeded by E. C. Kaetzell, who like Hook, proved to be a builder as well as an administrator. Under his leadership the architectural firm of Hare & Hare, of Kansas City, was employed to prepare plans for the rebuilding and construction of all needed facilities for the ongoing of the Assembly.

Pursuant to these and other plans, a financial goal was adopted by the bishops and Jurisdictional Council and voted into effect by the Annual Conferences of the Jurisdiction. As funds were provided, two new ten-room lodges were built, eleven motel-type units were erected, and a new modern cafeteria designed to serve and seat 350 persons came into being. The Woman's Building—built early in the life of the Assembly by the contributions of interested women, and owned and governed by them—was given to the Assembly in 1963, so that every building on the ground might be owned by the South Central Jurisdiction. Approximately 400 people can presently be housed at one time.

The grounds and buildings of the Mt. Sequoyah Assembly are now worth well over half a million dollars, and it provides an attractive meeting place for groups and leaders in all phases of Methodist work. Attendance has grown to 4,000 per year, and it is expected that this will increase as more heated buildings are provided, so that sessions may be held in winter as well as in summer.

A governing Board of Trustees for the Assembly meets once each year. This Board is composed of all the bishops of the Jurisdiction, a representative from each Annual Conference, the Jurisdictional president of the W.S.C.S.

and the District Superintendent of the Fayetteville District, as well as the Superintendent of the Assembly.

During the year of 1965 a new house was built, known as the Bishops' Cottage. This was made possible through the efforts of the resident Bishop of Arkansas, PAUL V. GALLOWAY. Contributions were made by Conferences and by a number of individuals, especially in Arkansas. This house is available to any bishop and/or his family who wants to come to the mountain at any time during the year.

MOUNT UNION COLLEGE, Alliance, Ohio, was established in 1846, and the Conservatory of Music (now the music department) in 1865. Scio College merged with Mount Union in 1911. The institution, which began as coeducational, was one of the first colleges in the world to enroll both men and women. In addition to having the patronage of the two Methodist conferences in Ohio, it has had the support of the Pittsburgh Annual Conference since 1864. Degrees offered are the B.A., B.S., B.M. (Music), B.M.E. (Music Education). The governing board has fifty members, twelve elected by the Northeast Ohio Conference, three by the Western Pennsylvania Conference, four by the Ohio Conference, fifteen by the board, six by alumni, six honorary; the three bishops and the president of the college, ex officio.

JOHN O. CROSS

MOURNER'S BENCH, which was also called the "anxious bench," was a term used in CAMP MEETINGS and early revivals referring to a certain number of benches directly in front of the speaker's stand or pulpit, which were enclosed by low rails on three sides (the platform or pulpit forming the fourth side). Persons seeking salvation were invited to come within the enclosure to kneel by or sit on the benches where they were made objects of prayer by the preacher and the congregation. Here they "mourned" for their sins until they were transformed by the "joy of salvation." Sometimes the enclosed space was referred to as the "altar" or, by the irreverent, as "the pen." B. W. Gorham in his Camp Meeting Manual suggests that this "altar" or "mourner's bench" "should be at least 25 feet square, with an aisle between the benches and with entries only at the two front corners by the speaker's stand." The men were usually separated from the women in the mourner's benches of the early camp meetings.

It is difficult to say when or where this arrangement or term first originated. It seems to have been used very early in the history of camp meetings, which began around 1800. It was used with dramatic power, however, by the evangelist Charles Finney during his revivals in Rochester and northern New York 1824-27. He writes of his work in Rochester, "I made a call, I think for the first time, upon all that class of persons whose convictions were so ripe that they were willing to renounce their sins and give themselves to God, to come forward to certain seats, which I requested to be vacated, while we made them subjects of prayer." Under his leadership the custom came to be universally used for a time at revival meetings and the term "anxious bench" began to displace the term "mourner's bench." The custom of inviting people forward in this way was also referred to as the "altar call."

The "mourner's tent" in early camp meetings was an outgrowth of the mourner's bench. It was a tent on the grounds provided for the same purpose as the bench. It was kept lighted all night so that at any hour of the day or night the "mourners" or "anxious ones" might come in for prayer. A curtain was hung to separate the men from the women.

MOUZON, EDWIN DU BOSE (1869-1937), American bishop, was born in Spartanburg, S. C., May 19, 1869. His parents, Samuel Cogswell and Harriet Preufey Mouzon, were descendants of devout Huguenot families, colonial day settlers.

All of his formal education was received in the public schools of Spartanburg, and in WOFFORD COLLEGE, where he received the A.B. degree in 1889. From early youth to the end of his life, he was an assiduous student.

In 1888 he was licensed to preach, and became the fourth minister in his family for four successive generations. After graduating from college, he was appointed supply preacher in Bryan, Texas. In 1890 he was married to Mary Elizabeth Mike. There were three daughters and three sons. The sons have attained distinction as university teachers and authors.

From 1889 to 1908, Mouzon served pastorates in TEXAS, with an interim of three years in KANSAS CITY, Mo. In 1908 he left the largest church in the then WEST TEXAS CONFERENCE, Travis Park in SAN ANTONIO, taking a greatly reduced salary, to organize a theological department at SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, in order to help prepare better ministers. After he was elected bishop in 1910, he gave vigorous leadership in helping to establish SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY in DALLAS, Texas. His embryo professorship of theology at Southwestern University, where he taught Bible, systematic theology and homiletics, was transferred to Southern Methodist University, in 1915. He became the acting dean and organizer of what is now PERKINS SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY.

Bishop Mouzon presided over most of the annual conferences of the M. E. Church, South from 1910 to 1937. In 1930 he presided over the organization of the BRAZIL Methodist Church, and turned the GENERAL CONFERENCE there over to the native officials. He also held the Japanese, the Korean and the Cuban Conferences.

As a member of the Board of MISSIONS and also of the board of trustees of SCARRITT COLLEGE for Christian Workers, Mouzon was influential in the transfer of that institution from Kansas City to NASHVILLE, Tenn. From 1911 to 1931 he was a delegate to the decennial ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCES. In 1931 he spoke to this body on "The Basis of Confidence in Christian Thinking." He delivered the EPISCOPAL ADDRESS at the 1930 General Conference of the M. E. Church, South, when "fundamentalism" and union with the two other American Methodist Churches were featured in this address.

He was a versatile minister. One of his contemporaries called him "the preacher to his generation." Another declared that "the pulpit was his throne." In 1929 he gave the Yale University Lyman Beecher Lectures on Preaching. His title was "Preaching with Authority." His FONDREN Lectures at Southern Methodist University were "The Missionary Evangel," and his Cole Lectures at VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY were on "The Program of Jesus." In these last two lecture treatises, delivered the same year, he emphasized the unity of the personal and the social aspects of the gospel. In 1918, following a series of four deaths in his family, including his wife, he published Does God Care? as his theology of suffering. In the midst of the "fundamentalist" discussions in 1924, he wrote The Fundamentals of Methodism. There were many articles in periodicals from his pen, as specific issues arose. Four universities bestowed honorary degrees on him.

As a conference presiding officer, Bishop JOHN M. MOORE said of Bishop Mouzon that he had three admirable qualities: "(1) He was never hasty in making decisions; (2) he was sensitive to the needs of his ministers; (3) he never uttered a bitter word towards those who differed with him."

Bishop Mouzon was chairman of the Methodist Committee on Unification when the first plan was rejected. He wrote to Bishop EARL CRANSTON of the M. E. Church, Jan. 20, 1925, "We will not stop. The unification of our two churches must be. The men who are vociferous today cannot speak the word tomorrow. There is a higher voice that brings peace to troubled waters. So long as I live I shall plead this cause."

Bishop Mouzon died suddenly on Feb. 10, 1937, of a heart attack in CHARLOTTE, N. C., where he then resided in charge of the Charlotte Area. He was buried in Dallas, Texas.

MOW COP is the summit of a ridge a thousand feet high bordering the counties of Cheshire and Staffordshire, England, where the first PRIMITIVE METHODIST CAMP MEETING was held on May 31, 1807.

The name, formerly written "Mole," may be the slightly disguised "meol" or "mel" meaning a bare, chalk hill. More probably however, the name is derived from Anglo-Saxon "mow" meaning "stack" or "heap," "cop" being the word for summit or top. An artificial tower, erected in 1754 as a landmark, crowns the hill.

MOZAMBIQUE is a province of PORTUGAL in southeast Africa, the name applying to all of Portuguese East Africa. It is a large irregularly shaped region extending for 1,600 miles along the coast between Tanganyika and Natal (SOUTH AFRICA). The area is 297,659 square miles, and the population is 7,376,000. The capital is Lourenco Marques.

The European history of Mozambique began in 1498 when Vasco da Gama discovered the mouth of the Zambezi River. Portuguese colonization followed in 1505 at Sofala where there was a flourishing trade in gold and slaves. Hostilities immediately broke out with the Arabs who for centuries had dominated the coast southward to Sofala.

During the third quarter of the nineteenth century Portuguese traders and explorers strove to establish an east-west corridor from Mozambique to ANGOLA on the Atlantic. This was frustrated by Cecil Rhodes in bringing the central area under British control.

In the late 1870's, Ndevu Mashaba, a native of Lourenco Marques, was converted in the British Wesleyan Mission while he worked in the mines in South Africa. He studied at the Lovedale Training Institute of the Free church of Scotland Mission. Returning to Mozambique in 1885, Mashaba established a school at Komatiport close to the Transvaal border west of Lourenco Marques. Several congregations were formed. Working in the Tonga dialect, he prepared a Tonga-English vocabulary, several school readers, a hymnbook, and parts of Scripture.

GEORGE WEAVING of the British Wesleyan Mission at Pretoria, Transvaal, superintended Mashaba's activity, occasionally visiting the area. The work grew, despite difficulties with government and Mashaba's imprisonment for a time on false charges. By 1893 a chapel stood beside the school and the membership was 200, with four local preachers. In 1904 there were 850 members and other hundreds on probation. H. L. Bishop of the Wesleyan Mission was appointed in 1906 to reside on the circuit, extending from the Limpopo River to the Transvaal border. Agreement was reached with the adjacent mission of the M. E. Church that the Limpopo River should be their common boundary. The membership grew to 1,500, with a community of 5,000.

The American Board (Congregational) had entered Mozambique in 1881, but by the end of the decade decided to concentrate elsewhere. Bishop WILLIAM TAYLOR of the M. E. Church found the situation ready-made for his "self-supporting missions." During 1888 to 1890 he secured the American Board stations at Chicucue (Gikuki) overlooking Inhambane Bay, and Cambine (Kambini) twenty miles northwest. E. H. Richards, formerly of the American Board, remained in charge. The work progressed under Bishop J. C. HARTZELL who followed Taylor. The Hartzell School at Chicucue and the Leprosarium and hospitals there and at Cambine are notable.

Growing from a District in the Congo Mission (1888), this work emerged as the Southeast Africa Mission Conference (1920), and the Southeast Africa Annual Conference (1954), with seven districts, fifty-three circuits, 787 places of worship, 6,100 members and 25,000 in constituency. Forty-six African members of Conference and thirty-one supplies with twenty-three members on trial constituted the native ministry as of 1968.

Cooperative work with other missions appears in the Christian Center at Lourenco Marques, the Center at Beira, one of the port cities, and the Union Theological School at Ricatla. At Johannesburg, Transvaal, a strong evangelistic work is conducted among the Mozambique men working in the mines. The Methodist Central Mission Press moved from Cambine to Johannesburg in 1924, serves several missions of southeast Africa.

Free Methodist Church. G. Henry Agnew, pioneer missionary of the Free Methodist Church, reached Inhambane in 1885. With the help of E. H. Richards of the American Board, property was secured at Mabile on Inhambane Bay. Agnew served in Mozambique for eighteen years, and then in Transvaal and Natal. This station was eventually moved southward to Inharrime, a short distance inland from Inharrime. The station had a farm of 825 acres, with extensive agricultural and industrial training facilities, a school for pastors, dispensary, girls' school, missionary residences, Christian native village and central church. The northern center is at Nhloi, 140 miles above Inhamachafo, occupying an old plantation. A new hospital stands there. Intensive work developed through the region between Massingao and the Rhodesia boundary. With this territory as his base, Ralph Jacobs pushed into Southern RHODESIA in 1938-39. The 1969 report indicated the Free Methodist membership as 7,500, although some bush circuits were unreported. Cooperation exists with The United Methodist Church in the training of nurses and medical technicians.

MUDGE, ENOCH (1776-1850), American minister, was born at Lynn, Mass., on June 28, 1776, and became an itinerant minister in 1793. From that date until 1799 he traveled on various appointments in MAINE until the hardship of travel affected his health, and he settled in Orrington, Maine, from 1799 to 1816. During this period he was twice chosen State Representative, and was active in the passage of the "Religious Freedom Bill." Having resumed the itinerancy in 1816, he was stationed at Boston, Lynn, Portsmouth, Newport and other New England appointments. From 1832 until his retirement from active life in 1844, he was pastor of the Seaman's Chapel at New Bedford.

Enoch Mudge was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1819. He wrote Camp-Meeting Hymn-Book, 1818; Notes on the Parables, 1828; a poem, Lynn, 1830; and published his Lectures to Seamen in 1836. He died on April 2, 1850.

MUELLER, CHRISTOPH GOTTLÖB (1785-1858), was the founder of Wesleyan Methodism in GERMANY. He emigrated to England in 1806 to escape conscription under Napoleon, and was converted in LONDON under Methodist preaching. He became EXHORTER, CLASS LEADER, and

CIRCUIT LEADER, and CIRCUIT STEWARD. He married Anne Claridge of Finchley in 1813. In that same year he visited his aged father in Winnenden (Kingdom of Württemberg, Germany), and in a MORAVIAN meeting in his father's house he gave a testimony of his experience of personal salvation through faith in Christ. As it was the time of rationalism and liberalism in European thought, this message was entirely new for many people in Germany. A revival started, and the Wesleyan METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY (London) was asked by the new converts to send a minister. The London committee hesitated but finally acceded and sent Mueller to work as lay missionary (1831). He regarded his meetings in and around Winnenden as religious societies within the Lutheran State Church. Still he could not avoid troubles and persecutions. He was partly supported by the London committee (seventy pounds a year) and partly earned his living as a farmer. Year by year during the winter Mueller went on big preaching tours through Württemberg, like WESLEY riding on horseback or walking. At his death in 1858 the Methodist returns for that year showed fifty-seven preaching places, thirty-four class leaders and exhorters, and 1,040 members. LUDWIG S. JACOBY, superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Germany and John C. Link, pioneer of the EVANGELISTIC GEMEINSCHAFT in Germany, E.U.B. since 1851, belonged among his friends.

REUBEN H. MUELLER

MUELLER, REUBEN HERBERT (1897-), American E.U.B. minister, general church officer, and bishop, was born in ST. PAUL, Minn., June 2, 1897, the son of Reinhold Michael and Emma (Bunse) Mueller. Seminary and college trained, he was licensed to preach in 1916 by the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION, ordained deacon in 1922, and elder in 1924. Pastorates were served in MINNESOTA and INDIANA before he became a district superintendent in 1937. In 1943, R. H. Mueller was chosen executive secretary of the Board of Christian Education, THE EVANGELICAL CHURCH, and later of the E.U.B. CHURCH, and in 1954 he was elected bishop.

Mueller was married to Magdalene Stauffacher, Dec. 26, 1919. A daughter, Margaret (Mrs. Armin C. Hoesch, missionary to NIGERIA for thirteen years), was born to this union.

In addition to many denominational offices, Bishop Mueller has served as chairman of the Board of Managers of the World Council of Christian Education; president of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES of Christ; member of WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES Assembly and its Central Committee; chairman of BOARD OF BISHOPS (EUB); chairman of Commission on Church Union (EUB); recipient of THE UPPER ROOM Citation and the Distinguished Alumni Award, NORTH CENTRAL COLLEGE; and honorary degrees from WESTMAR COLLEGE (D.D.), North Central College (LL.D.), INDIANA CENTRAL COLLEGE (L.H.D.), Union Theological Seminary, Tokyo (D.D.), Indiana University (LL.D.), OTTERBEIN COLLEGE (S.T.D.), OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY (L.H.D.), and WEST VIRGINIA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY (D.D.).

Bishop Mueller has written numerous articles and books, the latest two being His Church and The Living Word. In The United Methodist Church he was assigned to the INDIANA Area in 1968 and became president of the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS in 1969, for a period of one term.

MUKERJEE, H. L. (? -1931), and NOLIN KUMAR (? -1943), of INDIA, were father and son, who led unusual careers. H. L. Mukerjee was a Bengali Brahman, who was converted and radically changed. He married a daughter of JOEL THOMAS JANVIER, first Indian minister of the M.E. Church, and entered the ministry. In 1885, Mukerjee became an instructor in Bareilly Theological Seminary, and served on its faculty for thirty-eight years. He deeply influenced an entire generation of seminary students. He died Jan. 6, 1931, and was buried in Bareilly.

Nolin Kumar, his elder son, became a leading educator of the United Provinces and principal of the Government Teacher Training College at LUCKNOW. He was later deputed by the government to organize and direct the teacher-training college at the Muslim University, Aligarh.

Nolin Kumar Mukerjee was a member of two GENERAL CONFERENCES of the M.E. Church and a popular and effective local preacher. He died in Indore in 1943, and is buried there.

MUMMART, CLARENCE ALLEN (1874-1959), American United Brethren in Christ (Old Constitution) bishop and educator, was born of German ancestry, July 14, 1874 near Welsh Run, Franklin County, Pa. Home conditions were such that as a boy of nine or ten he was hired out to work on a farm. Schools were of a low standard and an education was considered unnecessary. By the age of seventeen his education was very limited, but he resolved that he would be ready to teach school by the time he was twenty. He received his first contract on his twentieth birthday and taught public school for six years. He was graduated from Huntington College with the A.B. (1907) and the B.D. (1908). He received the S.T.M. from NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY in 1925. The honorary D.D. was bestowed by Huntington College in 1912.

In his early life he had been associated with the UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH. At the age of fifteen he was working on a farm near Fairview, Md., and living with a Lutheran family. He made his confession of faith and affiliated with the Lutheran Church. When he felt called to the ministry he was aware of the Lutheran demand for an educated ministry, which came into conflict with his early training. He returned to the United Brethren Church and entered the gospel ministry in the Pennsylvania Conference where he was a member for nearly sixty-four years.

He was married to a United Brethren girl, Lillie Zimmerman, and was the father of four children, one son dying in infancy. The other son and two daughters have been engaged in educational work.

Mummart served as a pastor for a total of thirty-two years in Pennsylvania, Indiana and Ohio. He was conference presiding elder for five years. He served as the first general secretary of the United Brethren Christian Endeavor. He also was editor of the Christian Conservator for five years on two different occasions. He served as bishop two different terms for a total of eight years. His educational service to the church was as head of and professor in the theological department of Huntington College for seventeen years, during which time he also served as president for ten years on two different occasions.

He was an able executive and was always interested in the best interests of the church. He had abounding energy and frequently served the church in a dual role. Because of his early background he was sympathetic to those who served in the midst of hardships.

His death occurred at Greencastle, Pa., on Dec. 2, 1959. Burial was in the cemetery adjoining the Macedonia Church near Greencastle.

D. L. MUMPOWER

MUMPOWER, DANIEL LEEPER (1882-), a medical missionary to the Congo and one of the pioneers in that field for the M.E. Church, South, was born at Fayette, Mo., on Oct. 22, 1882, the son of Thomas Gray and Mollie Leeper Mumpower. He received the B.A. degree from CENTRAL COLLEGE (Fayette, Mo.) in 1902; and M.A. from Yale in 1903; and an M.D. from VANDERBILT in 1912. He resided in Doniphan, Mo., from 1903-08, teaching and working in a drugstore to get a pharmacist's license in order to work his way through Vanderbilt. He and his wife, Edith, were married in 1911, and three children were born to them.

Dr. Mumpower went to the Congo in 1913 under the Board of Missions of the M.E. Church, South. He was appointed superintendent of the mission there by Bishop WALTER LAMBUTH even before he left the United States, and was stationed at Wembo Nyama the whole time he was in Africa. In 1920 he arranged for the building of a mission boat, named the "Texas," since Texans gave the funds for this river steamer.

Dr. Mumpower returned to the United States in 1922 because of the illness of his wife and settled in NASHVILLE in 1923 where he continued for a time his connection with the Board of Missions of his Church, or until 1932. He then went back into the practice of medicine. Illness forced him to retire on Aug. 1, 1965, and he had to be hospitalized there at the age of eighty-five.
